Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows they do not make any more use of the Statutes at Large in their home offices, which they do not have as a rule, than Members of the House do; that not as many Senators have a home office as Members of the House. That is neither here nor there, but I want to make a suggestion——

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman understands that while he is not permitted to offer any reflection on any Member here, he can appreciate what the gentleman from Illinois has said that they probably have no more use for them, but certain Members of the Senate think they have more use for documents, and so forth, than Members of the House. Of that I am fully convinced.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to give copies of the statutes to people who make use of them, but I would like to make this suggestion for future effect: We print the public laws and private laws now in separate volumes, and it is an expensive publication, as the gentleman knows. The private laws, in the main, consist of omnibus pension bills. I do not believe there is any necessity of distributing private laws with the same degree of liberality that there is of public laws to every department and branch of the Government where we send the public laws.

I do not know whether you could effect economy in that way or not, but I would request the prayerful consideration of the gentleman from Indiana to the idea of dispensing with the filling up of so many libraries with volumes of private laws which no one ever looks at. They may look at the proclamations sometimes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 71. The pamphlet laws of each session of Congress and the bound copies of the Statutes at Large of each Congress shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained in all the courts of the United States and of the several States therein. The pamphlet laws of each session of Congress and the Statutes at Large of each Congress shall contain all laws and concurrent and joint resolutions passed by Congress, and also all conventions, treaties, proclamations, and agreements: Provided, That neither the Revised Statutes of the United States, nor the Statutes at Large, nor the session laws shall be published in any newspaper at the expense of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 100, after the figures "71," in line 4, down to and including the word "therein," in line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 100, lines 4 and 8, strike out the following language: "The pamphlet laws of each session of Congress and the bound copies of the Statutes at Large of each Congress shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained in all the courts of the United States and of the several States therein."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is important whether it goes out or stays in, but this is not where it belongs. It is not in this law that we ought to fix what is evidence in the courts. That is carried by the law relating to the courts. It was up recently in the codification bill which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] had charge of, and I believe it is a provision in the law now, and it is also carried in the other law. Is this in the identical language of the printing law now?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I believe that the slip laws are evidence in court. My recollection is that they are. We print a slip law and a pamphlet law in bound volume of the Statutes at Large. The printing act makes the bound copies of the pamphlet laws evidence. I think the statute that governs on the subject—although I may be mistaken—makes the slip law evidence, and when we print one of these copies here by authority of Congress it does not have to be a certified copy nor do we have to wait until it is printed in pamphlet form before it can be introduced in evidence.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does it say it shall be evidence in the courts of the States?

Mr. BARNHART. In the courts of the United States and the several States therein.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is the present law, I suppose, and no objection to it on that score, but I do not see exactly how Congress can pass an act declaring what shall be evidence in the courts of a State. The Constitution of the United States provides that the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land and be binding. Of course, it is the law in the State, but how the Congress of the United States can declare what shall be evidence in the courts of a State passes my comprehension.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield? Most States have a section in their code saying that public laws and acts of another State shall be evidence when printed under the public authority of that State, of the laws of that State.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly. The States can do it, but how can Congress say what shall be evidence in the State of Missouri?

Mr. BORLAND. Printed under the authority of Congress. I think that is true in most State courts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is your State law?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, here is an attempt to say by Congress what shall be evidence in a State court.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a State did not permit any method of approving the law, they could not nullify an act of Congress in that way?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not at all. If the gentleman will pardon me, as I caught the reading of it—I do not have it before me—it is not a declaration that it shall be the law in the State courts.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it is evidence. But if you leave it to the State how the law should be approved, and the State did not permit any method of approving the law, that would be to set aside the law in the State courts.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That would be a question for the court itself to pass upon in the absence of a legislative act.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the absence of a legislative act the courts themselves could determine what was evidence. It is possibly an academic discussion. I do not want to take up any time with it, but I wanted to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to what seems to me to be a very peculiar thing to do, in that the Congress of the United States should declare by legislation what should be evidence in the State courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 72. The following shall be printed and distributed as provided in this act:

(1) Annual reports of the officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives: Provided, That the annual reports required by law to be submitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, by the officers thereof shall be printed as congressional documents of the session to which they are to be submitted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Section 72 says:

The following shall be printed and distributed as provided in this act.

How is that, now? Is it the valuation distribution which is referred to there?

Mr. BARNHART. No. I will say this does not refer to valuation. This does not come to us through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. It says "printed and distributed as provided in this act."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The valuation only applies to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It applies to certain documents. Where is it provided in this act that these shall be distributed?

Mr. BARNHART. In section 44. It is a standing provision. It is the usual number.

Mr. MANN. That is what is intended by it?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And it does not come under the valuation?

Mr. BARNHART. Not under the valuation.

Mr. MANN. It is difficult to tell from the reading. Section 44 provides for printing of documents by order of the House or the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Paragraph 3, section 44, if the gentleman will look, will possibly cover it. It is on page 40.

Mr. MANN. That is to define what a Government publication is. I will not say there is not any provision in the bill covering it. The bill is a good one.

Mr. BARNHART. On page 42, section 46, line 20, it says:

Of the House numbered documents and reports, excepting reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions, there shall be distributed—

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Book of Estimates: Provided, That the annual estimates of appropriations transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury as provided by law shall be printed as a congressional document of the session to which they are submitted and be ready for delivery on the first day of each regular session of Congress: Provided further, That the Committee on Appropriations of each House is authorized to have printed and bound in half morocco not to exceed 100 copies thereof for its own use.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to strike out the words "one hundred," on page 101, lines 6 and 7, and insert "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 101, lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the clerk of the House Committee on Appropriations tells me it is not necessary to have more than 10 copies of the Book of Estimates bound, as provided in this particular paragraph. He states he has never had more than that number bound in any one year, and it is at his suggestion that I have offered this amendment. It is simply in the interest of economy, because the additional number is not necessary.

Mr. BARNHART. We will accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee how many copies of the Book of Estimates this provides for printing?

The CHAIRMAN. That covers the usual number.

Mr. MANN. Five hundred for the House.

Mr. BARNHART. Thirteen hundred and forty-five.

Mr. BORLAND. What becomes of those?

Mr. BARNHART. They go to the document room.

Mr. BORLAND. Are they sent to the document room or the folding room?

Mr. BARNHART. To the document room.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there demand for that number of copies of the Book of Estimates?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. Of course, 500 go to libraries.

Mr. BORLAND. To what libraries?

Mr. BARNHART. To the depository libraries—to the departments and the other depository libraries.

Mr. BORLAND. That is, out of the 1,345?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. What has been the consumption of the remaining 800? Are they all gone?

Mr. BARNHART. The committee is not prepared to advise the gentleman from Missouri as to that.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that that is a large number of copies of the Book of Estimates, which is a large book, and it must be expensive to print.

Mr. BARNHART. We had the superintendent of documents before us, and he went over all these matters very carefully, and he gave us a number of very liberal reductions. After taking 500 from the 1,345 it leaves barely more than one for each Member and Senator.

Mr. BORLAND. My experience is that each Member does not use one copy.

Mr. BARNHART. Even then it is necessary, and the provision is that there shall be that many.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield, the gentleman from Indiana awhile ago referred me to paragraph 3 in section 46 for the authority fixing the distribution of these documents, and under that 500 go to the House folding room.

Mr. BARNHART. To the House folding room?

Mr. MANN. To the House document room; not to exceed 500.

Mr. BORLAND. Does any portion of them go to the folding room?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Where is the provision under which that number is fixed? I do not think I know where it is in the bill. The gentleman referred to "the usual number."

Mr. MANN. "The usual number" comes from the number which are distributed to the House and the Senate and to public depositaries, or in some cases to the President and the executive departments. Certain documents by direction go in certain numbers. That is "the usual number" as to any document. It varies slightly.

Mr. BORLAND. I notice in section 70, paragraph 3, that there is an express enumeration of the number of copies of the pamphlet laws to be furnished to each one of these departments. Now, is there an enumeration somewhere of "the usual number," as it is called, of these other documents?

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is an enumeration at any place. That is the specific number provided for. Take this section 46, paragraph 3, that was referred to a little while ago:

Of the House numbered documents and reports, excepting reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions, there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 150 copies; to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, not to exceed 10 copies; to the House document room, not to exceed 500 copies; and to the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, not to exceed 20 copies—

And so forth.

Now, there are other provisions in the bill which require these same documents to go to certain other officials, and also to certain public depositories; and the total required for distribution makes it what they call "the usual number."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws the pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(3) Statement of appropriations: Provided, That the statement of all appropriations made during each session of Congress, including new offices created and the salaries of each, and salaries of the offices which are increased and the amounts of such increase authorized by the act of July 4, 1836, shall be prepared under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives, and said statement shall show also the offices the salaries of which are reduced or omitted, and the amount of such reduction, and shall also contain a chronological history of the regular appropriation bills passed during the session for which it is prepared. The foregoing statement of appropriations shall be printed at the close of each regular session of Congress as a document thereof, and the Committee on Appropriations of each House is authorized to have printed and bound in half morocco not to exceed 100 copies thereof for its own use.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 101, in line 13, after the word "thirty-six," insert the words "and amendments thereof."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that since the act of July 4, 1836, was passed, there have been two amendments, one adopted in 1888 and the other in 1897, relating to statements of appropriations. My attention was called to the fact, and it was suggested that this amendment ought to be adopted in order to preserve the requirements of the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19, on page 101, after the word "prepared," insert the following: "and exhibit of amounts of contracts authorized by appropriation acts in addition to the appropriations made therein, and specific reference to all indefinite appropriations made at each session."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is exactly in accord with the mandatory act of July 19, 1897.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask to strike out the word "one," line 24, page 101, and insert the word "two," so as to make it read, "200 copies."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 24, page 101, strike out the word "one," at the beginning of the line, and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee what the purpose of the extra number is?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations states that 100 copies are not sufficient.

This past year he had either 120 or 125 bound, and they were necessary in order to make the proper distribution. This bill does not provide that any particular number of copies shall be bound, but says not exceeding a certain number shall be bound, and inasmuch as 100 are not sufficient, and only a sufficient number will be bound to supply the necessary number for distribution, it is thought that the limit should be made 200 rather than 100.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to make an inquiry. Are these the only copies of this document that are printed?

Mr. BARNHART. The usual number in addition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed by the chairman of the committee that the usual number are printed, in addition to those here mentioned.

Mr. MANN. I venture to say you can send out to the document room now and find 300 copies that are unused.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand that these copies are distributed to the chairmen of the various committees, certainly the various appropriating committees, the heads of the departments, and the heads of important bureaus in the various departments.

Mr. MANN. I understand they get them anyhow. Of course, if they get them bound they are in a little better shape than if they get them here unbound.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are bound for permanent use and permanent filing.

Mr. MANN. They are of no special value after the year has gone by. They are for current use, mainly for current legislative use. I have no doubt that the clerk of the committee makes good use of them. I am frank to say that I think usually I get one of them, and it is very convenient. Yet I could have one bound myself. We have a large number going to waste undoubtedly now, however.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will yield, the committee could see no danger of any serious extravagance in this, because it is up to the Committee on Appropriations not to have more than it actually needs, and as it used more than 100 last year I think it is fair to assume that there will be no waste, and the committee will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(12) Daily Consular and Trade Reports, Department of Commerce: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to have printed, for distribution by the Department of Commerce, not to exceed 5,000 copies of any one issue of the Consular and Trade Reports, the distribution of which shall be confined to copies sent to consular officers and other Government officers for official use, to chambers of commerce and similar commercial organizations, to schools and colleges, to public libraries, to the press, and for the use of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in exchanges and replying to inquiries relative to foreign trade. Other copies shall be sold by the superintendent of documents at the rate of $2.50 per annum: Provided, That that part of section 208 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by an act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor, approved February 14, 1903, authorizing the submission to Congress of the annual report known as the "Commercial Relations of the United States," is hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 108, line 2, by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "twenty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 108, line 2, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. BARNHART. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will consent to the reading of the balance of the section up to paragraph 73? That is as far as the committee intend to go this evening. It is just the next page, and then we might go back if we have any time.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to take it up to-night, and I am willing to have the section read, with the understanding that we may return to this paragraph for amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. The amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. MANN. I have another amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Very well. With that understanding I will ask the Clerk to read up to 73, and then I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. You might ask unanimous consent to pass over this paragraph, with leave to return for amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; that is understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to pass over the paragraph just read, with the privilege of returning to it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(16) Annals of the Astrophysical Observatory of the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That not to exceed 1,500 copies are authorized to be printed for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he wishes to discuss his amendment now?

Mr. MANN. No; I think not to-night.

Mr. BARNHART. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12065. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at La Junta, Colo.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE PRESENT CONGRESS.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks on the general political subject of the accomplishments of this Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on accomplishments of the present Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, which I shall not exercise, I want to say that if this bill which we are now considering, and which I suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin is favorable to, were a law, granting consent would do him no good.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Treasury Department. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 16, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there was passed by the Senate last night the bill (S. 5614) for the improvement of the foreign service. I find the last section provides that the act shall take effect on the 30th day of September, 1914. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. On page 7, lines 17 and 18, I move to strike out the words "30th day of September, 1914," and to insert "day of its approval by the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE COTTON CROP.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, upon the same line as my remarks of yesterday with reference to the amendment offered to the tax bill on the cotton question, I send to the desk and desire to have read a cablegram sent day before yesterday from Manchester, England, by Sir Charles Macara. I do this because, as I mentioned yesterday, he is the president of the International Federation of Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association, and because there is probably no one more thoroughly informed upon the cotton-manufacturing problem.

I send his cablegram to be read to emphasize the statement which I made yesterday that the best students of the cotton-manufacturing side of this problem are of the opinion that the trade in manufactured products is demoralized to-day by reason of the condition of the trade in lint cotton, and that in the interest of the manufacturer almost as much as in the interest of the cotton producer action upon this subject is required.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, October 14, 1914.

Col. ROBERT M. THOMPSON,
43 Exchange Place, New York, N. Y.:

Heartily support scheme for establishment of cotton reserve, which since war began I have been urging British and American Governments to take up. Scheme, to be effective, must embrace cotton crop of the world, England being responsible for Indian and Egyptian crops, representing about one-third world's crop, and America two-thirds. England possesses 40 per cent of the cotton machinery of the world and America about 20 per cent. Both Governments are vitally interested in preventing further serious losses to growers, cotton merchants, spinners, manufacturers, operatives, and distributers of cotton goods. Stable price of 9 cent would do this. Cotton organizations, either national or international, could not cope with situation, which can only be dealt with by cooperation of two Governments named, guaranteeing minimum price through ordinary commercial channels, with restrictions as to maximum to guard against gambling. Such guaranty would probably result in confidence being restored all around, which is so urgently needed.

CHARLES W. MACARA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to read a few lines from a letter by Col. Thompson, written to me on yesterday in connection with sending me the copy of the cablegram which has been read. It says:

I inclose a copy of Sir Charles's reply.

It is of enormous importance that some steps should be taken to gather up the surplus cotton of this year's crop, and that the world should know that this is being done. There is plenty of time to do it, if once the world knows that it is being done.

From the standpoint of the spinner Sir Charles thinks that 9 cents is a fair price. From the producers' standpoint I think that 12 cents is a fair price; but, perhaps, under the circumstances a compromise at 10½ cents might be reached.

Mr. President, I send to the desk and wish to have read an extract from a telegram from the former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Atlanta and now president of the largest life insurance company, I think, in the State of Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., October 15.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Kindly mail me copy of proposed rider to emergency act authorizing financing of cotton crop. What are possibilities of enactment by Congress? Your measure means immediate restoration of normal conditions throughout South.

WILMER L. MOORE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish also to have read a short extract from a letter to me received this morning from a tobacco manufacturer and seller. I present it to show the view of this problem of one interested in the manufacture of tobacco.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I am writing to different sections of the country asking my friends in different States to urge their Senators and Congressmen to support earnestly any bill which Senator HOKE SMITH and his associates will approve looking to the enactment of such legislation as will insure the United States getting a price for her cotton above the cost of production, which will insure a continuation of the balance of trade in our favor as against all other Governments. I am taking the position that if we protect cotton, which is our leading export commodity, we have taken care of the big engine which gives vigor and vitality to all commercial interests throughout this entire Government. The tobacco interests should withdraw in favor of cotton, for if cotton brings a good price every other interest is indirectly thereby protected.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have been requested by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to ask permission to have read into the RECORD a letter bearing date the 13th of October, by Mr. W. P. G. Harding, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, addressed to certain papers in Alabama and in approval of Senator BANKHEAD's method of relieving the cotton situation. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand that that is rather a lengthy document, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to its being read?

Mr. SIMMONS. I object; and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the letter be read? [Putting the question.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall make no point about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ayes have it, and the letter will be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, which is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 13, 1914.

Birmingham Age-Herald, Montgomery Advertiser, Mobile Register, and other Alabama papers:

Many plans have been suggested and some facilities provided by means of temporary loans on cotton for tiding over the situation in the South, which is now becoming acute, but this, to my mind, does not afford the real solution of the problem, as such loans only pyramid the liability and postpone the day of reckoning. What is really needed is a market, and as there is no adequate natural market for the time being, the question reverts to the possibility of creating an artificial market. Attempts have been made to create such a market through the National Government, but it is clearly impossible, both from a legal standpoint and for the practical reasons set forth by Senator BANKHEAD in his address to the people of Alabama, for the Government of the United States to aid either as a purchaser of cotton or as a lender upon it as security. Much valuable time has been lost in pursuing this phantom hope, and the sooner our people abandon the chase the better. If anything is to be done toward creating an artificial market, such action must be taken by the Southern States for themselves.

The objection has been raised that owing to the length of time involved in amending the constitutions of many of the cotton-producing States concerted action is not possible, and that it will be impracticable for any State to proceed alone. I was at first inclined to this opinion, but upon a more thorough analysis of the situation I have become convinced that Senator BANKHEAD is correct in his statement that the people of Alabama have it within their power to conserve the value of cotton produced within the State, thereby averting disaster, as far as they themselves are concerned. Our people had been looking forward to an era of great prosperity this fall, and their expectations were about to be realized when the terrific war in Europe broke out, which has resulted in a world-wide paralysis of trade and derangement of credit. Under ordinary circumstances the farmers of Alabama would have realized about $100,000,000 this season from their cotton crop, out of which would have been paid debts due within and without the State of probably $60,000,000, leaving a surplus of about $40,000,000 to represent the margin of prosperity. Nature has been bountiful, but man-made conditions are adverse, and it is doubtful if the natural market for cotton in our State is broad enough to liquidate the obligations incurred in producing the crop.

Senator BANKHEAD's plan does not provide for any new or additional indebtedness, but seeks to change the form of liabilities already incurred by converting individual debts into obligations of the State. When he proposes that the State of Alabama purchase one-half of all the cotton grown within her borders at a price representing what is probably the average cost of production—10 cents per pound—and that payment be made by an issue of 4 per cent bonds, payable on or before three years after date, he points out the way to establish an artificial market by means of which the cotton surplus in Alabama can be carried over beyond the danger point, and he has, in my opinion, suggested the most practicable way of securing immediate and effective relief. There are many details, of course, connected with the plan that should be carefully worked out. Due consideration should be given to the proper grading and warehousing of the cotton. Care should be taken that the means provided for the payment of interest on the cotton bonds as long as they may be outstanding and for the expense incident to storing this large amount of cotton—approximately 800,000 bales—should be adequate. The small bonds or notes, in denominations of $10, $20, and $50, are not to be interest bearing, but are intended to discharge local debts, and are to be convertible in sums or multiples of $1,000 into 4 per cent cotton bonds of the State. I entertain no doubt whatever that under a proper administration of the plan, if adopted, that these notes would readily be accepted at par in settlement of local obligations, and that the bonds into which they can be converted would also be taken anywhere without discount in satisfaction of debts due by Alabama merchants. This is not altogether a surmise, for I have taken occasion to ask jobbers and bankers in various sections of the country for their views, and I do not believe that any creditor of an Alabama farmer or merchant would hesitate to take these Alabama cotton bonds in liquidation of obligations, for in most cases the only security they now have is the equity in the cotton in the hands of thousands of individual holders, for which there is practically no cash market. This apparent purchase of cotton by the State would be really a mobilization of debts, a concentration of assets, and the State would be merely lending its credit on this cotton security to the thousands of its own citizens who have produced its great cotton crop, thereby facilitating liquidation in an orderly manner. It should be noted that Senator BANKHEAD'S plan provides that the whole cost of this transaction, including bond interest, sinking fund, and carrying charges, shall be borne by those directly benefited—the cotton farmers—so that all other interests in the State will receive the great indirect benefits without any expense to themselves.

Action by Alabama alone involves, of course, the purchase of a greater proportion of its own crop than would have been necessary had joint action been taken by 9 or 10 of the cotton-producing States; but it should be remembered that a bond issue of Alabama alone would be much smaller than the aggregate of bonds issued by several States would have been, and the smaller issue would be, therefore, the more readily absorbed.

The execution of this or any other plan to relieve the situation will require the adoption of a constitutional amendment, which must first be submitted by the legislature of the State and adopted by a majority vote of the people. Under the law about two months must elapse between the date of submission and the election. It is clear that action at the regular session in January next would be too late, and that if any relief is to be had, it is imperative that the governor call an extra session of the legislature at once.

It must be understood that this letter is not written in any official capacity, nor must it be construed as an expression of the views of anyone but myself; it is solely an expression of my individual opinion and is just what I would have written had I remained in Birmingham. As a citizen of Alabama, for many years engaged in the banking business in the State, I feel that I am familiar with the local situation and that I am entitled to an opinion.

Gov. O'Neal has now a tremendous responsibility and a great opportunity; an extraordinary occasion certainly exists; and I strongly urge that he call the legislature together at once to consider this cotton problem. Each day's delay means additional loss to the farmers and business men of Alabama.

W. P. G. HARDING.

SALE OF POISON IN CHINESE CONSULAR DISTRICTS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back unanimously the bill (S. 6631) to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China, and I submit a report (No. 821) thereon.

I also send to the desk certain information bearing upon the subject, and ask that it may be printed with the report for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar; and in the absence of objection, the memoranda will be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may have the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I should like to ask for the present consideration and passage of the bill. The Senate has passed a similar bill, but there has been no concurrent action by the two Houses.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the bill? I was not listening at the moment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the bill to regulate the sale of opium through ports in China where the United States has extra-territorial jurisdiction. Those of us on the committee are very familiar with the provisions of the bill. If there is no objection, I should like to have immediate consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. If there is to be no discussion——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There will be no discussion, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will agree to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan whether the legislation which we enacted last winter to make effective treaty regulation upon the subject does not cover this matter?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; the legislation pending in the Committee on Finance is of a different character.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not have reference to that. Last winter Congress passed two short bills designed to apply to the traffic in these prohibited drugs between this country and countries which had adopted similar treaty regulations, providing both against their export and import either to or from those countries, except under the conditions for which those two short statutes provided.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The committee does not think that this matter is in conflict at all with the legislation to which the Senator from Colorado refers.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I see no objection to the bill, but it occurred to me that the matter might have been already provided for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1915, it shall be unlawful in the consular districts of the United States in China for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States not licensed as a pharmacist within the meaning of this act to conduct or manage any pharmacy, drug or chemical store, apothecary shop, or other place of business for the retailing, compounding, or dispensing of any drugs, chemicals, or poisons, or for the compounding of physicians' prescriptions, or to keep exposed for sale at retail, any drugs, chemicals, or poisons, except as hereinafter provided, or, except as hereinafter provided, for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States not licensed as a pharmacist within the meaning of this act to compound, dispense, or sell, at retail, any drug, chemical, poison, or pharmaceutical preparation upon the prescription of a physician, or otherwise, or to compound physicians' prescriptions, except as an aid to and under the proper supervision of a pharmacist licensed under this act. And it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation owing permanent allegiance to the United States owning partly or wholly or managing a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business to cause or permit any person other than a licensed pharmacist to compound, dispense, or sell at retail any drug, medicine, or poison, except as an aid to and under the proper supervision of a licensed pharmacist: Provided, That where it is necessary for a person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States and owning partly or wholly or managing a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business to employ Chinese subjects to compound, dispense, or sell at retail any drug, medicine, or poison, such person, firm, corporation, owner, part owner, or manager of a pharmacy, drug store, or other place of business may employ such Chinese subjects when their character, ability, and age of 21 years or over have been certified to by at least two recognized and reputable practitioners of medicine, or two pharmacists licensed under this act whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to interfere with any recognized and reputable practitioner of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary surgery in the compounding of his own prescriptions, or to prevent him from supplying to his patients such medicines as he may deem proper, except as hereinafter provided; nor with the exclusively wholesale business of any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States dealing and licensed as pharmacists, or having in their employ at least one person who is so licensed, except as hereinafter provided; nor with the sale by persons, firms, or corporations whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States other than pharmacists of poisonous substances sold exclusively for use in the arts, or as insecticides, when such substances are sold in unbroken packages bearing labels having plainly printed upon them the name of the contents, the word "poison," when practicable the name of at least one suitable antidote, and the name and address of the vender.

SEC. 2. That every person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States now practicing as a pharmacist or desiring to practice as a pharmacist in the consular districts in China shall file with the consul an application, duly verified under oath, setting forth the name and age of the applicant, the place or places at which he pursued and the time spent in the study of pharmacy, the experience which the applicant has had in compounding physicians' prescriptions under the direction of a licensed pharmacist, and the name and location of the school or college of pharmacy, if any, of which he is a graduate, and shall submit evidence sufficient to show to the satisfaction of said consul that he is of good moral character and not addicted to the use of alcoholic liquors or narcotic drugs so as to render him unfit to practice pharmacy: Provided, That applicants shall be not less than 21 years of age and shall have had at least four years' experience in the practice of pharmacy or shall have served three years under the instruction of a regularly licensed pharmacist, and any applicant who has been graduated from a school or college of pharmacy recognized by the proper board of his State, Territory, District of Columbia, or other possession of the United States as in good standing shall be entitled to practice upon presentation of his diploma.

SEC. 3. That if the applicant for license as a pharmacist has complied with the requirements of the preceding section, the consul shall issue to him a license which shall entitle him to practice pharmacy in the consular districts of the United States in China, subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That the license of any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States to practice pharmacy in the consular districts of the United States in China may be revoked by the consul if such person be found to have obtained such license by fraud, or be addicted to the use of any narcotic or stimulant, or to be suffering from physical or mental disease, in such manner and to such extent as to render it expedient that in the interests of the public his license be canceled; or to be of an immoral character; or if such person be convicted in any court of competent jurisdiction of any offense involving moral turpitude. It shall be the duty of the consul to investigate any case in which it is discovered by him or made to appear to his satisfaction that any license issued under the provisions of this act is revocable and shall, after full hearing, if in his judgment the facts warrant it, revoke such license.

SEC. 5. That every license to practice pharmacy shall be conspicuously displayed by the person to whom the same has been issued in the pharmacy, drug store, or place of business, if any, of which the said person is the owner or part owner or manager.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States, either personally or by servant or agent or as the servant or agent of any other person or of any firm or corporation, to sell, furnish, or give away any cocaine, salts of cocaine, or preparation containing cocaine or salts of cocaine, or morphine or preparation containing morphine or salts of morphine, or any opium or preparation containing opium, or any chloral hydrate or preparation containing chloral hydrate, except upon the original written order or prescription of a recognized and reputable practitioner of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary medicine, which order or prescription shall be dated and shall contain the name of the person for whom prescribed, or, if ordered by a practitioner of veterinary medicine, shall state the kind of animal for which ordered and shall be signed by the person giving the order or prescription. Such order or prescription shall be, for a period of three years, retained on file by the person, firm, or corporation who compounds or dispenses the article ordered or prescribed, and it shall not be compounded or dispensed after the first time except upon the written order of the original prescriber: Provided, That the above provisions shall not apply to preparations containing not more than two grains of opium, or not more than one-quarter grain of morphine, or not more than one-quarter grain of cocaine, or not more than two grains of chloral hydrate in the fluid ounce, or if a solid preparation, in one avoirdupois ounce. The above provisions shall not apply to preparations sold in good faith for diarrhea and cholera, each bottle or package of which is accompanied by specific directions for use and caution against habitual use, nor to liniments or ointments sold in good faith as such when plainly labeled "For external use only," nor to powder of ipecac and opium, commonly known as Dover's powder, when sold in quantities not exceeding 20 grains: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not be construed to permit the selling, furnishing, giving away, or prescribing for the use of any habitual users of the same any cocaine, salts of cocaine or preparation containing cocaine or salts of cocaine, or morphine or salts of morphine, or preparations containing morphine or salts of morphine, or any opium or preparation containing opium, or any chloral hydrate or preparation containing chloral hydrate. But this proviso shall not be construed to prevent any recognized or reputable practitioner of medicine whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States from furnishing in good faith for the use of any habitual user of narcotic drugs who is under his professional care such substances as he may deem necessary for their treatment, when such prescriptions are not given or substances furnished for the purpose of evading the provisions of this section. But the provisions of this section shall not apply to sales at wholesale between jobbers, manufacturers, and retail druggists, hospitals, and scientific or public institutions.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States to sell or deliver to any other person any of the following-described substances, or any poisonous compound, combination, or preparation thereof, to wit: The compounds of and salts of antimony, arsenic, barium, chrominum, copper, gold, lead, mercury, silver, and zinc, the caustic hydrates of sodium and potassium, solution or water of ammonia, methyl alcohol, paregoric, the concentrated mineral acids, oxalic and hydrocyanic acids and their salts, yellow phosphorus, Paris green, carbolic acid, the essential oils of almonds, pennyroyal, tansy, rue, and savin; croton oil, creosote, chloroform, cantharides, or aconite, belladonna, bitter almonds, colchicum, cotton root, cocculus indicus, conium, cannabis indica, digatalis, ergot, hyoscyamus, ignatia, lobelia, nux vomica, physostigma, phytolacca, strophanthus, stramonium, veratrum viride, or any of the poisonous alkaloids or alkaloidal salts derived from the foregoing, or any other poisonous alkaloids or their salts, or any other virulent poison, except in the manner following, and, moreover, if the applicant be less than 18 years of age, except upon the written order of a person known or believed to be an adult.

It shall first be learned, by due inquiry, that the person to whom delivery is about to be made is aware of the poisonous character of the substance and that it is desired for a lawful purpose, and the box, bottle, or other package shall be plainly labeled with the name of the substance, the word "poison," the name of at least one suitable antidote, when practicable, and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation dispensing the substance. And before delivery be made of any of the foregoing substances, excepting solution or water of ammonia and sulphate of copper, there shall be recorded in a book kept for that purpose the name of the article, the quantity delivered, the purpose for which it is to be used, the date of delivery, the name and address of the person for whom it is procured, and the name of the individual personally dispensing the same; and said book shall be preserved by the owner thereof for at least three years after the date of the last entry therein. The foregoing provisions shall not apply to articles dispensed upon the order of persons believed by the dispenser to be recognized and reputable practitioners of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary surgery: Provided, That when a physician writes upon his prescription a request that it be marked or labeled "Poison" the pharmacist shall, in the case of liquids, place the same in a colored glass, roughened bottle, of the kind commonly known in trade as a "poison bottle," and, in the case of dry substances, he shall place a poison label upon the container. The record of sale and delivery above mentioned shall not be required of manufacturers and wholesalers who shall sell any of the foregoing substances at wholesale to licensed pharmacists, but the box, bottle, or other package containing such substance, when sold at wholesale, shall be properly labeled with the name of the substance, the word "poison," and the name and address of the manufacturer or wholesaler: Provided further, That it shall not be necessary, in sales either at wholesale or at retail, to place a poison label upon, nor to record the delivery of, the sulphide of antimony, or the oxide or carbonate of zinc, or of colors ground in oil and intended for use as paints, or calomel; nor in the case of preparations containing any of the substances named in this section, when a single box, bottle, or other package, or when the bulk of one-half fluid ounce or the weight of one-half avoirdupois ounce does not contain more than an adult medicinal dose of such substance; nor, in the case of liniments or ointments sold in good faith as such, when plainly labeled "For external use only"; nor, in the case of preparations put up and sold in the form of pills, tablets, or lozenges, containing any of the substances enumerated in this section and intended for internal use, when the dose recommended does not contain more than one-fourth of an adult medicinal dose of such substance.

For the purpose of this and of every other section of this act no box, bottle, or other package shall be regarded as having been labeled "Poison" unless the word "poison" appears conspicuously thereon, printed in plain, uncondensed gothic letters in red ink.

SEC. 8. That no person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States seeking to procure in the consular districts of the United States in China any substance the sale of which is regulated by the provisions of this act shall make any fraudulent representations so as to evade or defeat the restrictions herein imposed.

SEC. 9. That every person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States owning, partly owning, or managing a drug store or pharmacy shall keep in his place of business a suitable book or file, in which shall be preserved for a period of not less than three years the original of every prescription compounded or dispensed at such store or pharmacy, or a copy of such prescription, except when the preservation of the original is required by section 6 of this act. Upon request the owner, part owner, or manager of such store shall furnish to the prescribing physician, or to the person for whom such prescription was compounded or dispensed, a true and correct copy thereof. Any prescription required by section 6 of this act, and any prescription for, or register of sales of, substances mentioned in section 6 of this act shall at all times be open to inspection by duly authorized consular officers in the consular districts of the United States in China. No person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States shall, in a consular district, compound or dispense any drug or drugs or deliver the same to any other person without marking on the container thereof the name of the drug or drugs contained therein and directions for using the same.

SEC. 10. That it shall be unlawful for any person whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States, not legally licensed as a pharmacist, to take, use, or exhibit the title of pharmacist, or licensed or registered pharmacist, or the title of druggist or apothecary, or any other title or description of like import.

SEC. 11. That any person, firm, or corporation whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 and not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not less than 1 month and not more than 60 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and if the offense be continuing in its character each week or part of a week during which it continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. And it shall be the duty of the consular and judicial officers of the United States in China to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That the word "consul" as used in this act shall mean the consular officer in charge of the district concerned.

SEC. 13. That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying or revoking any of the provisions of the act of Congress of February 23, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States the 5th day of October, 1881."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN VESSELS AND WATCH OFFICERS.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate resolution 467, directing the Secretary of Commerce to transmit to the Senate information as to the number of Americans available for watch officers and the list of vessels admitted to American registry. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. It merely calls for information from the Department of Commerce, and is reported favorably by the Senator from Minnesota from the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object to its consideration if it does not lead to debate, but after that I shall ask for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator will not say that. Some of us have been waiting to submit reports of committees. I have a bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations which I should like very much to report.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is a mere report from a committee, I shall not object to it, but I referred to the consideration of a bill.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce were, in line 2, after the words "furnish to the Senate," to insert: "if not incompatible with the public interest"; after line 7, to strike out "Second. Copies of letters and communications on file with the department relating to the supply of Americans available for watch officers on ships admitted to American registry"; and to renumber clause "third," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be requested to furnish to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, the following information:

First. How many Americans were shown by reports from the various customs districts to be available for watch officers, including masters, mates, and engineers, when the order suspending the requirements of the navigation laws relating thereto for a period of seven years was issued.

Second. A list of the vessels admitted to American registry under the emergency act, with a statement as to where and when built, by whom owned, what flag heretofore flying, and the number of American vessels and watch officers employed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there have been quite a number of letters presented from southern people with reference to the cotton situation, and it might be of interest to read an extract from a letter which I have received from one of my people 3,000 miles away from here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator from Washington will at least let us take up the bill, and then he may read the letter.

Mr. JONES. This is on that proposition. It will take me just a moment to read it. One of my constituents, after referring to a bill which I have introduced and which he approves, says:

But something I think to be of considerable more importance to the whole people at the present time is immediate relief to the cotton growers. Already the nearest starved class of farmers on our continent, the European war situation has forced them into a state of almost peonage to the bankers.

I do not know whether or not these statements are exactly correct and will be borne out by Senators from the cotton-growing States. The writer further says:

The "buy-a-bale" remedy, advocated by so many, will only hurry their destruction If the Government is for the people, it ought to come to the cotton growers' assistance, for they number a large part of the population. As a citizen of the State of Washington I think you ought to put forth every effort to get the Government to either lend money to the growers on their cotton or to buy the cotton outright.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the amendment to the bill which was submitted by me last night, and which appears on pages 16661 and 16662 of the RECORD, may be now considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Missouri would state to the Senate wherein this amendment differs materially from the section as originally reported by the committee.

Mr. STONE. I had printed in the RECORD which appears this morning a statement fully showing the changes in detail; and, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests to me, I also made a statement last night covering the whole matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Missouri has already gone over the ground, of course I shall not urge it any further.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I went over it at some little length last night.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that strikes out section 3 as it appeared in the bill as reported to the Senate, being an amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, and also strikes out section 2 as it appeared in the House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 2 was stricken out last night.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but I wish to say at this time that I think the adoption of the amendment just acted upon by the Senate will necessitate some renumbering of the sections, and inasmuch as this is an amendment covering considerable space I think the desire is that it shall be put at some place in the bill——

Mr. SIMMONS. It is section 3.

Mr. STONE. It is section 3 now, but it seems to me that an amendment which covers two or three pages might be put at some other point in the bill. However, I merely suggest that now, and ask unanimous consent that the sections may be renumbered.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that I think the best method would be to allow the amendment to be numbered "section 3," and, if necessary, the section can be divided into paragraphs. Then it would conform to the law of 1898 or to any other revenue law we may have passed as to the numbering of the sections, and it would appear as one section, namely, section 3.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it should properly be section 3 of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is correct.

Mr. STONE. It is not important. I merely made the suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on page 25, lines 5 and 6, I move to amend by striking out the words "whose capital stock does not exceed $10,000," and on line 9, by striking out the words "tax herein provided" and inserting the words "provisions of this act."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the Senator reading from the latest print of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. I am reading from the print dated October 8, 1914. I do not know whether or not that is the latest print.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a new print this morning.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The latest print is of October 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is necessary for the Secretary to use the print of October 8. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 16, page 25, line 5, after the word "associations," it is proposed to strike out "whose capital stock does not exceed $10,000," and in line 9, on the same page, to strike out the words "tax herein provided" and insert "provisions of this act."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be adopted. If the latter part of the amendment is not adopted, then the stock and bonds issued by cooperative building and loan associations would be only exempt from the tax within the particular section, while the amendment inserting the words "provisions of this act," of course, would exempt them from the tax imposed by the bill itself, and that is what was intended by the committee. The amendment will make the section complete.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now ask for a vote on the so-called tobacco amendment, beginning on page 11, line 2, which I offered yesterday and which went over.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, beginning with line 3, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including line 3 on page 12, and insert a new schedule, as printed in the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment was read yesterday.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear the amendment read again. I did not hear it on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

Manufacturers of cigarettes whose annual sales exceed 100,000,000 cigarettes shall each pay $2,496.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 48, line 25, after the word "act," I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk. I will state, Mr. President, that this amendment has been sent down from the department. The Secretary of the Treasury advises me that as the bill proposes a tax of $1.75 on beer and fermented liquors, and then provides that the act shall cease to be operative on the 31st of December, 1915, after that time, without the amendment which I now propose, there would be no tax on beer at all. This amendment is simply designed to put the present tax in operation when this bill expires by limitation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 48, line 25, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided, however, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1916, the provisions of section 3339 of the Revised Statutes as amended by an act approved April 12, 1902, imposing a tax on fermented liquors, shall not be affected by any limitation as to the levying or collecting of the additional tax imposed by this act on such fermented liquors, but shall then be in full force and effect on and after the said 1st day of January, 1916.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 12, line 11, I offer an amendment, also sent down by the department. I will state the purpose of the amendment. That section is with reference to special taxes, and reads:

And every person who carries on any business or occupation for which special taxes are imposed by this act, without having paid the special tax—

And so forth.

Those special taxes are assessed on the 1st day of July of each year for the next fiscal year. This amendment is to provide that for the fiscal year 1916, instead of being assessed for the full year, they shall be assessed only for the proportionate part of the year—that is, the part of the year between the assessment and the time when this bill ceases to be operative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 11, after the word "court," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That the special taxes imposed by this act, and payable during the special-tax year ending June 30, 1916, shall be collected and paid proportionately for the period during which such taxes shall remain in force during said year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment offered by the committee on page 35, lines 1 to 22, was passed over day before yesterday at the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who was not in the Chamber yesterday evening when it was reached.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think that matter went over at my request. I have no amendment to propose to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes, on page 35, beginning on line 1, after the word "within," at the end of the line, to strike out, beginning with the word "the," down to and including the words "1 cent," on line 8, and to insert "30 days after the expiration of each month a sworn statement to the collector of internal revenue in each of their respective districts, stating the number of dispatches, messages, or conversations originated at each of their respective exchanges, toll stations, or offices, and transmitted thence over their lines during the preceding month for which a charge of 15 cents or more was imposed, and for each of such messages or conversations the said person, firm, or corporation shall collect from the sender of the message or the originator of the conversation a tax of 1 cent in addition to the regular charges for the message or conversation, which tax the said person, firm, or corporation shall in turn pay to the said collector of internal revenue of their respective districts."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, upon the subject of that tax I have here a letter from an independent telephone company, the Pittsburgh & Allegheny Telephone Co., in the district in which I live, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

PITTSBURGH & ALLEGHENY TELEPHONE CO.,
Pittsburgh, Pa., October 12, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OLIVER: The officers of this company have requested me to enter its protest against the provisions of House bill No. 18891, or the "war-tax bill," affecting telephone companies. It is not clear under this bill whether the telephone company or the telephone user is required to pay the tax.

The tax of 1 cent on every 15-cent message is equivalent to almost 7 per cent of the gross toll earnings. This is an unreasonable tax. Furthermore, the 15-cent minimum is a discrimination in favor of telegraph companies, whose minimum charge is 25 cents per message. It is suggested, therefore, that the minimum telephone message upon which tax may be levied should be 25 cents and not 15 cents.

I trust that the suggested changes will appear to you as fair, and that you will find your way clear to support an amendment of the bill along those lines.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN S. WELLER, General Counsel.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I do not propose to offer an amendment, but to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the general dividing line between what are known as long-distance messages and local messages is 25 cents, and the independent telephone companies appear to think that placing a tax on messages for which a charge of no more than 15 cents is made is unjust. I hope the committee can see its way clear to adopt the line of 25 cents instead of 15 cents, and at least have the amendment allowed to go to conference in that shape.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, these taxes are not paid by the telephone companies. They are paid by the senders. Most of the telephone messages escape taxation altogether. A very small proportion of their messages are those the charge for which amounts to more than 15 cents, while all messages sent by telegraph companies amount to 25 cents or more. Most of the telephone messages, therefore, will not be taxed at all.

This is the only protest I have heard about this matter. Quite a number of the small telephone companies have sent representatives here who protested against the bill when it provided that the telephone companies should pay the tax; but after we changed it I think they were all satisfied with it. I do not see any reason why any further change should be made.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina to strike out the words "sender of," in line 17, page 35, and the words "the originator of," in line 18, and to insert the words "person paying for" in lieu thereof, so that it will read:

Shall collect from the person paying for the message or the conversation.

The effect of the amendment would be, in case of collect telegrams or reversed messages, for the one who paid for the message or the conversation to pay the tax. Several telephone companies in the State of Tennessee have requested me to ask that the amendment be adopted, as it will avoid a good deal of complication in bookkeeping, where one company remits a tax to the Government and the other collects the charge.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not press that amendment. It is a matter that can be adjusted in conference, if we finally find that that would be the proper way to do it, and I should not like to change the amendment at this time.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I will not insist on it, but I will ask the Senator to bear it in mind——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will do so.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. And correct it in conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 37 of the bill, lines 16 to 21, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] asks that that paragraph go over. I think that is the matter the Senator has just talked to me about, suggesting an amendment, which I told him I would like to look into a little further. I suggest that the Senator let the amendment be agreed to now, and then I will talk with him about it further. Later, if we decide to make the change he desires, it can be done, if that will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the amendment I propose is as follows: In line 16, page 37, after the word "interest," insert the words "or property," and after the word "convey," in that line, insert the words "exclusive of the value of any lien or encumbrance thereon."

I think, perhaps, it was the intention of the committee to impose a tax only on the real interest or the value of the interest conveyed. For example, if there is property the value of which is $10,000 and there is a mortgage thereon of $8,000, it is intended in case of conveyance that the grantor shall pay a tax on $2,000 only. I think that was the idea. The word "interest," however, may be used in two senses, namely, an interest after the deduction of a mortgage or other encumbrance, and any interest in either encumbered or unencumbered property, as, for example, the one-half or one-third undivided interest which one may have or own. Since I think it is the intention to tax only the real interest, words ought to be inserted which will clearly convey that idea.

I move the amendment which I have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 16, in the committee amendment, after the word "interest," it is proposed to insert the words "or property," and after the word "conveyed." in the same line, it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "exclusive of the value of any lien or encumbrance thereon."

Mr. SIMMONS. I will accept the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee has no further amendments at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proviso has not yet been agreed to. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. The proviso on the same page was passed over. On page 37, line 18, the committee proposes, after the word "cents," to insert:

Provided, That nothing contained in this paragraph shall be so construed as to impose a tax upon any instrument or writing given to secure a debt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a few minutes ago the Senate adopted section 3, relating to the tax on wines. I therefore send to the desk an amendment which I propose as a separate section, to come in immediately following the wine section, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill a new section, to follow the section offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and adopted, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all the provisions of the preceding section, except those relating to the amount and method of collecting the taxes herein named, shall continue in force and effect until hereafter modified or repealed; and that on and after December 31, 1915, there shall be levied and assessed against every maker of sweet wines and collected monthly a charge of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him in the fortification of sweet wines during the preceding month in lieu of the charge of 3 cents levied and assessed therefor under section 3 of an act entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines," approved June 7, 1906.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on yesterday the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] offered the wine amendment and explained its provisions. Briefly stated, the amendment provides a flat tax of 8 cents per gallon on all still wines. That means dry and sweet wines alike. Under the present fortifying act there is a tax of 3 cents per gallon on grape brandy or wine spirits, which is used by certain favored sweet-wine producers in the fortification of their wines. Under the amendment as it has been adopted by the Senate this 3 cents per gallon on wine spirits is increased to 55 cents per gallon. Under the old fortifying act the regulations were so drawn that only certain favored wine producers could get this privilege. To illustrate, section 42 of that act provided:

That any producer of pure sweet wines who is also a distiller authorized to separate from fermented grape juice, under internal-revenue laws, wine spirits, may use free of tax the grape brandy or wine spirits.

In other words, the wine producer must also be a distiller in order to have this privilege. Every other producer of sweet wines was obliged to pay for the wine spirits, if he used them, or for a neutral spirit which was sometimes used in the fortification of sweet wines, the regular tax of $1.10 per gallon.

There was another limitation, which will be found in section 45, which further hampered all producers of sweet wines other than those who were engaged in the business in California. It read as follows:

The use of wine spirits free of tax for fortification of sweet wines under this act shall be begun and completed at the vineyard of the wine grower where the grapes are crushed and the grape juice is expressed and fermented.

It so happened that in California the stills—the wineries—are in the vineyards. East of the Rocky Mountains the wineries are usually in the towns or villages and the grapes are raised on small farms in the neighborhood; in my own State the grapes are grown on small farms, principally along Lake Erie, and are transported to the wineries in the towns and there sold.

All these limitations were of such a character as to deprive the sweet-wine producer of the use of the wine spirits free of tax. I understand that under certain decisions which have been made by the Internal Revenue Department a few of the eastern wine producers have been getting the tax-free spirits.

Perhaps I should explain what I mean by tax-free spirits. The law as adopted in 1890 provided that the wine spirits could be used free of taxes. Some years later that statute was amended so as to permit of a nominal charge of 3 cents per gallon. Now, under the amendment which was adopted by the Senate, if it should become a law, all sweet-wine producers will have an equal privilege in the use of wine spirits or grape brandy and at the same tax. That privilege is to get the grape brandy or wine spirits from the bonded warehouse at a tax of 55 cents per wine gallon. All sweet-wine producers are on the same footing.

By the terms of the pending measure it will expire by limitation on December 31, 1915. Heretofore spirituous liquors have been taxed at $1.10 per gallon. Beer has been taxed at $1 per barrel. Wine spirits or grape brandy are taxed at $1.10 per gallon, save when used by those who are specifically permitted to use it under the sweet-wine act of 1890, and no others.

Now, the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate will place a uniform tax of 55 cents per gallon upon the wine spirits; that is, such wine spirits as may be used between the time that this act shall take effect and December 31, 1915. After that, unless my amendment is adopted, wine spirits will be taxable for fortification purposes at 3 cents a gallon if it is taxed at all, and the old provisions of the act of 1890, which gave the special privilege to the sweet-wine producer of California, will automatically be reinstated.

So the effect of the amendment which has been adopted is to change the method of administration and the law in so far as it relates to the use of grape brandy or wine spirits for a period of less than 15 months; the old law will again go into operation, and the sweet-wine producers will have confronting them the same proposition that they have been contending either for or against during the past 18 or 20 years, or since the provisions of this sweet-wine act became generally known.

The effect of the amendment which I have offered is to continue a tax of 55 cents per gallon on the grape brandy or wine spirits until the provisions of this section shall be otherwise modified or repealed.

It further provides that the equal privileges to all sweet-wine producers in the amendment which has been adopted will also continue until they shall be changed by act of Congress.

I may say that this amendment as it has been adopted met the approval of the Internal Revenue Department, as well as of all the wine producers, and I understand also that the wine industry is entirely willing to have this 25-cent-per-gallon rate made permanent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the Senator determined what difference it would make in the amount of revenue to be produced under the amendment adopted and as proposed to be amended by him?

Mr. POMERENE. It will make no change in the revenue, so far as the wine is concerned, during the period ending between the taking effect of this act and its termination on December 31, 1915, but after that date the Government will get a tax at the rate of 55 cents per gallon on the grape brandy which may be thereafter used instead of 3 cents a gallon which the Government is now getting, and I am not sure but that if this bill should become a law as it now stands in the Senate the 3-cent tax will also be eliminated. I think a careful examination of section 3 of the act passed June 7, 1906, and of the amendment as adopted, will show that the 3-cent tax is entirely eliminated.

Now, Mr. President, since the passage of the act of 1890 the grape brandy which has been used, either subject to a tax of 3 cents a gallon after that was adopted or free of tax entirely, as it existed before the tax of 3 cents a gallon was adopted, would have amounted to $65,702,601.69 up until the end of the fiscal year 1912 if the full tax of $1.10 had been paid.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, there were used 4,852,872.3 gallons of grape brandy or wine spirits, which paid to the Government a tax of $145,586.21. If the sweet-wine producers who had this special privilege had paid the tax at the rate of $1.10 per gallon, they would have paid last year to the Government $5,338,159.42. All of this amount of money was given by this act in the form of a rebate to 113 wine producers, and all except, perhaps, about 20 of them were in California, and that condition of affairs has existed ever since 1890.

In view of the fact that the amendment which has already been adopted meets the approval of the Internal Revenue Department and of the wine industries themselves, I do not understand what reason can be urged for going back to the inequalities of the old law after December 31, 1915. It is true that the flat tax of 8 cents per gallon which will be paid under this amendment upon all sweet and dry wines will expire by limitation December 31, 1915; but if it is right to assess against and compel the whisky distiller to pay a tax—and it is if it is right to compel the brewer to pay a tax—it can not be wrong to compel the distiller of wine spirits or the user of wine spirits to contribute likewise to the support of the Government.

The only question, it seems to me, that is before the Senate now is whether they shall continue as a permanent statutory regulation the method of fortification which has already been approved by the Senate for the period ending December 31, 1915.

I may say that this is the only instance that has come to my knowledge where a producer has consented to have a tax assessed against him, and the only explanation I can make of it is that there is such a sentiment in favor of making the same tax of $1.10 apply that is required to be paid by other users or distillers of other intoxicating liquors.

It is a question of the Senate's adopting a permanent measure which will bring in revenue to the amount of 55 cents a gallon hereafter on wine spirits, or a tax of 3 cents a gallon. It is only a question as to whether or not we shall continue the inequitable provisions of the law of 1890 and thereby give our indorsement to that kind of special legislation or adopt a new provision, to continue until the Congress shall hereafter in its wisdom change it, which will apply equally to all wine producers.

I may say, in addition, that since the free-tax provisions of this law have been in force it has been the practice to fortify these wines up to about 22 or 23 per cent; that is, they will have, after fortification, from 22 to 23 per cent of pure alcohol, which is the equivalent of 44 to 46 per cent of proof alcohol. Under the provisions of the sweet-wine act they can be fortified up to 24 per cent. In other words, these sweet wines have about half of the alcoholic strength of whisky. The cheaper grades of them are largely used in the manufacture of patent medicines. So the patent-medicine manufacturer can place upon the market a concoction that is nearly half alcohol, and he is able to do that under the old law by simply paying 3 cents a gallon for the alcoholic content when other producers of distilled liquors pay $1.10 a gallon.

Under the amendment which I have proposed, after December 31, 1915, they will have to pay for it a tax at the rate of 55 cents per gallon, and there ought to be realized from this tax of 55 cents per gallon annually between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 to the Government.

In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, there were used for fortification purposes 4,888,445 gallons; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, 5,101,517.5 gallons; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, 6,322,303.9 gallons; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, 4,852,872.3 gallons.

It seems to me that this matter might just as well be disposed of now as to adopt these temporary regulations and compel Congress to take up this subject again during the ensuing session; in any event, before December 31, 1915.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. This entire matter was thrashed out in committee. The attempt was made before the committee to make this a permanent addition to the revenues of the country, as proposed now by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. The provision as adopted in the bill was virtually what the Senator from Ohio wanted, but we insisted that it should be like the balance of the provisions—an emergency provision for an increase of revenue, temporarily, for emergency purposes.

Mr. President, this whole bill purports to be—and, unless gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber are acting hypocrites and humbugs, it is—solely for the purpose of providing an increase to meet war emergency. Now the Senator from Ohio wants to engraft upon it a permanent increase in the revenues of the country. Permanence is the only quality in his amendment which constitutes a difference between his provision and that contained in the bill. He wants the exact provision which is in the bill made permanent—to become a part of the permanent revenue system of the country. If the provision in the bill be right and shall work well, then it will be the easiest thing in the world by a separate bill to continue it; but when it is continued some other tax upon the people ought to be taken off at the same time, unless it shall turn out that we shall have a permanent need for this additional revenue of some $5,000,000, which I do not think will be the case.

I want the Senate to understand the situation as it is. As the law now stands, grape brandy, commonly called cognac, in the words of the law called wine spirits, is taxed $1.10 a gallon, just as is whisky whenever it is used as a beverage or whenever it is used for any purpose except for fortifying sweet wines. Every country in the world that has made good wine has made that distinction in taxation of wine spirits. It is made by our law as it now is. It has resulted in our having some excellent pure and mild sweet wines. We now tax cognac grape brandy $1.10, except when it is used in fortifying sweet wine, and then it is taxed only 3 cents. The reason why it is taxed 3 cents is simply to prevent frauds upon the revenue, so that there shall be a statistical tax whereby the Internal-Revenue Department can keep run of the spirits. The reason of that is that in all countries, as I said a moment ago, this distinction has been made to encourage the fortification of wine with the distilled wine brandy instead of with cheap materials of some other sort which are deleterious to the drinker of wine, with which to fortify them—some other form of alcohol; distilled Irish potatoes, or anything else in the world.

The law as it now stands was unjust to the extent that it provided that this grape brandy could be used with a tax of 3 cents only when it was distilled upon the premises of the wine maker. As a consequence it resulted that practically the California wine men were almost the only men who could use it for fortification purposes. When other men wanted to use it for fortification purposes they had to pay $1.10 a gallon. The committee has temporarily done away with that. If it works well, in that far, at any rate, the eastern wine growers will be all right, because we do away with that provision which says it shall be distilled upon the premises of the wine grower, so that any wine grower in Ohio may use this California brandy or any other grape brandy just as cheaply as can the California wine grower.

Now here comes the proposition by which during the life of this bill or until the expiration of this bill we provide to raise that tax from 3 cents to 55 cents. We do it because temporarily we need that addition to our revenue. If this law shall turn out to be a good thing, then it will be easy enough to make it a permanent feature of our revenue system by an act of Congress, while at the same time reducing some onerous tariff tax.

I will tell you, however, why I at present do not think it would be a good thing as a permanent feature, even if this bill treated of permanent increases to the revenues. I think that putting a high tax upon cognac will make wine growers fortify their wines with other things not so pure, not so healthful—things injurious—and I am afraid that behind it all one of the objects of it all is to burden the California wine maker, who makes wine out of a genuine wine grape with sufficient sugar of its own or nearly sufficient, with this tax in order that the man who must use more sugar and does fortify his wines with these cheap deleterious alcohols shall have a better chance to compete with him.

Another reason, however, why I do not think that it is best is this: The less even of cognac or grape brandy that is taken into the stomachs of the people as a beverage the better; because, like whisky, it is too strong; there is too much alcohol in it. The more of it, however, that is used to fortify light and healthful wines—and only a very small percentage is necessary—the less of it will be used as a beverage by the people. So I doubt the wisdom of the provision as a permanent feature of our law when I take into consideration not the wishes of the wine growers but the stomachs and nerves of the people.

However, whether I be right or whether I be wrong about that, I stand upon the proposition that I do not want a single thing in this bill to be a permanent addition to the revenues of the United States Government. We do not need any permanent addition to our revenues. We put on here, for example, a tax of 5 cents additional upon this miserable rectified whisky, and yet I would not be willing, much as I am in favor of that provision, to make it even a permanent addition to the revenues of the country. Whenever we get ready to reform the revenues of the country by a permanent bill—if we shall find that we need more revenue—I should like to see that tax continued and to see it made 10 cents instead of 5 cents—but I am not willing to have this bill encumbered with any permanent features whatsoever, not even a tax on rectified whisky; I am not willing to have the enemies of the Democracy say that, under the guise of passing a bill providing for temporary increase of the revenue in order to meet emergencies, we have added so much here and so much there to the permanent revenues of the country.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, it is my purpose to detain the Senate for only a short time in the consideration of the pending measure; yet in view of much that has been said I deem it my duty not to permit the occasion to pass without submitting some reflections, for as the session now approaches its close I am fully aware that I shall not again have an opportunity to submit any remarks upon this, any kindred, or unrelated subject. In these remarks I purpose submitting I shall not enter into any of the details of this bill, as they have been fully and ably discussed by others.

In discussing the question it is not my purpose to wander afield in order to arraign the opposing political party for any carping criticisms or unjust animadversions indulged in while they have been arraigning the present administration for the conditions rendering necessary the pending legislation.

It was all right, pursuant to good party loyalty and discerning judgment, for the Republican Members, whose party was then in power, in 1898, to pass through Congress a bill for the purpose of raising revenue to carry on a war with Spain for the liberation of Cuba almost on all fours with the bill now being considered by the Senate. That no doubt was the policy to pursue. But why should the present administration be so mercilessly arraigned for pursuing the same course? Forsooth, because we are not actually engaged in war. It is not my purpose to be drawn into any discussion of the tariff at this time in order to vindicate the righteousness of this emergency revenue bill.

The other side of the Chamber contends that there should have been no necessity at this time for the pending measure, because no actual war was being waged by the United States with any country, but, on the contrary, our relations with all nations were those of profound peace.

While it is not my province to charge any insincerity to those who have so unsparingly indicted the administration for the pending measure, I wish to say there is a much stronger reason for the passage of this bill than there was the emergency revenue bill in 1898, even though no war darkens the horizon of our country now.

While the war between the United States and Spain was being waged all the channels of trade were open, even with the United States, and with all the countries of the world save that of Spain. Prosperity reigned in almost every land at that time. How about the situation now? Commercial paralysis and universal stagnation reign supreme everywhere.

Take Brazil and other countries of South America. Prosperous when we were engaged in a war with Spain, now, with their industrial channels clogged, depressed, and financially paralyzed, without adequate financial resources to carry on their accustomed and legitimate business. In the fertile valleys of the Nile similar conditions now prevail.

Turning to the Orient, view the situation in that far-off land, and we find the same financial stress prevailing there. And, indeed, in every country where civilization has planted the banner of peace our gaze is still met with financial troubles and general business disturbances, if not general industrial paralysis.

The present administration has been taken to task about the financial situation in the United States. As it has already been fully explained why dutiable articles have been kept from our shores by the unparalleled internecine struggle—the war of all the ages—now prevailing over almost the whole of Europe, I shall not pause in these brief remarks to discuss the tariff. The fact of the existence of a great war in the countries from which the United States receive the great bulk of their imports furnishes proof conclusive that this source of revenue would be materially reduced.

Now, as to our money, and especially our gold. Of course, all the countries involved in this war were seeking to unload their securities upon this country, and they wanted in payment gold.

It has been truly said, "Gold loves universal peace"; and when the lurid clouds of war darken the horizon, it vanishes to remain in hiding until the glad sun of peace sheds a halo of glory over the world. It seems to me impossible for the United States to escape the serious burden that must fall with a heavy hand upon almost every nation, and this Government, though not actively participating in the war, must bear a greater burden than when she was engaged in the War with Spain.

But in this great Chamber, perhaps one of the greatest, if not the greatest, deliberative body on earth, it has occurred to me that if the debates were less acrimonious at times, less vindictive in their character, partaking less of the nature of the hustings in heated campaigns, it would better promote the general welfare of this great Republic. I know full well that members of opposing political parties look at great public questions from different angles, thereby creating an honest difference of opinion; but when the heat of the discussion is over, let us be able to utter these beautiful thoughts:

> What, though the waters of the sullen fen may seem to pollute the snowy bosom of the swan, they fall off from her expanded wings, and pure as a spirit she rises into the heavenly ether and descends again into her own silver lake, stainless as the water lilies floating around her breast.

I wish to say, inasmuch as an amendment has been offered to this bill by my colleague designed for the relief of the farmers who raise cotton in the South, that I am greatly in sympathy with them in their dire distress; for this great industry, on account of the countries now involved in this European war consuming nearly 60 per cent of the crop produced annually in the South, is languishing to an extent not equaled since the time during the continuance of the War between the States. While I am fully persuaded that the Government should render to this distressed and sorely oppressed people such aid as can be afforded under the laws and Constitution of the United States, coming within the pale of absolute safety to the Government, I can not give my consent to the passage of the pending amendment, for it seems to me that it is a clear and palpable invasion of the reserved rights of the sovereign States. What has the General Government to do with limiting the acreage of cotton planted in the South?

What right has the United States to levy a tax on cotton produced over a certain amount, and especially when the tax so levied is not for the purpose of raising revenue to defray the expenses of administering the affairs of the Government but levied merely as a penalty? To state the proposition argues the question, and it follows as a necessary corollary that if the United States have the authority under their delegated powers to impose this tax, not even for the purpose of revenue, then the General Government has the right to exercise any and all police powers and levy any and all taxes, even to the extent of confiscation of all property rights.

In dealing with the rights reserved to the States I am reminded that among the picked intellects of this great Nation none surpassed in force and power that of John C. Calhoun, who, peering into the future of this Republic, thus stated the principle:

> There appears, indeed, to be a great and prevailing principle that tends to place the delegated powers in opposition to the delegating—the created to the creating power—reaching far beyond man and his works, up to the universal source of all power. This all-pervading principle is at war in our system—the created warring against the creating power—and unless the Government is bolted and chained down with links of adamant by the hand of the States which created it, the creature will usurp the place of the creator and universal political idolatry overspread the land.

But I shall not consume the time of the Senate by entering upon any extended argument as to the reserved rights of the States. I am persuaded, however, under our system of Government, where the creature, the agent so to speak, makes and administers the law of the General Government, the creating power being made by time and construction inferior in its legislation and administration, that the National Legislature is too prone to usurp the rights reserved to the States.

I was reminded of this when the antitrust legislation was pending before the Senate. I should prefer to remain in the doldrums, in the dead sea of trouble and inactivity, than to see the great ship of state driving ahead in the dense fog of doubt, with the frowning Scylla on the one hand or the roaring Charybdis on the other. It is better to cast anchor in the harbor of safety than be engulfed in the everwidening maelstrom that at times seems to await us, even though the immediate future may be laden with bright auspices.

I take this occasion to say, in concluding my remarks, that beyond the assumption on the part of the General Government of the reserved rights of the States that we are, in my judgment, creating by legislation too many bureaus and commissions.

If we continue in this Government to multiply bureaus and commissions, then in the not distant future every farmer as he wends his way in the early morn to break the "stubborn glebe" will take upon his back his Government employee; every hod carrier as he mounts the rungs of the ladder with his wonted load will have, too, upon his shoulders a Government employee; and every man engaged in the industrial walks of life, be he high or low, rich or poor, will go forth to his daily toil with this additional burden.

When this time comes, as surely it must if a halt is not called, we shall have a Government, a great consolidated nationality, totally at variance with the great fundamental principles that guided the fathers of this Republic in molding and shaping this beautiful fabric to serve as a model for other nations of the earth.

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Secretary has called my attention to one amendment that has not yet been adopted, which was passed over at the instance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. It is with reference to commercial brokers and commission merchants, I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9 of the bill, the committee proposes to insert:

Tenth. Commission merchants shall pay $20. Every person, firm, or company whose business or occupation it is to receive into his or its possession any goods, wares, or merchandise to sell the same on commission shall be regarded as a commission merchant: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to commission houses run upon a cooperative plan.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I stated last evening, I thought that amendment ought to be considered in connection with a provision on page 7 of the bill referring to commercial brokers.

I believe that the tax of $20 upon commercial brokers is exceedingly high in comparison with the taxes that have been imposed upon, say, customhouse brokers of only $10, and other taxes imposed upon men doing a business of a similar character.

I also desire to call attention to the fact that $20 is not the only tax that is imposed on the commercial broker. There are three other taxes in this bill that fall upon him, and would fall upon him if there had not been a tax of $20 upon him for doing business. It is impossible in his business to escape them.

The first one is the 10-cent stamp required on each and every contract which is made. The commercial broker in his dealings comes in contact with every small dealer in the country. Sometimes the sales do not amount to more than $1.50. He is in a position where he can be called upon at any time of the day for the delivery of any sort of commodity that may be asked for. Contracts are made, of course, by the brokers; but when you stop to think that a 10-cent stamp must be placed upon every contract that is made by a broker, it means that for every $1 contract that he makes there would be one-tenth of the full contract consideration taken by the imposition of this 10-cent tax.

Another thing is that he is taxed on the telegrams he sends in answer to any order that he may receive. He is also taxed upon any telephone messages that may be sent by him.

It does seem to me that this is loading a tax upon the commercial broker to a greater degree than ought to be done. I believe the average income of the commercial broker in the United States is less than $1,000. The figures so show, and many of them do not make more than $75 a month, which would be only $900 a year. I believe we could have raised revenue from a class of people that could have stood it a great deal better than the commercial brokers.

I ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he will not consent to strike out the tax on commercial brokers, because I believe he knows that the great majority of them are a class of people that do very little business and make very small incomes. You are not going to get very much revenue from this tax. It is not going to make very much difference. You have added here, on page 9, a tax of $20 on commission merchants, and I think that is proper. I am not going to object to that provision, for a commission merchant generally handles a line of goods that sell in large quantities.

Take the commission merchant who handles a packing product of one of the large concerns, or of the canning factories, or any of the thousand and one other things that are disposed of to the wholesale merchant. They deal almost always in carload lots, and they can well afford to pay a tax of $20, and no objection should be raised to it; but when it comes to a little broker, I do not believe he ought to be assessed $20, or the commission merchant should also be assessed $20.

I am not going to say anything more about it. I present the facts as they really exist, and I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will entertain a motion to strike out, on page 7, lines 11 to 17, inclusive?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I regret that I am unable to accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. This part of the bill was taken from the act of 1898. At the time that act was passed it was the opinion, I assume, of the lawmakers that it included commission merchants. Anyway, within a month after that act was passed there arose a controversy as to whether it did include commission merchants. That controversy was submitted to the decision of the law officer of the Government, and it was decided that it did not include commission merchants, so that the commission merchants paid no tax under that act.

Subsequently to that time Congress picked out a number of items in the act and repealed them, but I do not think that brokers were among those. They remained in the act until the act was repealed.

Mr. President, $20 a year is a very small tax. The brokers do not all engage in a small business, but many do. It is true of all taxes imposed in this bill that they bear a little more heavily upon some because they do very little business, but there are a great many brokers who do a very large business. Let me read to the Senator the things that a broker does, as we find it in this act:

> Every person, firm, or company whose business it is as a broker to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, produce, or merchandise, or to negotiate freights and other business for the owners of vessels, or for the shippers or consignors or consignees of freight carried by vessels, shall be regarded as a commercial broker under this act.

The field of his activities is right broad. He buys and he sells all things which are properly articles of merchandise and are upon the market for sale or purchase.

Mr. SMOOT. No; he does not buy and sell; he negotiates.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, he negotiates the sales. That is practically the same thing. He does not actually sell.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator in this connection that $20 is not the only tax that is imposed upon him. The great burden that will be imposed, particularly on the small broker—and there are a great many more of them than large brokers—is the 10-cent stamp required to be placed upon their agreements. In every transaction the broker makes where he negotiates there is an agreement, whereas if it were a sale the stamp would not have to be attached.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know that the broker would pay that?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is more likely that he would.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is more likely that he would require the person for whose benefit the sale was negotiated to pay it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the broker has not very much say so as to what the purchaser shall pay, because he is striving with all the power at his command to make the sale as against some other broker. I do not believe he can pass it on to the purchaser.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think he does pass it on, as a matter of fact. He is simply acting as an agent and receives a commission. He does not burden his commission with any charges that are properly incident to the transaction. I do not think there are many brokers in the small towns. They operate in large towns. In the small towns there is the commission merchant, not the broker. It is in the larger towns, I take it, that the brokers are engaged in this business of negotiating sales or purchases.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not only in the large towns, but in the small towns.

Mr. SIMMONS. When I say a small town, I mean a town of fifteen or twenty thousand inhabitants. I do not recall in the town in which I live, which has 15,000 or 16,000 inhabitants, that there are any commercial brokers, but there are commission merchants.

I regret very much that I can not yield to the Senator's request.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is useless to make a motion to strike out if the Senator having the bill in charge will not agree to do it. I do not want to take a minute of the time of the Senate unnecessarily, and therefore I am not even going to offer the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator I am advised that there are only about 12,000 of these commercial brokers in the country, and the amount of revenue is not great. It was only about $198,000 under the old law.

Mr. SMOOT. Twelve thousand brokers paying $20 each would be $240,000. I wish to say in this connection that of those 12,000 men 10,000 of them do not make a thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, further, that $20 may seem to be a small amount for a man to pay, but it is not a small amount for a man to pay when his salary is less than a thousand dollars, and particularly when he has to pay 1 cent on every telephone message and has to pay 1 cent upon every telegram he sends, and particularly also when he has to pay 10 cents upon every contract made. That is not the case with the commission merchant and that is not the case with merchants generally, but it is the case with the commercial broker.

I have said, Mr. President, all I care to say about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am assuming that the commercial broker will pass on the expense of telegraphing and telephoning to the extent that there are stamped instruments as evidences of transactions.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I should like to know if the chairman of the committee has considered the number of small brokers. My idea is that there are a vast number of small brokers even in the larger cities.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just stated that the number is only about 12,000.

Mr. WHITE. Would that include all?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I think the Senator has in mind commission merchants also.

Mr. WHITE. No; I have not. I am speaking now of commercial brokers. There is very much greater reason to tax commission merchants than there is to tax these commercial brokers.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. WHITE. These brokers are very small men in their affairs. Many of them do not make $300 a year. They do it possibly as a little side line to something else. There is a vast number of them, even about the larger cities, who negotiate sales. I would be very glad indeed if the chairman of the committee could see his way clear to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SIMMONS. I regret that I can not. There are some of them who do small business and others do enormous business, and we have made the tax just as low as we thought we could to tax them at all. It is the same tax that was imposed in the act of 1898, and it was not repealed until that act was repealed, although a great many items in the act were repealed between the time of its enactment and the final date of repeal. I do not think it would work any greater hardship—in fact, not so great a hardship—now as it did then. I believe it is all right.

Mr. WHITE. Another thing I should like to suggest, and that is that business of all kinds is now very much embarrassed and these brokers are doing very little business.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that account we struck out of the bill brokers altogether. We supposed that the brokers proper are not now doing any business at all.

Mr. WHITE. I think that is true, but the commission business is doing very little indeed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that, in my opinion, it would have been very much better if we had assessed the stock broker who sells stock rather than to impose a tax upon a little commercial broker, who, when times are at the very best, hardly makes a thousand dollars a year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina if all the committee amendments have been considered?

Mr. SIMMONS. All that we want at present to offer.

Mr. WEEKS. That being the case, I should like to call up an amendment I offered in behalf of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and make a very brief statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. October 8, in behalf of Mr. SHERMAN, of Illinois, on page 32 strike out lines 19 to 24, inclusive.

Mr. WEEKS. That amendment was written applying to the first draft of the bill. It should read "on page 31 strike out lines 10 to 15, inclusive." It is the same language on another page, that is all.

The SECRETARY. The lines read as follows:

> Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, any products or merchandise at any exchange, or board of trade, or other similar place, either for present or future delivery, for each $100 in value of said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 1 cent, and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 1 cent.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to read a telegram that I have here and to make a brief comment on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment again. I did not get it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the committee offered an amendment to that part of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator wait one moment, while I read the telegram? After I had offered that amendment for the Senator from Illinois I received this telegram:

CHICAGO, ILL., October 9, 1914.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The producers, grain dealers, and all others interested are indebted to you for the presentation of amendment to H. R. 18891 to eliminate the tax on products sold in the principal market places of the country, called exchanges and boards of trade. I do not believe Senators understand the discrimination which this section contains. It plainly taxes the same product sold in one place and not in another. To give you an idea of what this tax covers, would state that the receipts of grain at western primary markets to-day were nearly 4,000,000 bushels, and at the seaboard markets nearly 2,000,000 bushels. All of this grain would be taxed once and often more under the practical operation of the bill. Grain crops are big propositions; they move in large volume. It is absolutely necessary to have large, organized markets for the benefit of producers and consumers, for domestic as well as export trade. We do not believe either the Congress or the President desire to put a special and discriminative tax on foodstuffs and cotton.

C. H. CANBY,
President Board of Trade of the City of Chicago.

Mr. President, I take it the amendment which the committee has offered, which is on page 32 of the bill now under consideration, would prevent the duplication of the taxation of these products, or at least those which are intended for exportation; but it seems to me there is a point which ought to be considered, and that is whether at this time, under these conditions, it is the intention and desire of Congress to levy a tax on grain, which is not being protected by any duty and of which there are large quantities of some kinds coming into the country, and especially to levy a duty on cotton. If the cotton crop this year pays this tax, it will amount to $75,000, assuming that the price is 10 cents a pound.

I think Senators will agree with me that cotton has troubles enough at this time, and that in any case this proposition should be so modified that sales for immediate delivery should be free from this tax. It may be that sales for future delivery, which would cover the larger part of the sales, I take it, might with propriety have the tax imposed, because they would include some speculative sales, and nobody could object to sales of that kind being taxed. But it does seem to me, under these conditions, to tax cotton and to tax grain intended for immediate delivery is unwise and unsound legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it was the intention of the committee to tax the class of transactions to which the Senator refers and to which the telegram he read refers.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if this is not an exact reproduction of the clause in the Spanish War tax act?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I was going to state.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that it does not apply to a sale of present delivery, but upon the privilege of buying on one of the organized stock exchanges. That is a bucket-shop tax, and it is the only way to tax those nefarious transactions. Instead of being limited as it is, it ought to be fifty times as much.

Mr. WEEKS. That being the case, should not the wording of the provision be changed? I did not know that the Supreme Court had passed on the matter.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is Nicol against Ames, One hundred and seventy-third United States.

Mr. WEEKS. But the reading of this bill is for present and future delivery.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that that part of the bill is an exact copy of the old act. We simply brought in the language of that act. I will state further to the Senator that in 1901, within three years after the act was passed, Congress passed an act to amend it, and I think that amendment was intended to relieve any doubt about this matter.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not hear the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say this provision of the bill which the Senator from Massachusetts desires to strike out is an exact copy of the law as it was written in the act of 1898, and in 1901 Congress amended that section and the Senate committee reported an amendment covering the provision. I do not know whether the Senator from Arkansas is familiar with that or not.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am familiar with the general doctrine evolved by the amendment and the construction by the Supreme Court. There is no possibility of its applying to sales of present delivery, because they never deal in these exchanges in articles for present delivery. Those transactions take place with commission merchants.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that that was the view of the committee, and we thought that this referred to paper transactions made on the exchange.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Altogether.

Mr. SIMMONS. And not to transactions involving actual delivery.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Judge Peckham in his opinion decided that if the tax were on a present transaction accompanied by a delivery outside of the exchange it would be a direct tax and could only be sustained as a tax on the privilege of dealing on these organized exchanges.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Arkansas are much more familiar with this subject than I am. It is not one in which my constituents are directly interested in any way. I presented the amendment for the Senator from Illinois, but it did seem to me that if we are going to tax actual sales of grain and of cotton—I mean sales for delivery—in any form it was an inadvisable tax.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The objection to the tax came from the Chicago grain exchanges when it reached the Supreme Court and formed the basis of the decision to which I have referred. They are not satisfied with it out there. The bucket shops, as a general rule, do not like this tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he examine the decision to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred and see if it does not cover the case. That was our idea. We wanted to tax transactions that took place in the exchange, paper transactions which might involve future delivery where it was not likely that there would be actual delivery, but a stock-exchange transaction pure and simple.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention for a moment of the Senator from Arkansas, who is very familiar with this subject and refers to these as exchange transactions. I asked a manufacturer within a couple of days why he did not buy a year's supply of cotton at the present price, and his reply was that he would be glad to do it, but he could not buy the cotton and be sure of having delivered to him the kind of cotton he wished to use in his business. In other words, he would normally go to the exchange and buy his cotton; that he would buy cotton of a certain grade and he would be sure that the cotton would be delivered; but that now he is not buying cotton except from hand to mouth, because he can not be sure, under the present conditions, that he is going to get the cotton he needs. Would not this provision tax the kind of cotton that a manufacturer wishes to buy?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the spinner wanted actual cotton, he would not normally go to an exchange; he would abnormally go there to speculate on some feature involved in the general contract. If he wanted to buy actual cotton he would go South where it could be found and contract with some responsible dealer to furnish so many bales of a certain grade. The cotton is there and it would be delivered. If he goes to the New York Cotton Exchange, he is liable to get any one of nine grades. Of course he could not get the cotton he wants.

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the Senator if it is not true that very largely cotton manufacturers, especially in the North, buy through the exchange?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They hedge against an actual purchase of cotton. They gamble. They lose as much on one as they gain on another. This is not a purchase proposition at all. It is a hedging or insurance proposition, as they denominate it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he is sure that exchanges like the Memphis exchange are not exchanges in which they sell for immediate delivery and not at all for future delivery?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true. They really do not sell cotton at all. The brokers assemble there to get reports from the organized exchanges. The brokers who constitute the membership of the local exchange in Memphis have quantities of cotton in their possession which they sell to actual purchasers. They never make any future delivery or contract for future delivery on the Memphis board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Do they make contracts with the manufacturers for immediate delivery?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would not say about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was under the impression that they sold there?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. One can hardly call the Memphis organization an exchange, because their prices are controlled by the prices transmitted from New York, Liverpool, and New Orleans. They do not make the prices there. The brokers assemble there for the purpose of getting information directly and reliably, and go back to their offices to sell cotton, actual cotton, to purchasers on the basis fixed there.

Mr. WEEKS. I think there is an exchange in Augusta, Ga. Would a manufacturer go to that exchange now and buy cotton of the kind he wishes to use or wants?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He will find some member on that exchange who would have that particular cotton, and he would agree to sell it, and if he did not have it he could tell him the locality where he could get exactly that kind—the actual cotton.

Mr. WEEKS. To be delivered immediately or three months afterwards?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That would depend altogether on the terms of the contract.

Mr. WEEKS. Then that would be a future delivery.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not an organized cotton exchange, because there are only three such exchanges in the world—one in Liverpool, another in New York, and another in New Orleans.

Mr. WEEKS. May I call the attention of the Senator to the reading of this bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That has been construed to mean such exchanges as are governed by the rules of the principal exchanges, and it ought to be so, because they do the same business in the same way, and they ought to be put upon the same plane with reference to the penalizing provisions of the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the amendment proposed by the committee ought to be changed slightly. In the absence of the decision of the Supreme Court of the character indicated by the Senator from Arkansas, I think it would certainly cover the case he has in mind. The amendment reads this way:

> That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of products or merchandise actually delivered to, and while in vessel, boat, or car, and actually in course of transportation—

And so forth.

It has been contended that that would limit the exception to products that were sold while in vessels and boats, and probably it may be obnoxious to that objection. Suppose it was amended so as to read:

> In case of products or merchandise actually delivered or while in vessel, boat, or car, and actually in course of transportation.

It would then cover an actual delivery, and, in addition to that, it would cover a case where there was only a technical delivery while it was in course of transportation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator the committee should examine the court decision in that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to make that amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Which amendment, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment offered by the committee reads this way:

> That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of products or merchandise actually delivered to, and while in vessel, boat, or car, and actually in course of transportation.

I would suggest that the amendment might be changed so as to apply to products or merchandise actually delivered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Contemporaneously with the sale.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all right. If you will insert the words "contemporaneously with the sale," it is all right. It would not be a future speculative transaction.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the suggestion of the Senator is a good one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. Does the Senator from Massachusetts accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to make this suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts, that it may go into the RECORD: I am sure that there are strong cotton firms scattered through the South that would take the orders and fill them for any kind of cotton that manufacturers might need, although they are not conducting cotton exchanges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I will adopt the suggestion which has been made by the chairman of the committee and withdraw the amendment. I hope the committee will examine the court decision to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has called attention, so as to be sure that we are getting the legislation for which the paragraph seems to provide. With that understanding, I will withdraw the amendment which I offered in behalf of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The case is reported in One hundred and seventy-third United States Supreme Court Reports, under the name of Nicol against Ames.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment just referred to was adopted will be reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, in the committee amendment, in line 16, after the words "actually delivered," it is proposed to strike out the word "to" and the comma after that word, and the word "and," and to insert "at the time of sale or," so that if amended it will read:

> That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, in case of products or merchandise actually delivered at the time of sale or while in vessel, boat, or car—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 41 of the bill the committee last night offered an amendment, which was adopted, to the passage-ticket paragraph, so as to make it read as follows:

> Passage ticket, for each passenger, sold in the United States for passage, by any vessel to a foreign port or place, if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $3.

I heartily approve of the wording of the amendment of the paragraph, because it removes a discrimination against the American ticket agents as against the ticket agents in Canada; but I do believe that the limit of cost of the ticket should be changed if the spirit of the bill in other respects is to be maintained; in other words, a foreign third-class ticket generally costs more than $30. I think the limit ought to be $45 if the intention is to tax the steerage passenger but $1. The bill as it now stands will tax every steerage passenger under the second bracket $3. I do not believe that that was the intention. It seems to me that it ought to read: "If costing not exceeding $45, $1; costing more than $45 and not exceeding $75, $3; costing more than $75, $5." Or it might read, and be just as effective, as follows: "Steerage, third class or third cabin, $1; second class or second cabin, $3; first class or first cabin, $5." Then there would be no question as to the value of the ticket, whether it increased or decreased in price; but the passenger would pay according to the class of ticket purchased. There would be justice in that.

I do not believe that a steerage passenger ought to pay a tax equal to a second-class passenger, and in the manner in which the bill is drawn that will be the result, because the value under the first bracket is too low. I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the intention of the committee was not to make a difference between steerage passengers, second-cabin passengers, and first-cabin passengers?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that the committee had a great many representations before them, which they understood came from shipping interests, insisting that this minimum limit should be raised from $30 to $40. We considered the matter very thoroughly and decided to let the rate as fixed in the House bill remain. Thirty dollars or below $30 has been the rate heretofore. Recently they have raised that rate somewhat, as I understand; but the suggestion was made that that increase grew largely out of the great rush for tickets since the breaking out of the European war.

Mr. SMOOT. The price of the tickets was raised to $45 before the European war broke out.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was thought that was but a temporary cause, and that probably $30 or less than $30 would cover most of the steerage tickets. Most of the people who buy these tickets are Italians who come over here, work a while, make some money, and then go back home.

Mr. SMOOT. We could reach that class of people in a very much better way, it seems to me, than in this way. I thought the proper way in which to reach that class of people would be to impose a stamp tax upon all foreign money orders. Then we would reach the ones who come over here for the simple purpose of making money with no idea of remaining. As soon as they get sufficient on which to live in their home country, they take what money they have saved in this country and leave. In most instances they do not even wait until they leave, but they send the money home by foreign money orders. I thought it might be a very good way to reach that class of people by imposing a stamp tax upon foreign money orders.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would come within the purview of the decision of the Supreme Court, in which it was held that a tax of that sort would be a tax upon exports and therefore within the condemnation of the Constitution.

Mr. SMOOT. I had thought that perhaps might be the case, but in looking the matter up I can not find any decision that would apply to a foreign money order.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it would apply to a bill of exchange.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it would apply to a bill of exchange.

Mr. SIMMONS. But in what respect in principle are they different?

Mr. SMOOT. We are not now considering bills of exchange.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say frankly to the Senator from Utah that we very thoroughly considered this matter; we read a great many protests in reference to it. They came chiefly from the shipping people, as we understood from shipowners, who did not want their transportation burdened any more than possible. We felt that most of the steerage passengers, the people we have just been talking about, constituted the bulk of that class of transportation, and that most of the tickets would be within the minimum limits that we have fixed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that the question of the price of the ticket may not be considered at all; that the steerage ticket, no matter what it may cost, shall only have a tax imposed upon it of $1, the second-class ticket a tax of $3, and the first-class cabin ticket a tax of $5, I offer the following amendment: I move to strike out all of the paragraph after the word "place," on page 41, line 12, beginning with the word "if," down to and including the figures "$5," and to insert "steerage, third class or third cabin, $1; second class or second cabin, $3; first class or first cabin $5."

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator from Utah see, if he will pardon an interruption, that that would impose as high a rate upon the steerage ticket from this country to Cuba as it would upon a steerage ticket from this country to Europe or even to China?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is the case with all of such taxation. It is not a question of how far the person may travel, but it is the issuing of the ticket which is taxed. That is why it would be just and right. Everybody purchasing a ticket would be assessed the same. The same principle which the Senator from North Carolina now suggests may apply to a railroad ticket. A person has to pay the same tax upon a railroad ticket from here to Baltimore that he would have to pay on a ticket from here to San Francisco.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but we are not taxing the ticket here; we are taxing the fare.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the principle is exactly the same. I offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 41, beginning in line 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $3; costing more than $60, $5." And in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

Steerage, third class or third cabin, $1; second class or second cabin, $3; first class or first cabin, $5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to take the time of the Senate by calling for the yeas and nays on the amendment. I will be content to abide by the vote, although I think there were but 2 votes "aye" and 1 vote "no."

Mr. President, there is one other item to which I desire to call attention. The amendment offered by the committee to the House bill, on page 8, reads as follows:

Where a charge for admission is made, having a seating capacity of not more than 300, shall pay $25; having a seating capacity of more than 300 and not exceeding 600, shall pay $50; having a seating capacity exceeding 600 and not exceeding 1,000, shall pay $75; having a seating capacity of more than 1,000, shall pay $100.

I have a number of letters from members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in different parts of the country virtually recommending this amendment; but I have also received in the last few days a number of telegrams from organizations representing the moving-picture people, complaining of the scale adopted. The telegrams state that their understanding was that the scale to be approved was a tax of $10 on such exhibitions up to 1,000 seating capacity and $50 over 1,000 seating capacity.

I simply make this statement, Mr. President, because of the answers which I have made to some of the letters and telegrams I have received in the past. I believe that the committee acted upon the recommendation of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and from letters which I have seen from the vice president of that league I understand that he recommends the tax as imposed in this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall offer no amendment to the provision as it stands, and shall inform the different members of the league who have telegraphed to me yesterday and to-day that the amendment has been approved by the vice president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if his understanding is not the same as mine in respect to this matter?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator has exactly stated the facts, and the Senator has in his possession a letter addressed to me as chairman of the committee by the vice president of this league proposing this scale, and I want to say that the president—at least I understood he was the president—of this league, after the amendment had been adopted by the committee, expressed to me his gratification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have simply made the statement so that it may explain my position or explain the letters which I have written to some of the moving-picture exhibitors, and also to let them know that the telegrams which they sent to me yesterday and to-day are not in conformity with the recommendations of the vice president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and still open to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I now desire to present the amendment which I sent to the desk some time ago, providing for the insertion of six additional paragraphs in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the bill, to stand as section 26.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Georgia desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It might just as well be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Florida is ready to address the Senate, and I do not know that it is worth while to read the amendment again.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment has already been read.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has already been read.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe it has been read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been read, but not since it was formally presented.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it, that will be regarded as a reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be regarded as having been read, if there is no objection.

The amendment submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia proposes to insert at the end of the bill as a new section the following:

SEC. 26. That during the year 1915 a special excise tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected not later than December of said year, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound upon all lint cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1914: Provided, That where any such person, firm, or corporation was not engaged in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton in the year 1914, such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound on all lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced in the year 1914 on the farm or plantation operated by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1915.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for the collection of the tax herein provided for.

SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have immediately prepared bonds of the United States to the amount in face value of $250,000,000. The said bonds shall be in denominations ranging from $10 to $500, and shall be made due on or before three years from date, and bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, and shall be payable in gold.

SEC. 28. That the said bonds shall be used at their face value for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton, payments to be made in said bonds to the sellers of such cotton, and the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Agriculture are hereby constituted a board with authority to conduct such purchases and to carry out the provisions of this act in connection with the purchase, handling, and sale of said cotton

The said purchases shall be made exclusively from the producers of such cotton.

Said purchases shall be made at the price of 10 cents per pound for middling lint cotton. Other grades of cotton may be bought at prices higher or lower than 10 cents, based on the difference of their values, as the same are more or less valuable than middling cotton. The purchases shall be made in the States where the cotton is grown, and shall be prorated between the States, as far as practicable, according to the quantity of cotton grown in each State. The cotton so purchased shall be handled under the direction of the board hereinbefore provided for, and none of the same shall be disposed of earlier than January 1, 1916, unless, in the opinion of the said board, parts of said cotton are required to furnish cotton for manufacture, in which event parts of said cotton may be sold at a price of 11 cents a pound or more. During the year beginning January 1, 1916, said cotton may be sold in blocks of 100 bales or more at the market price, but not for less than the amount that it has cost, including interest on the bonds, storage, etc. On and after January 1, 1917, so much of said cotton as has not already been disposed of shall, within six months thereafter, be sold by said board. The money received from the sale of said cotton shall be kept separately in the Treasury and shall be used to pay off the bonds provided for in section 27 of this act, and whenever $5,000,000 has been accumulated from the sale of said cotton, blocks of said issue of bonds shall be called in and redeemed, and said board is given full power and authority to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the purpose of executing the provisions of this and the preceding sections.

SEC. 29. That for the year 1916 a special tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected during the months of August, September, October, November, and December, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay on all lint cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation during said year an amount equal to one-half cent per pound on such cotton, and the same shall be payable before said cotton leaves the gin house.

The taxes provided for in this section and in section 26 of this act shall be kept as a separate fund in the Treasury, and shall be used for the purpose of paying the interest on said bonds provided for in section 27 of this act and the expenses of handling said cotton provided for in section 28 of this act, and any surplus shall be used for the purpose of paying off the principal of said bonds.

SEC. 30. That after the cotton, the purchase and sale of which is provided for in sections 27 and 28 of this act, has been disposed of, it shall be the duty of the said board to prepare a statement covering the entire expenditure by the Government in connection with said transactions, including the redemption of said bonds, and if any part of said expenses has not been met under the provisions of sections 28 and 29 it shall be the duty of said board to officially report the amount remaining unpaid, and said report shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. For the year 1917, and annually thereafter, a special tax is hereby levied and shall be paid and collected during the months of August, September, October, November, and December upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay on all cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation during each of said years an amount equal to 1 cent per pound on such cotton, and the same shall be payable before said cotton leaves the gin house: Provided, however, That if the report of said board, filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shows that no amount remains unpaid, the excise tax provided for in this section shall not be collected: And provided further, That no tax shall be collected under this section except for the balance of the amount remaining unpaid as provided for in this section.

SEC. 31. That the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available under the direction of the said board, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of sections 27 and 28 of this act.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not propose to take a great while in discussing the amendment, but I feel that I should submit what is in my mind on the subject, because it is a very important matter.

Mr. President, no one can fail to realize the serious, even distressful, situation in which the cotton growers find themselves. This condition extends to merchants, factors, bankers, spinners, and manufacturers, in varying degrees.

It reaches far beyond the territory in which the cotton is grown. The wheat producers and the flour manufacturers of North Dakota, for instance, are interested because their market extends to that region. The manufacturers of farm implements and other supplies in the northern portion of the country, the wholesale merchants, the fertilizer manufacturers, the banks, and business houses generally, must feel the effects of the impending loss, or what amounts to that, of the cotton crop of 1914.

I have felt that the States could and ought to handle the situation, but they do not seem to be able to do so. Some of the Governors say they can not handle it by reason of constitutional provisions or the absence of them. I had hoped that individuals or organizations in the States would work out a plan for relief. Undoubtedly the people in some of the States can in a large measure avoid very great loss, but this only in the States producing a comparatively small quantity of the staple. The problem appears to be too great and the difficulties too extensive and the undertaking too vast for the States to successfully cope with them.

My judgment is that the States have the necessary power and authority. I question somewhat that they ever granted that power to the Federal Government. I believe in a strict construction of the Constitution. I am opposed to continual whittling away of the rights and powers of the States and the enlargement by construction and the centralizing of power in the Federal Government.

There is room for the contention that the tax proposed by this bill is a legitimate excise tax, or, at any rate, in the nature of an excise tax, and not a direct tax. It is to be laid not to raise revenue for governmental purposes, but to pay interest on a loan of credit. It is to be laid to discharge an obligation incurred in this emergency and to cancel benefits extended to the producers of cotton by the Government. Its characteristics are very similar to the levies for irrigation purposes. In these circumstances I do not believe we should go hunting for fine distinctions. Either Congress must come to the rescue of millions of the people who otherwise will be face to face with bankruptcy or there is little hope for them.

What is the situation, in a broad and general way? Last March and April this cotton crop was planted. The farmers have put their time, energies, and the labor of their employees in its making. The merchant has furnished supplies on credit where needed. The fertilizer used was bought to be paid for out of the proceeds of the crop. The banks made advances on the faith of the crop.

All the year's work, all the farmer's resources, practically, have gone into the cotton now being picked and ginned and made ready for market. Last year this crop yielded a little over $1,000,000,000. There was every reason to expect fully as much would be realized this year, and but for the disaster which has come upon the civilized world that expectation would have been a reality. It was fully warranted. Nature was kind. The seasons were favorable. The growers had worked hard, and the result of their labors and outlay in money and time and energy was a yield of some 14,000,000 bales of 500 pounds each, actually worth at least 12 cents per pound under normal conditions. That would mean $840,000,000, and the seed and by-products would have brought this yield in actual value to over a billion dollars. This is a large sum. We scarcely comprehend what it means. We get an idea by comparison. There have been about a billion minutes since the birth of Christ. This crop, therefore, would have, in the natural and orderly course of things, yielded one dollar for every minute of the Christian era.

On the 28th of July, in the afternoon—I was at the American embassy in Paris when the official announcement came from the foreign office—Austria declared war on Servia. One week before that the only sign on the horizon of any disturbance anywhere was the little excitement over the home-rule bill for Ireland. One week after that seven great European powers were in a state of war. It came like a clap from the blue. No one could have foreseen such a calamity. Least of all did we in this country have any reason to anticipate such an occurrence. It can not be fairly said that such a disaster was one of the chances the cotton growers ought to have taken into account when they were making this crop.

On the 31st of July, it seems to be established, Russia began to mobilize her army. On the 2d of August France gave her reply to Germany.

On the 4th of August England issued her notification to Germany. The world-wide war was on. Now four continents are involved; practically all the Old World is in a death struggle.

No sane man can question that such a condition is the direct cause of grievous consequences to practically all the New World. The result that followed to the cotton industry immediately was no less than a total destruction of the market for two-thirds of the 1914 crop.

In the southern portion of the United States is a strip of territory approximately 400 miles wide and 1,500 miles long that is the natural home of the sun plant—cotton. Other countries have made diligent effort to grow it successfully elsewhere. England has done her best to produce her needed supply in the Valley of the Nile. No matter how cheap labor may be there, it is impossible to successfully compete with the South on land worth from $500 to $1,000 per acre and which must yield a return on that basis of value. Egypt, South America, the West Indies, Mexico, and other portions of the earth have been looked to for development of this industry, but it has been found that the whole world must turn to this cotton belt for the material which is to clothe mankind.

It must be produced there; it ought to be produced there. It is folly to talk of ceasing to produce it there. Civilized man the world over is served by that production. It would be a calamity to the race to have its production discontinued. All laws requiring people to wear clothes would have to be repealed in that case. Temporary reduction in acreage and decrease in quantity of production must be resorted to until peace reigns again and commerce resumes her customary function and the interchange of trade is possible, credit basis established, business transactions and relations again enjoyed. This must come about before a very great while. Let us hope and do all we can to speed the day. In the meantime this extraordinary situation, growing out of conditions unprecedented in the history of the world—we owe it to the people directly concerned and we owe it to as many more indirectly concerned—we must courageously and with determination meet with all the wisdom we can command. I would rather risk making a mistake in attempting to meet it, keeping in view the absolute safety of the Government, than to do nothing.

The suggestion that wheat, the market for which has not been cut off by the war, or that copper, which is not the accumulation or product of a year's work and expenditure, are on the same footing as cotton is not sound. Naval stores and tobacco more nearly partake of like nature and occupy a similar position, though not identical in many respects. The question is, shall the people concerned in the cotton industry, in one fell swoop, by a blow out of space, delivered from the other side of the ocean, suffer a direct loss of approximately $800,000,000?

Either this crop can by our help be made to yield approaching its value of $1,000,000,000 or, if we do nothing, it must be sacrificed for something like one-fourth that sum. Should we hesitate in a situation like that to at least make the effort, and make that effort our best?

This amendment offers the most feasible and practical solution of the problem yet proposed, in my judgment, and I should feel I had failed to do all that lay in my power to relieve the distressing conditions mentioned if I did not vote for it; and my conscience as well as my inclination command me to do no less.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to introduce at this point an amendment to the amendment, in order to have it pending, and later on I shall have something to say about it.

I move to strike out from the amendment the part marked "section 26," and also the part marked "section 29" and all of section 30, beginning with the words "for the year nineteen," in line 17, down to the end of that section.

I will say that the amendment simply strikes out the tax feature of the bill. It makes that change. Everything in the bill relating to the levying of taxes on cotton would be stricken out if the amendment to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, so many different schemes have been devised to solve the cotton problem that when one is now approached by some one with a ready-made cure-it-all plan for saving the cotton situation he feels like he is being addressed by a long-haired, wild-eyed inventor who wants to tell how he has been defrauded of his patent rights on his positive discovery of perpetual motion. Hence I approach this subject, which I must necessarily view from a layman's standpoint, with the greatest possible hesitation and diffidence.

The cotton problem—for problem it is, and one yet unsolved, and upon whose proper solution depends our immediate prosperity—belongs peculiarly to the South, but now confronts the entire country, growing in magnitude and widening in scope, with all its possibilities of ruin and disaster, until it must be regarded also as international in character. In the last analysis it will be with cotton and not with gold that our debts abroad must be paid and our balances created.

Fortunately, all of us who are anxious to do our part to meet this situation can agree, first, upon the conditions which exist; second, upon the cause of these conditions; and, third, upon the inevitable effects of a continuance of the present conditions for another 60 days. Unfortunately, however, very few of us can agree upon the remedy to apply to the present distressing and tragic conditions in the cotton section of our country.

What to one man will relieve the situation immediately, bringing prosperity to the planter and those dependent upon him for commercial success, to another mind spells only greater ruin and more far-reaching disaster to all within the ever-widening ring of cotton which is daily obscuring more and more from our vision the other vast resources of this wonderful country. One man favors the United States Government lending its credit, directly or through the medium of National and State banks, to the farmer, exchanging certificates of its indebtedness to the farmer in return for warehouse certificates certifying to the storage and insurance of the overplus of the cotton crop. Another advocates the Federal Government purchasing a large proportion of the crop which can not be used during the continuance of these abnormal conditions, while still another believes the State and not the Nation should be the philanthropic purchaser that will enter the market, defy the law of supply and demand, and by the mere force of the inherent strength and power of the purchaser raise the price of cotton from the low level to which the European war has plunged it.

To the advocate of the Government lending its credit directly to the farmer or through the medium of banking associations to the cotton grower, the proposition for the Government to become the purchaser of any part of any one crop or commodity for the purpose of raising the price of that commodity is not only regarded as absurd and unsound economically but as unconstitutional.

To the advocate of the purchase of part of the crop by the National Government the scheme to lend the credit of the Government to the farmer through the medium of the issuance of currency into the hundreds of millions is regarded as an iridescent dream, which can be dismissed with the statement that the price of cotton can not be appreciated with benefit to the planter by depreciating the value of currency to the injury of the credit of the Federal Government.

While to the advocate of the State being the life-saving station, constructed in the form of a speculative and nonusing purchaser of cotton to the extent of one-half of the crop produced in each State, the plan to lend the credit of the National Government or to invoke its purchasing power is impracticable, impossible, unconstitutional, and in violation of the spirit of that amiable wraith—State rights—which still stalks abroad to terrorize with its ghostly form all progressive legislation, but which withdraws its shadowy shape as soon as it even startles, much less scares, an appropriation by the Federal Government.

Our first point of agreement is the present condition of the cotton crop and market. The estimate of the crop places it at 16,000,000 bales in the field, subject to being reduced one to two million bales—according to the pessimism or optimism of the estimator—on account of the failure to pick the crop on the part of the planter in view of the present demoralization of the market.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to insert in my remarks, without reading, a table of estimates on the present cotton crop at its value on the basis of 6 cents and 10 cents per pound, respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection the request of the Senator from Tennessee is granted.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. At the price cotton was selling on July 30 of this year, this crop, if picked as usual, would have amounted to $1,000,000,000, in round numbers. It is conservative and fair to base our calculation upon the crop picked, amounting to 15,000,000 bales. It is also fair and conservative to say that to-day there is absolutely no market, domestic or foreign, at any fixed price for any material part of this crop. All the cotton exchanges are closed, the domestic spinners are not buying, and if 100,000 bales were thrown on the market to-day and had through necessity to be absorbed it is doubtful if it would bring 3 cents a pound.

All of us are agreed that the South is in debt for this as yet unmarketable crop of cotton—the reserve city banks have loaned to the banks in the larger cities in the cotton region; the city banks have loaned to the smaller banks in the midst of the cotton-growing section; these banks in turn to the merchants; the merchants have extended credit to the planters, who in turn have made advances to the tenants. Hence all of us agree that conditions are such that for any relief to be effective it must start at the bottom of the ladder, and to be effective must therefore be afforded before the crop leaves the hands of the producer, which means that if any relief is to help the producer it must be given before December 1

Second, all of us agree as to the causes of the present condition. In normal years 40 per cent of this crop would be consumed in this country, and the remaining 60 per cent exported to foreign countries.

Stated differently, the United States would have sold approximately 9,000,000 bales of cotton abroad for at least five to six hundred million dollars, which would have constituted the largest proportion of our balance of trade.

Only 10 weeks have elapsed since this crop was estimated to be worth more than $1,000,000,000, and the only change in the domestic market has been the certainty of an increase in the supply needed for our domestic spindles. A tremendous change, however, has transpired, due to the existence of the great European war, and the percentage of our crop sold abroad will be cut more than in half, so we can not count upon selling more than 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 bales abroad, leaving an overplus of at least 5,000,000 bales of cotton which can not now be used and for which there is and can be no market under present conditions.

The increased supply of cotton which will be needed by our domestic spindles has not, however, stimulated the market. On the contrary, the domestic market is also demoralized, for no manufacturer deems it safe at this time to buy at any price, for he does not know either the value of cotton or the price at which his competitor will be able to purchase his supply.

The cause of the present condition is primarily the European war, which annihilated the market for exported cotton in one day—long after the crop was planted and the land applied to this use—thus destroying the possibility of a market of from one-third to one-half of the present crop.

This war has closed the cotton exchanges and absolutely demoralized the market, domestic as well as foreign. The domestic spinner is not buying cotton, the wholesaler dealing in cotton goods and the retailer selling cotton cloths have empty shelves and are only purchasing enough to supply to-day's needs, all actuated by the same reason—the inability to determine what the price of cotton is or is going to be. The spinner would gladly pay 12 cents for his cotton if he knew that his competitor would have to buy his cotton at this same price; but, not knowing this, the spinner fears to buy cotton even at 6 cents, lest his competitor might purchase his at 3 cents a pound.

The situation is worse to-day than it was two months or even a month ago, for it is now evident that the war is to be of a much longer duration than was at first anticipated, and the demoralization of the cotton market more complete, due to a realization of this fact and to a greater curtailment of foreign manufacture and consumption of cotton goods than was at the beginning of the war deemed possible.

All of us agree upon the conditions which exist and upon the cause of these conditions, and we further agree that the inevitable effect of a continuance of these present conditions means hardship, privation, and hard times, not only for the South but for the entire country.

Going up the ladder, if the tenant is unable to pay the farmer, the debts of the farmer to the merchant can not be paid. The merchant must obtain renewals at his home bank, and his home bank, to grant this accommodation, must secure renewals of its maturities with its city correspondent, which in turn must give a renewal obligation to its correspondent in the central reserve city instead of a draft with a bill of lading attached for cotton shipped, which would bring the gold back to this country and prevent the necessity for the existence of any "gold pool." Every one of these parties has now strained his credit and stretched it to the utmost and can not go further or even maintain his present position much longer.

All of us agree that if cotton remains this year at the low level of 6 cents, cotton for many years will remain near that low level, which does not now equal the cost of production. This means years and years of hard times for the South and all other sections of the country, since business relations and commercial pursuits are so interwoven that starvation can not rule in one section of the country and prosperity hold sway in another.

Let us view this question for a moment in its international aspect. Three million bales sold abroad at 6 cents would mean only $90,000,000 of gold from abroad, instead of $180,000,000, if it were sold at 12 cents instead of 6 cents a pound.

A surplus next year of from six to seven million bales added to this year's overplus of from five to seven million bales means a surplus of from twelve to fourteen million bales on January 1, 1916, or enough cotton to supply for one year the world, which purchases American cotton under normal conditions. When we know conditions will not one year hence be normal abroad, even if peace should be meanwhile restored, we must realize that conditions in the cotton market a year hence with such a surplus will be worse than the conditions now and this country's plight more critical and the country and its citizens less well prepared to undergo it.

If the United States should loan this year $250,000,000 to the farmer, it would then face next year the choice of lending at least $400,000,000 to the farmer until the currency of the United States would reach the level Confederate money struck at the close of the Civil War, when its purchasing power for firewood was only sufficient to enable it to be "swapped cord for cord."

If the Federal Government purchased this year 5,000,000 bales of cotton, it is my fear that next year the Government would be compelled to choose between purchasing 7,000,000 additional bales at a price again above the market and to issue more than a quarter of a billion of additional bonds of small denominations or of adding to the demoralization of the market by throwing upon it an amount of cotton that it could not absorb and which would therefore break the market, and, in consequence, entail a loss which, by the plan proposed, must be borne by cotton itself. This would mean that cotton, at the low price of 5 or 6 cents during the years of 1916, 1917, and 1918, would have to pay a tax of one-half a cent a pound.

If the States purchased this year one-half of the crop in each State, then next year, with their indebtedness multiplied tenfold, they could not purchase the overplus of next year's crop, and they would face an overwhelming loss on the cotton they would have purchased this year.

If Alabama should this year purchase 800,000 bales of cotton at 10 cents and pay for the same by issuing certificates of indebtedness exchangeable for bonds bearing 4 per cent interest to the extent of $40,000,000, then, even if conditions were absolutely normal one year from to-day, which is an impossible assumption, but next year's crop as large as this year's, Alabama would then face a great loss on cotton, to be recouped by taxing the commodity itself. And if conditions one year from to-day should be as abnormal abroad as they are to-day, as will probably be the case, with consequent increased demoralization, then Alabama would stand to lose so much upon her cotton investment as to make the tax so great upon cotton as to render the tax prohibitive of further planting. For we must not overlook the storage, the insurance, and incidental loss which must be borne by the State carrying cotton as it must by the individual carrying cotton, and we must add to the cost to the State of carrying cotton the cost of administration of this new department. If Alabama buys at 10 cents this year, then for Alabama to come out even on its purchase, so as to avoid taxing that commodity to supply any deficit, it must sell on a one-year's holding at 11 cents, on a two year's holding at 12 cents, and on a three year's holding at 13 cents.

Should Alabama in 1915 sell cotton costing it then, with carrying charges, 11 cents, and only obtain for it a price of 6 cents a pound, there would be a loss of 5 cents on 800,000 bales, and Alabama would face a loss of nearly $20,000,000, which it would require taxes of one-half cent a pound on cotton for at least five years to liquidate. If cotton brought no higher price than 5 or 6 cents, which would inevitably follow the collapse of the cotton market for the next two years, a tax of one-half cent would finally mean that Alabama's premier crop would be some commodity other than cotton, and other property would have to be found by which Alabama could pay the indebtedness caused by her speculation in this now standard commodity.

Each of these plans, as I understand them, either carries with it, or its advocates do not object to, a corollary or supplemental plan providing for a curtailment of cotton acreage.

Is a reduction short of total elimination of cotton acreage practicable? It has been possible to eliminate the entire acreage of even a standard commodity when such a drastic step was necessary to preserve that commodity and its market from ruin. It was done in the tobacco fields of Tennessee and Kentucky, is now being done in the copper regions of Montana and Arizona, and will be soon put into effect in the zinc sections of Missouri. On the other hand, reduction of acreage has been tried time and time again in the cotton States and has failed as often as tried. Moreover, even if practicable, curtailment of cotton acreage is not sufficient to meet this great crisis, for it will not prevent a violation of the inexorable and immutable law of supply and demand. Even if the cotton crop were curtailed next year to the extent of 50 per cent—which is the greatest curtailment advocated by anyone favorable to the measures discussed—it would still leave in the hands of the farmer, pledged to secure a Government loan, or in the possession of the Government or belonging to the States, from five to seven million bales of cotton, a veritable sword of Damocles hanging over the head of the cotton market—a menace that it would take years and years of low-priced cotton to remove by absorption.

In principle all of these plans are identical in that each proposes a loan of credit by the Government on a pledge of cotton by the producer. In the case of the bill advocated by the distinguished Congressman from Texas, known as the Henry bill, the cotton is only pledged, and the title, subject to redemption, remains in the farmer; and while no specific tax is laid to enable the Government or the agencies through which it deals to recoup any loss, it follows as night follows day that if there be loss—and loss there would be—it would be paid by a tax on the commodity whose attempted protection caused the loss.

The Hoke Smith amendment to the war-tax bill now pending provides for the title to the cotton purchased to pass to the Government, but it is in reality not a sale to the Government but only a pledge in the form of a conditional sale, and the loss to the conditional vendee is to be borne by the guaranteeing vendor. There is no difference in principle between A pledging his bale of cotton to B for $40 and rendering his whole estate liable for any loss occasioned by the commodity pledged selling at less than the amount of the pledge and C selling and conveying to D his bale of cotton for $40 and agreeing that a year hence this bale of cotton will sell for $40 plus carrying charges and agreeing to pay out of his general estate any loss. Neither the transaction between A and B, which is the principle of the Henry bill, nor the transaction between C and D, which constitutes the underlying principle of the Hoke Smith amendment, is a sale of cotton. In both cases it is only a loan of the credit of the Government, and the Government is to be held harmless and is to be reimbursed for any loss, in one case by implication and in the other case expressly by a tax on the very commodity for whose protection at this time the credit of the Government is to be loaned. In one case the form of the loan of credit may be currency or greenbacks, and in the other bonds, but in both cases there is no outright sale to or bona fide purchase by the Government.

The only difference between the State-purchasing plan and the other two discussed, suggested by the Senator from Alabama in his very illuminating address, is that his plan makes it the State's and not the Nation's credit which is to be loaned.

Any plan or scheme which enables the farmer, either by way of pledge or conditional sale or anything short of an outright bona fide sale to a consumer, to obtain an advance above the price fixed by the demand for consumption will, I fear, do him a positive injury, though extending a temporary relief unless it carries with it a positive and binding guaranty that there will be no overplus from next year's crop; otherwise, any kind of plan for relief would do the farmer, whom all of us desire to help, more harm than good, involving him deeper and deeper in debt and placing him next year with twice as much cotton on his hands as the market could absorb at a time when no Government, State or National, could be powerful enough to give him aid by a loan of credit.

Unless some plan is devised which absolutely guarantees a positive and material reduction of the present cotton acreage, we will find next year's crop larger than this year's crop, for the man who is rescued this year by his Government purchasing his cotton at twice the market price can not help but plant as much, if not more, acreage next year, confident that somehow or somewhere a market for his cotton will be provided. Without a guaranty that next year's crop would be equal only to the consumption during war times we could not afford on the farmer's account to permit him to carry his cotton over another year, either by a straight loan or a loan sugar-coated with all the paraphernalia of a conditional sale.

In discussing these several plans attention has been directed only to their economic phases. Even if they were sound, is any one of them practicable or workable? Can there be enacted into law any plan for lending the Government's credit, directly or through the medium of banking associations, or in the form of a conditional sale to the Government, without the plan being loaded with provisions to care for every commodity whose market has been affected by the war until Government currency or bonds would be more of a drug on the market than even cotton is to-day?

My fear is that the situation in the copper sections of Montana and Arizona must be as distressing to the Senators from Montana and Arizona as the cotton situation is to the Senators from the cotton-growing States. Five thousand copper miners are to-day walking the streets of Butte seeking employment, while 15,000 copper workers are now facing idleness in Arizona. The zinc workers in Missouri will appeal to their Senators to save them. The same would be true of naval stores in the Carolinas and in Georgia. Lumber will make its appeal, and, finally, dried apples and peaches from West Virginia will not sit by with moist eyes but dumb lips when only a sound, even though inarticulate, would touch the very human heart of their senior Senator and inspire a ringing demand for their protection.

Will not this amendment be amended and amended until our currency or bonds, secured by pledges or conditional sales of cotton, copper, zinc, naval stores, lumber, dried apples, dried peaches, fertilizer, peanuts, and every other commodity whose production has outstripped consumption become as inflated and as unmarketable as the dried peaches of West Virginia moistened by a heavy rain?

Again, even if either of the cotton relief measures could be passed by the Federal Congress without loading it to the extent of debasing our currency or bonds, could it be put in operation in time to save the farmer? And we are not seeking to legislate to make richer the speculator, but to save the farmer.

When a proposition was recently pending before this body to make State banks and trust companies eligible for membership in currency associations, so that they might obtain emergency currency, we were told by the junior Senator from Colorado, who spoke authoritatively, that it would take a year to make the plates and engrave the notes for the State banks and trust companies. If that be true, then would it not take at least several weeks, if not months, for a department not in sympathy with the plan to make the necessary plates and engrave either the currency or the bonds with which to execute either the Henry or the Hoke Smith plan?

The State-purchasing plan would cause even greater delay. Constitutional conventions would have to be called by extra sessions of the legislatures in each of the cotton-growing States, and then the work of these conventions submitted to the people of each State at special elections for ratification or rejection, and after their ratification the plans must still be placed in operation. Could this be done in time to give relief while the farmer still owns the cotton?

For one, I fear that either of the plans proposed requiring Federal legislation is impracticable and fraught with many dangers to the cotton grower, but the situation is so acute and distressing that I am willing to join in advocacy of any measure meeting the approbation of a majority of my colleagues from the cotton-growing States. Some relief must be granted at once, otherwise ruin will be almost inevitable, and unless there is a surrender of individual opinion there can be no legislation upon this subject. But any measure invoked to relieve the cotton situation, either by a pledge of cotton or the conditional sale of cotton to the National Government, must be safeguarded so that it will not bring even greater disaster or more far-reaching ruin to the cotton grower than the situation in which he finds himself to-day. We must realize that no enactment in any form which would depreciate the credit and currency of the Government could appreciate the price or value of cotton.

I believe the State-purchasing plan advocated by the distinguished Senator from Alabama is unworkable and impracticable, and that the units selected—the States—can not meet the situation, and that if the plan of conditional sales to the Government is to be adopted the Federal Government and not the State should be the unit, because the success of the plan depends primarily upon the power to enforce a curtailment of next year's crop as well as the credit of the Government, whose certificates of indebtedness are to be issued in payment of the cotton transferred to the Government.

Both the Henry bill and the Hoke Smith plan, before careful analysis, appealed strongly to me, as they promised the only possibility of relief to the cotton grower, and I shall give my support to any measure that I believe contains a possibility of relief to the farmer without carrying with it greater possibilities of ultimate injury.

My heart beats with the keenest sympathy for the farmer, for the man, who by toil produces the basis of all wealth from the soil, and witnesses each year a miracle as great as nature's metamorphosis of the seed into the product, the conversion of the raw material into the manufactured article, pouring out of the horn of plenty untold wealth into the laps of all who touch it, save alone himself. He must be content with the price which will enable him to live, to preserve sufficient credit to borrow enough to plant another crop, and to start afresh upon its journey another gift from nature, enriching all but himself. The farmer represents not only the bulwark on which the wealth of this country rests, but the bulwark upon which are builded the best citizenship and the highest ideals of government. He is progressive, democratic, and patriotic. He makes the most faithful workman, the most upright citizen, the truest representative in government, and the bravest soldier. He bears his heavy burdens with the least complaint and enjoys but the smallest benefit from the Government, which could not be maintained without his steady, unremitting, and faithful toil. His wants and needs deserve our most careful, painstaking, and unselfish consideration and labor.

To attempt to conceal the truth from him, to hold out promises of impossible performances and proffers of impracticable assistance, are both cruel to the farmer and unjust to our own conceptions of duty. Such would be unfair both to his intelligence and to his unfortunate situation to-day.

We should meet the legislative situation courageously and without equivocation, as the farmer is meeting his to-day, and tell him what aid, what assistance, can be rendered and what can not be. It would be criminal to offer any palliative or assistance at this time which would give temporary relief and in the end be only ruin, disguised and postponed. If neither of the plans which have been heretofore discussed both in and out of Congress is placed upon the pending measure in the form of an amendment, I intend to offer as an amendment to the war-tax bill the only possible solution that will remain. It may be that this solution will not be practicable, that it may be unattainable, but it will be conceded by all that if the plan can be put into execution it will bring the desired result.

The plan I intend to propose is nothing new. It contains no element of novelty. It is merely the application of the law of supply and demand. It is only bringing about the situation in the growing of cotton that obtains every day in the year whenever any other commodity except an agricultural commodity is the victim of overproduction.

It is the rule of conduct that makes successes and not failures of our manufacturers, of our railroads, of nearly every other industry. It is the sound principle which requires production not to outstrip consumption, and which, if production, either through its increase or consumption, decreases or forges ahead, bids it halt until the two are again abreast of each other.

I believe it will be conceded by everyone in or out of Congress that if it became known to-day as an incontrovertible fact that no cotton would be grown in America in the year 1915, instantly the price of cotton would advance at least to the price it was before the horizon was darkened by the great European war. It will be conceded by every fair-minded man who is familiar with the situation in the cotton industry to-day that if there were no possibility of there being a cotton crop in America in 1915, the cotton crop of this year would be equal in its gross return to the combined value of this year's crop and next year's crop if the present lamentable conditions are not corrected before December 1. It will be further conceded that it would be much more to the advantage of the cotton grower, of the merchant, of the banks, to collect from one year's crop this sum than to be able to collect it only from both this year's crop and next year's. It would be much more to the advantage of this country for it to sell 14,000,000 bales at 13 cents than 28,000,000 bales at 6½ or even as high as 8 cents. It is certain that the very day it became known that cotton would not be produced in 1915 the price of cotton would that day reach 13 cents, if not higher.

Is it not to our advantage, then, is it not wise, for us to attempt to bring about a situation which will enable us to collect from this year's crop as much as could possibly be collected from this year's crop and next year's crop combined?

But it will be said here on the floor of the Senate, as I have heard it said privately, that the failure to grow a crop in 1915 would bankrupt the South. That is answered by the statement that if this year's crop, with the guaranty of no crop next year, would be worth as much as this year's crop and next year's crop could otherwise be worth, then such a plan would not involve as great a danger of bankrupting the South as growing another crop.

Assuming the proposition, which I believe no one will attempt to controvert, that if Christmas comes without any affirmative relief of the cotton situation being provided there will be a great overproduction again next year, and that under such circumstances both this year's crop and next year's crop would only equal and not exceed in value one year's crop, we would find two great advantages to be attained through limiting, or, rather, eliminating, next year's cotton crop, namely, it would enable this year's crop to pay debts of the South and to give the South something to live on, and would double the amount of gold which we will receive from the cotton which will necessarily be exported, even under present conditions; and, secondly, it would give the South agricultural freedom by teaching it the possibility of diversified farming. Let us assume that, with the inexperience of labor, the South would not raise in 1915 crops equal in value to a normal cotton crop sold at normal prices; nevertheless, if the premise be sound that the elimination of cotton acreage in 1915 would make this year's crop equal in value to what would otherwise be the value of both this year's and next year's crop, then whatever be the value of the substitute commodities which the South would raise in 1915, such an amount would represent that much clear gain to the South.

The Department of Agriculture has suggested in departmental letters that the cotton grower can raise other commodities than cotton. Let each first raise his own garden and foodstuffs and sufficient corn to feed his own hogs and cattle, and then plant the remainder of his acreage in cereals, for, whether the war lasts throughout next year or not, this country must feed Europe and the greater part of the world next year, and the price of corn and all other cereals will be high; and while the cotton grower might not get as much for his corn as he would for his cotton crop under normal conditions, it would be much more than he could get for his cotton under the abnormal conditions which will obtain.

Let us for a moment assume the premise which I have stated, namely, that the cotton crop this year, by the elimination of cotton acreage in 1915, would be worth as much, if not more, than the cotton crop this year and next year if the acreage be not eliminated, and let us see if we can obtain this result.

The fact that innumerable attempts have been made to reduce cotton acreage, and that these attempts have been uniformly unsuccessful, can not be invoked as precedents to point to or demonstrate the impossibility of eliminating cotton acreage. Where merely reduction of acreage is sought, it is the failing of human nature for each man to expect his neighbor to make the necessary reduction in acreage, enabling him to reap the additional profits caused by the reduction in production. No crisis like the present one has ever faced the cotton growers of this country, and to say that they will not make the agreement to eliminate cotton acreage, if it be the only plan of salvation, is to offer an affront to their intelligence, or to say that they will not carry out an agreement to eliminate cotton acreage if made is to do a wanton injustice to their sense of honor. Acreage has been eliminated in the tobacco section of two States where the elimination of acreage was essential to the creation and maintenance of a living price, a price at which the commodity could be produced with profit to the producer. Mines and manufactures of all kinds and character have been shut down when overproduction threatened a living price.

If it were deemed desirable to eliminate cotton acreage for the year 1915, this could be accomplished by placing upon the pending measure an amendment requesting the President of the United States to call a cotton conference to meet early in November, for the purpose of forming a voluntary association of cotton growers to eliminate cotton acreage in 1915 and to produce other commodities, and to reenforce these articles of agreement of such voluntary association by enactments in the various States, limiting by taxation or the exercise of police power the acreage for the one year.

If such an amendment were placed on this bill carrying with it an appropriation of $1,000,000 by the Federal Government—one-third of the sum appropriated to bring back travelers from abroad—it would be but a small part of what this Government should contribute to benefit the farmers, the producers of all wealth in this their greatest crisis, and to enable the President to have a representative conference attended by representative cotton producers and to carry into effect the agreements reached at such a conference.

It could be provided that on the last day in October the cotton producers in every county where more than 1,000 bales are grown should meet and select one of their number, a bona fide planter, to attend this conference; that the State Bankers' Association in each State should select 10 delegates to the conference; that the governors and commissioners of agriculture of the States should by virtue of their office be delegates, and that the commercial bodies in the largest cities of each State should also be permitted to send delegates, so that the merchants and the banks who have assisted the grower to raise and pick the crop should also have their representatives in any conference to determine this momentous question.

Such a plan should provide also for the immediate creation of a cotton commission in which every cotton-growing State should be represented, to be appointed by the President, to take immediate charge of all plans for the convention and for putting into execution the agreements reached by the convention. The President of the United States should himself open such a conference and preside over its deliberations. Addresses should be made and advice given by the Secretaries of the Treasury and of Agriculture.

It is my conviction, deliberately reached, that if such a conference were held this conference would form an association providing for the total elimination of cotton acreage in 1915; that it would merely recognize the law of supply and demand, which can not be violated without injury to the violator, and would thus bring order out of chaos and enthrone stability where demoralization now holds sway. Such a plan, adopted solemnly by such a convention, would have behind it a force which could preserve the plan inviolate and guarantee that no grower would violate its provisions. These voluntary agreements, solemnly entered into by the growers in all parts of the country and ratified in the presence of the Chief Magistrate of the country, could be reenforced by the proper legislation in each of the States, for the delegates at such a conference would immediately upon their return to their States secure the cooperation necessary to insure speedy meeting of the State legislatures in extra session and the enactment of the necessary supplemental legislation by the several States.

Even if such a plan should not be adopted, if the conference in its wisdom should decide to ignore rather than to observe the natural law of supply and demand, whose violations have always brought ruin and disaster, though sometimes disguised and postponed, nevertheless such a conference must be productive of good.

It will be cruel, if not criminal, in this Congress if it offers no other aid to refuse to give to the cotton growers of this country the opportunity to meet in conference with each other under the guidance of the great leader of this country and to consider calmly and dispassionately the questions so vitally affecting their well-being and happiness and to determine them, if possible, in such a way as will bring prosperity and peace to this section of the country whose distress is now so great and is spreading like a consuming fire over the entire country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to strike out section 26 of the proposed amendment of the senior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think it is understood that there is not to be a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to-day. That may account for the fact that Senators are not very largely in attendance this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] expressed a desire to speak on his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS. It was understood that there was to be no vote on the amendment to-day. I should like to inquire before the motion is put for a recess what agreement has been reached as to when a vote shall be taken?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to inform the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will withdraw the motion I made. I am glad to say that it is understood that there will be a vote on it to-morrow.

Mr. KERN. We will vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; I think that is understood. As soon as we dispose of this particular cotton amendment and such other amendments as may be pending, there is no reason why there should not be a vote on the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Why can we not fix a time now for voting to-morrow?

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from North Carolina is now present. He has charge of the matter and probably will be able to make some statement to the Senate and put it in a more definite form than I am able to do it. There seems to be no one ready to proceed on the bill, and I move that its further consideration be postponed until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us wait a moment and see.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas whether it would be agreeable to take up the calendar?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly; anything is agreeable to me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We could take up the calendar for the afternoon. We have many uncontested bills on the calendar.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It may be possible that there is some one here now who desires to address himself to the pending amendment, but if there is not I will ask that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would be willing to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow provided we could have an agreement to fix a time to vote to-morrow. I understood from the Senator from Georgia that it was likely such an adjustment or arrangement might be made.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think so myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Let there be an agreement made before we lay the bill aside.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before an agreement can be made the roll will have to be called.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not ready to submit an agreement now, but I understood that probably during the day and before discussion of the amendment was concluded for the day the Senator from Georgia would be able to state when he would be willing to vote on the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a tentative suggestion that he made to me this morning.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There seems to be such a slim attendance in the Senate and no special interest being taken either in the main bill or the amendment, I thought unless something might be presented to the Senate for its consideration we might take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson	Oliver	Smoot
Bristow	Jones	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Kern	Page	Stone
Camden	Lane	Perkins	Swanson
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter	Thomas
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Shafroth	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Sheppard	Vardaman
Culberson	McCumber	Shields	Warren
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Weeks
Gore	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	West
Hollis	Norris	Smith, Mich.	White
Hughes	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask unanimous consent out of order to introduce a couple of bills by request for reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I wish to make the point of order that if there is a request for a unanimous agreement to be made, as I understand, to arrange for a vote, having called for a quorum, if we transact business we shall have to have another call of the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Missouri is right about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair would suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to withdraw his bills. Otherwise business will have transpired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It will wait until after the unanimous-consent agreement has been presented.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to request that the bills introduced by him be withdrawn temporarily.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Very cheerfully I withdraw them temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that can be done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of order that the withdrawal of the bills constitutes business as much as the introduction of the bills.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent, and I ask that it be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills will be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I propose the order which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the order proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Saturday, October 17, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and that before adjournment on that calendar day the Senate will proceed to vote on any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill itself through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina why he does not attach to this agreement the usual agreement with reference to debate——

Mr. SIMMONS. I should have liked to have done that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Giving the opportunity for amendments, giving some opportunity for debate upon them, and limiting the debate to a certain length of time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that I should have liked very much to have done that, but there was such a difference of opinion among Senators as to how long they would want to speak to-morrow that I found it somewhat impracticable to do it. I thought we might limit debate to half an hour on the part of each Senator. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Mr. WEST. Why not make it 30 minutes?

Mr. SIMMONS. I should prefer to do that, but there are some Senators who wish to speak to-morrow who have said that they could not get through in 30 minutes. Following the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, and hoping to meet the approval of the Senator from North Dakota, I will ask that debate be limited to 30 minutes upon the bill and upon any amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina, as modified?

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the proposition as now made, there would be only 30 minutes' debate allowed on the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no. There would be a debate of 30 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. THORNTON. For each Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was intending that it should apply to speeches.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not intending to limit the debate on the amendments. I thought the Secretary would fill up the agreement in the usual way, limiting the speeches upon amendments and the bill to 30 minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection whatever to the limitation of time on speeches.

Mr. SIMMONS. Senators might take an hour or two hours on an amendment if there were sufficient speeches to consume that length of time.

Mr. NORRIS. But if the Senator's order be agreed to, it would mean that at the end of the calendar day we should have to commence voting. Why not put in the usual provision in such requests that has proven so satisfactory, fixing a time when the order shall begin, some time to-morrow, say, at 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock; so that, if there are Senators who want to make long speeches, they may do so before that time?

Mr. SIMMONS. We have fixed the order for 11 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but if you would fix the time at 3 o'clock to-morrow, say, and let the general debate go on from 11 o'clock until 3 o'clock and then limit subsequent speeches to 15 minutes——

Mr. SIMMONS. I should have no objection to that. I should be very glad to begin the debate at, say, 3 o'clock to-morrow, and that after that time speeches be limited to 15 minutes, not more than one speech to be made on the same amendment by any one Senator.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest, if we make that change, that we make it the legislative day and not the calendar day.

Mr. SIMMONS. No. We want to vote on the bill to-morrow if it is possible; and all Senators seem to have practically agreed that we can do that.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator fix some hour at which the vote can be taken? Say 6 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would be impracticable.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the request as amended be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary has not reduced the modifications to writing, nor have they been offered in writing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have offered modifications, and I now suggest some modifications to the agreement and ask the Secretary to incorporate them in the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement as now modified will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Saturday, October 17, 1914, at 11 o'clock a m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on said day the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendments that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill itself through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition. Further, that after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. debate upon any amendment and upon the bill shall be limited to 15 minutes, and no Senator shall speak more than once upon the bill or upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as modified?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is an objection to the request. It seems to me that it is impracticable. It reads that the Senate shall vote upon the bill and all amendments before the close of the calendar day. How are you going to bring that about? There is no telling how many votes will have to be taken. There may be votes on a large number of amendments that will occupy a number of hours' time, especially if there are going to be 15-minute speeches upon amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Washington that I do not think there is the slightest doubt about our getting to a vote by 6 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I know; but I am speaking about the form of this agreement. The important thing is——

Mr. SIMMONS. The agreement is in the form of the agreements we have heretofore made for calendar days.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. According to the agreement, we have got to vote on the bill during the calendar day, and amendments will be taken up as they are presented. Practically all of the amendments, except this one, have already been acted upon and disposed of. There is but one other amendment to be acted upon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The ordinary form of agreement, so far as I have observed, is that we agree to begin to vote upon the bill and amendments at a certain time.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Washington that the agreement is in the regular form. What the Senator from Washington says is perhaps true, that it would be impossible, if discussion continued, say, within 5 minutes of 12 o'clock to-morrow night, to vote upon all the amendments and upon the bill itself; but in all the past history of the Senate, when agreements such as this have been made, the Senators themselves have honored the unanimous-consent agreement; they have always begun voting in season so that all of the amendments which were pending and the bill itself could be voted on before 12 o'clock midnight of the calendar day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me suggest to the Senator——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will make a suggestion, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in just a second to the Senator from North Dakota.

It is not a question of honoring the agreement. It is a question of knowing when to begin in order to finish within the calendar day. Under the agreement, when we start voting, how can we tell that we shall be able to finish on the calendar day? We might begin to vote 10 minutes before the close of the calendar day. Under this agreement that would be perfectly permissible.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make the suggestion—if the Senator will pardon me a moment—if it meets the approval of Senators on the other side, that the debate be closed not later than 8 o'clock to-morrow evening. That would meet the point the Senator has in mind.

Mr. McCUMBER. Allow me to ask the Senator from North Carolina why he can not modify his proposition so that we shall begin voting at 3 o'clock, and then have the discussion upon the amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that the proposed agreement does read in that way.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; as I understood it, it was read simply that the 15-minute limitation was to begin at 3 o'clock. Let us have the proposed agreement again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposition as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Saturday, October 17, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill itself through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; that after the said hour of 3 o'clock p. m. no Senator shall speak more than once for a longer period than 15 minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment that may be offered thereto.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that all debate shall be closed at not later than 8 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. I will not accept that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to suggest that that might meet the situation. If the Senator from Georgia objects to it, of course I withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we can get through by that time.

Mr. SIMMONS. So do I.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I would not like to have that provision in the agreement.

Mr. JONES. I will inquire if the proposed unanimous-consent agreement carries the last provision?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina as stated by the Secretary? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor, and is entitled to state his proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. That is always in order, I think, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SIMMONS. How did the war-revenue bill get displaced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been displaced, the Chair will state. The proceedings have been by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also object.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course that will settle it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I want to present a paper for reference to the Committee on Printing, with a view to its publication as a public document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi objects. In the absence of unanimous consent, the paper can not be received.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order that that can not be done with the war-revenue measure pending as the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt that it can be done, but I am informed that the Senator from Mississippi desires to speak upon the pending bill. If that is the case, of course I will not submit the motion. My understanding was that there was no business before the Senate; that the revenue bill was to be laid aside until to-morrow morning; and I did not want to lose this afternoon; but if the Senator from Mississippi desires to speak, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I decline to be put before the country in the attitude of wanting to speak.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point that I am making is a parliamentary point; and that is, that the war-revenue bill is before the Senate, and the regular order is that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that it can be displaced by motion if the Senate so desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But the Senator from Utah withdraws his motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that I have no intention whatever of trying to put the Senator from Mississippi before the country as wanting to speak. It is a usual courtesy that has been granted on both sides whenever a Senator desires to address the Senate that nothing should be allowed to interfere with him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator from Mississippi does not desire to speak. The Senator from Mississippi wants the war-revenue measure to go on, and then, if the Senator from Mississippi speaks upon it, it will be all right.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have been misinformed. So that there may be an opportunity for any Senator to speak upon it who desires to do so, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a paper to be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi makes objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will withdraw my objection to the request made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], but I am insisting upon the fact that the regular order of business is the war-revenue measure. I do not like to have to object to the requests of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his objection to the request of the Senator from Texas; and, in the absence of objection, the paper presented by the Senator from Texas will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

EMERGENCY-REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. I desire to present for printing an amendment to be proposed as a new section to the revenue bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire whether there is any Senator who wishes to address himself to the pending bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the matter regularly before the Senate being the war-revenue measure, I want to call attention, so as to get it out of the way for to-morrow, to an amendment offered by me to-day to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. My amendment is to strike section 26 out of the Smith amendment; to strike out all of section 29; and to strike out the remainder of section 30, beginning with the language in line 17, "For the year 1917."

Mr. President, my object in offering this amendment is to strike out the tax features of this proposed cotton provision. My reasons I wish briefly to state to the Senate. I suppose the general lack of interest of the Senate this morning in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was owing to the fact that nobody expected it to pass, and for that reason Senators spoke to empty benches. I presume that a part of the reason that nobody thought it would pass, and that every Senator knew he had to address empty benches and make his speech for consumption elsewhere, grew out of the persuasion in the mind of Senators of the questionable constitutionality of the amendment itself with this cotton-tax feature in it.

Now, I want to tell why I believe that those of you who want any real relief for the South will not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia with the tax provisions in it.

Immediately after the war between the States the Congress of the United States passed a law levying a tax upon cotton. It was avowedly passed as a war tribute; it was a tribute to be levied upon the South for "rebellion," as it was called; that is, for the part which she had taken in the Civil War. It was a tax of so much per pound upon cotton, just as the tax provided in this amendment is. The fact that that tax had one object and this another has nothing to do with the question of legality. That the object of the first tax was to punish the South and the object of this tax is to help her has nothing to do with the constitutional question.

Mr. President, a very interesting case grew up out of that; interesting more to me, and perhaps to the Senator from Alabama, than to some other people, because we were personally acquainted with a great many of the parties. William M. Farrington, of Memphis, Tenn., carried that case into court by refusing to pay the internal-revenue collector in the Memphis (Tenn.) district, a man by the name of Sanders. Out of that came the case of Farrington against Sanders. That was at a time, remember, when the entire Federal judiciary, almost without exception, were South haters. I am not saying that in derogation of them at all, for it was very natural that they should have been. We had just been killing one another a little while before that. The judge in the court below held that law to be constitutional.

Now, I want to tell you the argument that was made in the case. You will not find the case published, because there never was a decision by the Supreme Court, and, therefore, of course the Supreme Court did not publish it. Whenever a case remains law by the decision of the Federal judiciary, but without the decision of the Supreme Court, it is, of course, not published in the Supreme Court Reports. After that judge had decided that case in that way, it went to the Supreme Court of the United States. Eight justices of that court heard that case. With public sentiment at that time in the condition which I have described, the avowed object of that law having been "to make rebellion odious" in the country and to make the South pay, as far as she could be made to pay, an indemnity for the expenditure which she had caused the North to make in order to overcome her in the struggle—notwithstanding all that, when that case went to the Supreme Court of the United States only four justices of the Supreme Court held that it was constitutional, and four justices of that tribunal held that it was not constitutional. These were, remember, four judges of the court of the conquering section immediately after——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will state, in a brief way, the reasoning upon which the four judges held it unconstitutional?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was just about to do that, though the reasoning is not stated by them.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When a case goes up from the lower court and the Supreme Court divides equally, then, of course, the judgment of the lower court stands, and all the Supreme Court does is to certify back the equal division of the judges and the affirmance on that ground.

The court below gave an opinion, without giving any reasons for it. You can not find the case published; but it is over here in the Congressional Library, and it is down here in the United States Supreme Court room; and I think a copy of it is also in the Senate library. It is the case, as I have said, of Farrington against Sanders.

I will now give you the argument made by those who contended that it was unconstitutional; and it is very strong, indeed, if not unanswerable, to my mind. Mind you, I am not saying that the tax is constitutional or unconstitutional; it is a mooted question, as yet undecided by the court of final resort; but I am saying that it is a tax of very questionable constitutionality, and that if the present Supreme Court should determine that it is unconstitutional, then the Smith amendment is written in water and you shall have extended to the cotton planters of the South no relief whatsoever, because the tax is indissolubly a part of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Georgia. That is not all; you will have endangered this entire bill unless you add to it a proviso saying that "if any section of this bill shall be declared unconstitutional it shall not affect the other sections thereof."

Now, I will give the reasoning of those who contended that it was unconstitutional, so that you yourself may judge of its strength. That argument was made by the firm of Wright & McKissick. I stated a moment ago that I had some personal reasons to feel interested in the case. Lewis D. McKissick, who really made the argument, had married one of my wife's sisters. I studied law in the office of Harris, McKissick & Turley, two of whom—Isham G. Harris and T. B. Turley—were afterwards Members of this Senate. This was their argument in brief: They said, in effect, "This tax is either a direct tax or it is an indirect tax." So far there is no answer to that, is there? There can be no other sort of Federal tax. They stated that if it be a direct tax, then it is violative of the Constitution in this, that it was not apportioned amongst the States. They went still further and said if Congress had tried to apportion the tax amongst the States, Congress could not, from the very nature of the case, have done so, because cotton does not grow in New Hampshire or in Maine; and the nonsense of making New Hampshire and Maine pay their proportionate part of a cotton tax would have been apparent upon the face of the paper. They argued also that it was a direct tax, because a tax on the product of the land was a tax on the land itself, and so forth. If a direct tax, it was unconstitutional, therefore, because not apportioned. Then they said, if it was an indirect tax, it was still unconstitutional because it was not uniform and it was obnoxious to that clause of the Federal Constitution which says, in reference to indirect taxes, that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

They said, moreover, that it was not intended to be uniform, but to constitute a sectional punishment, and that, moreover, it could not have been made uniform, because a tax upon cotton, which could not possibly be grown outside of 11 States of this Union, could not be made "uniform throughout the United States" by a fiat of the legislature. That which nature herself has rendered impossible law can not make a fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait one second. It is not a question as to whether you could levy a Federal tax upon a product which does not grow in one State or another, but a question of taxing a product which can not be made to grow in some States—indeed, in most of the States. Remember that distinction.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator say to the argument that, while cotton does not grow in all the States, it does grow in some 12 or 15 States, and that the rule of uniformity would apply only as to those States in which a particular product grew? If you could make it uniform as to those 11 States, would not that comply with the provision of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; because the language of the Constitution is "throughout the United States"; that is to say, in all the United States.

The exact language of the Constitution is:

> But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. BORAH. That does not change the argument a particle, to my mind. It is uniform throughout the United States; but it does not operate, by reason of nonproduction, except in some States. That, however, is not a principle which inheres in the law. That is by reason of a physical fact. It is uniform, and can be made uniform, throughout the United States, and applied to every State alike in which the product is raised.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I have listened, of course with intense interest, to the argument of the Senator. I am thoroughly in accord with the position taken by the Senator from Idaho. If the position contended for by the Senator from Mississippi is correct, the Federal Government could not levy a tax on any product if it so happened that there was a single State in the Union in which that product was not or could not be produced. If it is uniform so far as it can be produced, then it becomes uniform throughout the entire Republic; otherwise, a tax on whisky would be void if, in some particular State, there was a constitutional prohibition against its manufacture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it does not mean "forbidden by law."

Mr. CLAPP. The same thing would apply to tobacco.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it would not apply to tobacco. There is not a State in the Union which can not raise tobacco—from Florida to Maine it can be raised—and I doubt if there be one State that does not actually now raise a little of it; and it does not apply to whisky, either, because there is not a State in the Union where whisky can not be distilled, and out of products raised in the State. If the law prohibits its distillation, that is a different matter; but that is not the question; it still could be done, and is done, and we now collect taxes on whisky—not distilled, it is true, but sold in States where its sale is forbidden.

Now, just to argue ex abusa for a moment. Senators, remember while I am arguing it that I am not stating that the tax is unconstitutional. Remember that I am not taking the position that the tax is constitutional, either. I am merely attempting to make it appear, beyond all peradventure of a doubt, that it is a tax of questionable constitutionality. If others shall differ with me and deem it indisputably constitutional, my vote will give the benefit of the doubt to my constituents. But why take the risk? Why give to the southern people a relief which is questionable and possibly invalid? If you want to be right about it you do not want to run that risk.

Now, to go to the argument ex abusa: Suppose that the position taken by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] were correct, and that when the Constitution says that these indirect taxes shall be "uniform throughout the United States," it does not apply to a product upon which a tax is levied when the product can not be raised in a particular part of the United States constituting several States. Why, then, the Federal Government could make the South pay all the internal-revenue taxes of the country by simply levying them upon cane sugar, rice, cotton, pineapples, oranges, and the other things that we alone can grow. You could not make the North pay all of them, because there is not a thing that you can grow that we can not grow. There is where the former cotton tax was sectional, and that was the reason of its passage. The reason of it was to levy an indemnity upon the South under the form of law and by taxation. They could not levy an indemnity upon it in the way in which Germany levied one upon France during the Franco-Prussian War, because there was no longer any South in the political or governmental sense, and therefore they proceeded to levy it in this way. So persuasive were these arguments, whether sound or not, that four judges of the Supreme Court of the United States—the tribunal of the conquering section, anxious to pursue the conquering section's policy—decided that that tax was unconstitutional.

I say to you that if you leave this tax in this amendment, then the chances are—or the possibility is, at any rate, and I think the probability is—that you will hold out to the southern cotton farmers what will be apples to their eyes and ashes to their taste.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think you ought to give them the benefit of the doubt, even if it is doubtful.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon. That is not all of the Smith relief bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator permit me to say a word at this point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me answer that, first. The Senator says we will not even give them a chance at it. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia provides, first, for a tax in one part of it. Another part of it is that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have bonds prepared in the sum of $250,000,000. The next is that those bonds shall be used for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton; that 10 cents a pound shall be paid for that cotton when it is middling grade, and other grades of cotton——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If the Senator is simply going to read the bill, will he not permit me to say what I have in mind first?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; pardon me. In my own time I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas, and not before.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Evidently the Senator wishes to get away from the question, and he might as well kill time in that way as in any other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have told the Senator that I would yield to him as soon as I had answered his first question. If my answer is not satisfactory to the Senator it will be satisfactory to me, and that is the main thing.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I desired to make an observation at that point, because——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not yielded to the Senator from Arkansas. He knows the usages of this body as well as any man that belongs to it, and he ought to obey them.

So that the real relief to the South is contained in the issuance of the bonds, in the purchase of the cotton upon a middling basis at 10 cents per pound, and in the prorating of the amount of money to purchase cotton between the States according to their cotton production. Those are the other provisions of this Smith amendment. My amendment neither strikes them out nor touches them. To say that if I strike out the provision imposing a tax upon the cotton planter I strike out the only relief carried by the bill is to say just the opposite of what would be the case. I am striking out, or seeking to strike out, only that which will possibly render the attempted relief nugatory.

Now I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not so much a question of yielding. I just wanted to make the observation that no court has ever for a single moment paid the slightest attention to the proposition that a tax upon a product which was not raised in every State of the Union was void because it was not uniform. The principal argument made about the validity of the tax laid directly upon the cotton, eo nomine, was that it was a direct tax on the land out of which the cotton was grown, and therefore void because it was not apportioned. No lawyer of any standing ever had the temerity to go into that court and seriously contend that because a product was not raised in every State of the Union, therefore the tax was obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Such a proposition would not even rise to the dignity of a chestnut. The Senator may stress it as much as he desires, but if he wants to debate this question along the lines where the real controversy exists he will get away from that, and get away from it as completely and as quickly as he can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Arkansas, in a very dogmatic manner, says that no lawyer ever did go into court and make the argument which these very men made in this very case——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. One of them did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And which four judges of the Supreme Court out of eight must have accepted. In addition to that, suppose the Senator's position is correct; suppose the argument relied upon by the four was the one made that a tax upon cotton was a direct tax because it was a tax upon the land; then, still what I said a moment ago remains true; the tax is of questionable constitutionality.

Whether the four judges who declared that that tax was unconstitutional declared it upon the ground which the Senator from Arkansas stated, which was an argument made by counsel in that case, or declared it upon the ground which I have stated, which was also an argument made by counsel in that case, I do not know, because there is no decision of the court giving the reasons for their opinion. They merely certified back the fact that there was an equally divided court, and therefore no decision of the Supreme Court. But upon one of these two grounds four of the judges of the Supreme Court held that this tax was unconstitutional, and that at a time when everything that could hurt the South was popular in the North, with the judiciary and with everybody else.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. So, I say, this proposed tax is a tax of questionable constitutionality. If Senators want to carry to the southern planter real and undoubted relief of some sort, let them take this Smith amendment without the tax.

One word more. There is but one justification of this amendment, and that is the calamity itself. That is all. There is not a man within the sound of my voice, there is not a Senator who does not know that this is a desperate remedy for a desperate ill, and that it is a remedy that none of you would advocate for a moment in normal times. Every one of you knows that there is but one possible justification for a very bad precedent, and that is the unprecedented calamity itself.

What was the justification for taking $5,000,000 out of the United States Treasury and giving it to San Francisco at the time of the earthquake and the fire? There could have been none except simply this: "This is a case where not law but charity is called for."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I deny that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say that is the only thing in the case of San Francisco. What else does the Senator think there was?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I thought the Senator applied that remark to the cotton situation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was no justification for what occurred in the case of San Francisco, except that that was a calamity, a terrible hurt, where not law was applied for, but charity; and the ground was that while the Government of the United States is a government of limited powers, there is nothing that can keep it from putting its hands into its pockets and giving away its money, after it is once in the Treasury, whenever it chooses. Now, if the Government has a right to give away its money it has a right to lend away its money.

I have never yet seen a man who could justify upon any other constitutional ground what was done in the case of San Francisco. I have never seen one who pretended to justify on any other ground what was done in the case of the French islands at the time of the volcanic eruption. I say no man can justify this legislation except from analogous reasoning—that there is a great calamity, a desperate problem, a totally unprecedented condition, requiring a generous giving or a general lending, and that is all.

This is stronger than the San Francisco case, because the Treasury holds now $68,000,000 of our money, gotten from the old cotton tax. Give us back at least that. If that be the case, why tax the man suffering from the calamity? Every man who raises a bale of cotton will have to pay the tax, if he raises it under the conditions where any cotton is taxed. But that is not the main part of my argument. It is that if you should pass this Smith amendment I want it in such shape that no court in Christendom can question it. Now, you can issue bonds, and you can do what you please with that money. Nobody has ever undertaken to question what the Federal Government did with its money after it once got into the Treasury, provided it got out in a constitutional way—that is, by act of Congress.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to say anything about the bill, nor any of the particular features of it; but I deem the occasion an opportune one to say something about the positive and emphatic way in which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] proposes to metamorphose his want of information about these questions into the right to correct others who know something about what they are talking.

The tax laid in 1866 was in terms a direct tax on cotton. The distinction between a direct and an indirect tax, at that time and for many years subsequently thereto, was a very hazy one. The court found great difficulty in defining the proposed tax in any particular case. Proceeding upon the doctrine of logic, they could start out from one point and soon land at a point where any tax would be direct, and therefore would require apportionment according to population. The court finally committed itself to the proposition that any tax on profits directly issuing, one step removed, out of land, was a tax on land, and that any profit directly issuing out of personal property, one degree removed, such as rents or hire, was a tax on personal property, and that if direct taxes were property taxes in the strict sense of the term they must be apportioned. The court finally committed itself to that doctrine in the so-called Income Tax cases, and it has been accepted ever since. So, in order to make these taxes valid, instead of having them laid on the article itself, they lay them upon some privilege connected with it—the right to vend it, or the right to manufacture it, or to vend it in manufactured form intermediate between its production and its sale to the final consumer.

This tax, therefore, is laid upon lint cotton, which is a semi-manufactured product. Cotton as it is picked from the field is not in a condition to be immediately manufactured into yarn. It must go through a preliminary process, which is manufacturing in character, known as ginning. This tax is laid upon the production and sale of lint cotton. It brings itself directly within the terms of what are known as the oil cases, the sugar-refining cases, and cases of that character. The matter has all been beaten out to the absolute satisfaction of the court, and when they come to deal with questions of this sort now there is not any argument at all on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I am frank to say that when I first examined this matter I had very grave doubts as to the constitutionality of this amendment; but as I view it now, after having reviewed those cases to some extent, if we should take the decisions prior to the last income-tax decision, it would not be invalid, for the reason that up to that time the courts had universally held that a tax upon personal property could be laid without apportionment. If we should take the decisions since the rendition of the noted income-tax case, it would certainly come within the distinguished principles on which the sugar tax and like taxes were upheld.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And we had the doctrine of those cases in mind at the time we prepared this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. So far as I am concerned, I do not think the later decisions can be reconciled with the former decisions; but that would have no effect upon the validity of this law if the court should follow the later decisions.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; it might be upheld under either. But in none of these cases—the Oil cases, the Sugar cases, or any of the other cases—did any lawyer of any reputation stand before that court within the last 35 years and talk about a tax being invalid because it was not laid upon a product that was found in every foot of territory in the United States.

This particular tax, so far as its validity is concerned, is not doubtful. So far as its policy is concerned there may be those who would rather be regular and undertake to dispose of matters in the phraseology that obtained when people wore queues and knee breeches than to meet actual conditions in their own country to-day.

This Government was invented to meet emergencies and to deal with human problems and to deal with them as they arise. The first 30 years of the existence of this Government were devoted to the preservation of human rights and human liberty, the right of trial by jury, free speech, and things of that kind. But they passed out. We have reached the practical era of this country's history to-day, and its powers and potentialities must be meted out to those who need them and where they need them. It is always a question of judgment where the line is to be drawn.

In this particular case we say, "Here are 20,000,000 people who, upon the invitation of commerce and this country, have produced a commodity that is absolutely essential to the prosperity of this country to the amount of a billion dollars, that ramifies its industries and its commerce from one end to the other. Not because of any bad judgment of theirs, not because of anything that they could have foreseen, but by reason of a national and an international cataclysm that has involved the whole civilized world that product, now ready to go into commerce, has been arrested and stopped by conditions too large for individual effort to deal with, too large for individual financial arrangement to compass and control. They ask the right to conserve it until such time as normal conditions can be restored, when it can be turned loose on commerce and take its chances there as it intended to take them when it was produced."

We are not here as mendicants. It is an insult to the cotton raisers of the South to have the word "charity" applied to them; and I tell you so, sir. They are not asking for charity from anybody. They are as proud and self-reliant a people as God Almighty ever permitted to live on any continent that was ever created. They simply say this is their Government, and they come as self-respecting and self-relying people asking their Government to give them the machinery by which they can mobilize and control a self-supplied relief under the forms of law. They ask this great Government to lend the use of its printing presses to print $250,000,000 of bonds that they can exchange for 5,000,000 bales of cotton. For the payment of those bonds—not for their repayment, but for their payment—you have the 5,000,000 bales of cotton. If the history of commerce shall repeat itself, that fund will be ample to discharge that debt. If it shall not be, you may use the universal, irresistible, power of taxation to go down among us every year and take out an amount equal to $50,000,000 until the balance is paid.

If the cotton that is bought by the bonds shall bring only 5 cents a pound, there will be a resulting deficiency of $125,000,000. A tax of 1 cent a pound on 10,000,000 bales of cotton will yield $50,000,000 a year, and the security is just as ample as a mortgage on this building for $1,000 would be.

There is no risk about it; there is no charity about it. We are simply saying that we have been presented with a problem the colossal outlines of which the world has never known before. We ask the greatest, justest, most benevolent Government that man ever instituted for his own control to take notice of it in all of its bearings; to consider it, not as a southern nor as a sectional proposition, for that cotton to-day is an asset that belongs to the commerce of the Nation, and affects every man in it. If there were no cotton raised in Arkansas and other southern cotton States there would be more dog fennel growing in the streets of Providence, R. I., and Boston, Mass., and Salem, Mass., than there would be in Arkansas or any other Southern State. That product furnishes international commerce to cover the international balance of this country to an amount every year of more than $600,000,000, and the balance in our favor has never been $500,000,000.

I do not want any books. I have gotten beyond books. Anybody who does not know it without looking into a book does not know what is going on in the South. The Senator from Mississippi must have a very extravagant idea of his own importance as a lawyer when he undertakes to stand up here and quote old chestnuts that John A. Campbell and William L. Stuckey refused to quote before the Supreme Court 40 years ago, and undertake to say that we did not know what we were doing when we prepared that amendment. Some of us have had to make a living by working for it, and some of us have worked among the law books, and we think we know something about them. There is nothing the matter with the amendment. It is not understood. Senators on the other side of the Chamber—I have no patience with these over here—do not understand the situation. If they did, the great common sense and patriotism that have characterized their conduct in dealing with great questions of this kind are all that it would have been necessary to appeal to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber do understand the situation of the South.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure the Senator from Idaho does, because he understands nearly every question that affects human rights and human sense of justice.

Mr. BORAH. But here is the situation: A great many of us on this side of the Chamber do not believe this situation is organized for success. If we were sure that it was you would get a good deal more support over here than under the present conditions.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not quite understand the Senator, if he has in the remotest degree any intention to apply any such intimation or insinuation as that to myself and a dozen or two others that I could mention.

Mr. BORAH. No; not to the Senator from Arkansas, and not to the other Senators who are urging this amendment here; but it is no longer a secret that the administration is opposed to this amendment. Now, what is the use of appealing to the Senators on this side of the Chamber when this measure can not be put through to its finality, with this amendment in it, without the approval of the administration?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me say to the Senator from Idaho that I think he has been misinformed when he puts the sense of patriotism and the sense of justice of the President of the United States at so low a point as that. If he should prove to be half as good a prophet as he is a lawyer and a statesman, if the President of the United States should veto the bill with this provision in it, the history of this country would be written a little bit differently than would be the case had he signed it.

The people who are behind this movement are in earnest about it. It is putting to the final and supreme test the strength and ability of this Government to deal with the problems of to-day. The Government alone can deal with this question in an adequate way. The people of the South, as a part of the national toilers, must contribute something to the prosperity of this country and have enough left to support themselves in a reasonable degree of comfort. If this transaction in its outlines can not be presented to the President of the United States and the Democratic administration in such a way as to have it recognized, for the first time in the history of that great party a condition would come about that would require many who are following its banners to success, who followed them even in adversity, when they had no chance of success, to begin to inquire if the time has not come for them to see who has made the mistake—whether those who are on the side of the administration or they themselves in their party allegiance.

No; I think some one has misinformed the Senator from Idaho. I do not believe the President of the United States will veto the bill with this provision in it. I will go a little further than that and say that it would not be a good thing for him to do it; and as he is in the habit of doing good things, I am satisfied he will not do a bad thing there. He may have been, in the multiplicity of duties that have been imposed upon him since his incumbency of that great office, so engaged that he has not informed himself about the critical conditions in the South.

They are not conditions of human suffering. Take Arkansas: Arkansas has a billion dollars' worth of property within her borders, and the whole cotton crop of the State amounts to only $60,000,000. Do you suppose anybody is going to starve in a State like that? A human being never starved in the State of Arkansas, and they are not going to starve there. They do not go there to starve. That is a feature of the case I will never debate. That is an aspect upon which I will never base an appeal. The men there are able to work; they are a self-reliant, self-respecting people. But they are in a civilized Government of which they are a part. They have a right to come to their Government just as any citizen has a right to come to this Government and state a case of such character and magnitude as calls for governmental action.

Some of the Senators here, I thought, took a rather narrow and unpatriotic view in saying that other products should be favored. Whenever you get a situation of this kind involving a matter of this magnitude, one so distinctly outside of the ability of the combined individual effort to deal with successfully, then your case is made, and I am here to stay with you.

The copper business, I ought to say, is one of the minor interests of the country. It is one of the great trusts of the country. They know just exactly how much copper they have in their mines, just as a man knows how much money he has in bank, and they dig it out if they can sell it. They do not dig any more. The price is artificially stimulated. They have now all they choose to dig, and they turn their miners off and put their miners into a violent controversy with themselves, and keep them entertained otherwise. There is a completed product, and it can only produce once. It is actually lying there and must be dealt with. It is not analogous at all to this condition. The proposition the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] introduced has none of the features of this one. There is no prospect there to make up any deficiency. The copper has been bought and sold, and if a deficiency results they could levy a tax on the balance of the copper there. The Amalgamated and the other great copper companies do not borrow money on any such terms as that. This is a different case altogether. What the Senator attempted to apply was a proposition to create a new value in that respect and to still further congest the market. If the market has been oversupplied, I am amazed that something must be done with it now.

In the case of cotton, another year must ensue before another crop can be made. We have coupled with the proposition a provision to limit the output next year, so that the excessive supply this year, united with the limited supply next year, will make a sufficient supply for both years, and render the market normal and bring a price, as it ought to do, where it will sell by reason of its inherent standing in the markets of the country.

I did not intend to discuss the matter this afternoon. I may take occasion to say a few more things before the debate is closed. I only want to have it understood that the Senator from Mississippi spoke for himself and nobody else in his assault upon the legal qualifications of Senators who took it upon themselves to qualify themselves to write a provision to put in this bill, and we did not put in it something that rendered it ridiculous, as we are told to-day in the ipse dixit of the Senator from Mississippi, based upon what he thought somebody said in 1866.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am sure I am astonished, and I should imagine that even the Senator from Arkansas would be astonished, if he thought that I made any assault upon his legal qualifications. I knew there was nothing under the sun that would more easily arouse the Senator's indignation, if not his scorn, than that anybody should doubt his legal qualifications. Being such a good friend of mine, therefore, and I of his, it would be about the last thing in the world I would have thought of doing. But even Homer was known to nod at times. The Supreme Court itself, for about 100 years, decided that the income tax was constitutional, and then afterwards decided that it was not. And it did occur to my mind that it was possible—merely possible—that a legal proposition might be advocated by the Senator from Arkansas and still be questionable as to its constitutionality. Remember, I was awfully anxious not to say I thought it was unconstitutional. My main reason for saying that was that the Senator from Arkansas thought it was constitutional. If it had not been for the position of the Senator from Arkansas I might have gone further, remembering how far four judges of the Supreme Court of the United States had gone, and said I thought it was unconstitutional; but I knew that that would make the Senator from Arkansas perfectly angry, clear down to the bottom of his shoes. But I also knew more than that. I have such high respect for his real ability as a lawyer that the fact that he holds an opinion really and sincerely does make me doubt my own.

But notwithstanding the fact that I do not arrogate to myself to be a great lawyer, and never have done it, and that I have never grown impatient with a single human being who ever differed with me in a matter of legal opinion in all my lifetime; and notwithstanding the fact that the Senator from Arkansas always does, I still say that this very tax went to the Supreme Court of the United States and four justices of that court pronounced it unconstitutional.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure the Senator from Mississippi wants to be right. The fact that it went before the Supreme Court of the United States was a statute which read as follows:

There shall be paid—

This is an extract from the statute of July 13, 1866, found in Fourteenth Statutes at Large, page 98—

There shall be paid by the producer, owner, or holder upon all cotton produced within the United States, and upon which no tax has been levied, paid, or collected, a tax of 3 cents per pound, as hereinafter provided; and the weight of such cotton shall be ascertained by deducting 4 per cent for tare from the gross weight of each bale or package; and such tax shall be and remain a lien thereon, in the possession of any person whomsoever, from the time when this law takes effect, or such cotton is produced as aforesaid, until the same shall have been paid; and no drawback shall, in any case, be allowed on raw or unmanufactured cotton of any tax paid thereon when exported in the raw or unmanufactured condition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not ignorant of that case. By the way, I wish I could have gotten the case here, but the Supreme Court will not allow you to take it out, and you can not get it out of the Congressional Library. They have but a copy apiece. This particular amendment reads:

That during the year of 1915 a special excise tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected not later than December of said year, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows—

And then follows the tax—so much per pound. Now, the other or former cotton-tax bill does not say "as an excise tax to be measured" at so much per pound "shall be levied, collected, and paid," but says simply, so much per pound shall be "levied, collected, and paid" upon cotton. That is the only difference.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. One was on cotton, and the other on the production of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I say that is the only difference.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the only difference that amounts to anything. Of course, I did not mean the language of this was copied from that. Mr. President, "tweedledee" and "tweedledum" are farther apart, infinitely, than a provision which says "2 cents a pound shall be levied upon cotton" and another one which says "2 cents a pound shall be levied on it as an excise tax." If it be an excise tax, it is one, whether the bill so denominate it or not. If it be not, but be a direct tax, then it is so in spite of the language of this act.

That is all about that. But I did not rise for the purpose of arguing the matter further. I rose merely for the purpose of disclaiming all idea of putting my legal attainment, my legal opinion, my intellectual ability, or my capacity to understand a question in comparison with or in contrast with that of the Senator from Arkansas. I would as soon compare a farthing rushlight with the great sun itself. Outside of that, even if I had entertained the notion that I and my accomplishments could be upon the same plane, or near it, I love the Senator from Arkansas so much and know him so well that I would not have said it out loud, because I would know the minute I had said it he would never have been as good a friend of mine after as he had been before.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Just a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator ought not to expend all his goodness of heart on me in his very extravagant eulogy on my alleged legal ability. It would be more a tribute to my ignorance if he thought I had associated myself with great lawyers to help to prepare that amendment and then brought something in here that would have swept it aside as readily as he seems to be able to do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only said it was questionable.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Well, if you had said it was unconstitutional at all, then I would not have argued at all. I would have known then it was all right. But the very fact that the Senator injected a matter of doubt into it made it necessary for me to say something about it. I suggest to the Senator he should have spread out his goodness of heart likewise on the cotton raisers of his own State, who are now in dire need, by a recognition of this Government based upon some broader and more manly principle than charity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never said anything—but the RECORD speaks for itself, and it will speak.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will ask the Senator to yield to me for just one moment to answer the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

I want to say that so far as "expending some of my goodness of heart" upon the planters of the South and the cotton raisers of the South is concerned, nobody needs that I should profess love for them. I am one of them, and what hurts them hurts me. I want to "expend a good deal more of my goodness of heart" on them than the Senator from Arkansas does. I do not want to conjoin with the relief which we are giving them a tax upon them, especially a tax which might possibly destroy and render nugatory the whole relief scheme.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They pay their debts down there. They do not want the charity. They want to pay back all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They would have to pay it back, anyhow, without the tax. This amendment provides for paying it back. The amendment provides for a loan, not a gift.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, one unfortunate result of this encounter between my two distinguished friends is the fact that I feel compelled to add something to the discussion myself. I had not intended doing so, believing that the time thus occupied might better be used to shorten the session and enable us to secure early adjournment. But inasmuch as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has expressed impatience with this side of the Chamber because of the inability of some of us to accept the amendment, either from the standpoint of the Constitution or of sound public policy, I feel impelled to state as briefly as possible some of the reasons why I am unable to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I am sure that no Senator from a Southern State would for a moment charge me with any lack of sympathy for a condition which now unfortunately involves the people of that section. I am from the South myself. I am flesh of her flesh and bone of her bone. As a boy and a resident in that section I experienced a very considerable share of the awful sufferings and destitution caused by the war between the sections, and I have a vivid recollection of the widespread ruin which confronted the South when she surrendered to the legions of the North.

I can also sympathize with that section, Mr. President, because the section where I have resided for nearly half a century has endured the same experience, has suffered very largely from similar causes, and survived them as the South will survive her present misfortune. I can therefore appreciate more keenly than many others the situation which confronts the people of the South. To state it concretely, the South being the producer of a great staple of commerce, which constitutes as well a necessity of life not only to the people of our own but of all the nations of the world, finds herself suddenly confronted with the destruction of her principal markets, with a very large supply of material upon her hands, with the certainty of a great fall in the price of that commodity and with the consequent suffering, if not destitution, which these conditions entail.

Mr. President, the representatives of that great section of the Union in this body would be untrue to themselves and to the people whom they represent if they did not in all practicable ways seek to encompass the relief of their people; and if there ever was an instance in which the power of the General Government, if it exists, should be solicited and invoked for the purpose of bringing some relief that instance now confronts us.

But I am unable, Mr. President, in the face even of an impending calamity, which I hope will not materialize, to square my convictions of public duty with an affirmative vote upon this amendment. I am unable to conjecture what condition can arise which would justify the extension of governmental aid of a financial character for the purpose of upholding and sustaining a great business interest that would not equally apply to a small business interest; for the purpose of bringing relief to a great section because of menacing disaster through collapsing markets that will not also apply to a similar calamity circumscribed in its territorial area and confined to a few instead of a large number of people. The difference is relative and not absolute.

It is a fundamental principle in Anglo-Saxon law that the power of taxation can be exercised only for public purposes, that the exercise of that power for any other than the public purposes is tyranny, and that the tyranny which may be thus exercised is the equivalent of despotism in nearly all its forms.

Almost every great event in the history of the English race, practically every milestone along the highway of English progress from a despotic to a constitutional and popular government, has found expression in terms of resistance to the unlawful exercise and application of the taxing power; and every check and restriction of any consequence which fetters and shackles the limbs of absolute authority has been in restraint of the exercise of that power and intended to confine it to the only purpose which justifies its exercise.

Mr. President, it may be that there are precedents, and from what has been said here no doubt there are precedents which seem to justify the authority of this Government to lend its credit at a crisis in the industrial affairs of some of the people for the purpose of tiding them over it, thereby sustaining prices and meeting a serious emergency assumed to be too great for individual effort or capacity to meet. I know that many things have been done by governmental authority whose legality has not been challenged, or challenged unsuccessfully. But I am unable to accept them either as concluding the question or as applicable to the pending crisis. Ours is a government of limited powers, clearly and expressly defined; and it can not be said that the power of a government can be expanded and contracted as emergencies may require; that a government of delegated authority has no power to-day and unquestioned power next year as emergencies may determine; that a government is limited strictly to the things which are delegated to it on one occasion and free to exercise other powers not delegated to it upon other occasions. Necessity is sometimes inexorable, sometimes asserted to justify what the letter of the law prohibits.

Necessity is said to be the law of tyrants, an old aphorism which perhaps admits of no exception. Necessity is always pleaded to justify any extension, any expansion of power in disregard or in contravention of constitutional limitations. If necessity justified this proposed action, I would willingly concede its existence; but, Mr. President, the times when the limitations placed upon power should be observed are the occasions when temptation and necessity unite in demanding that they be disregarded.

Any tyro can navigate a vessel upon a smooth sea, when the clouds are absent from the sky, when the surface of the ocean is calm, and when normal conditions surround the course of the ship; but in time of stress and storm, Mr. President, with the hurricane raging across the surface of the sea and the billows mounting skyward, then every brace should be in its position, every man at his duty, an experienced captain on the bridge, with a trusted pilot at the helm. Are we not, Mr. President, encompassed by a stormy sea, and through the semipanic created by the conditions inspiring this amendment are we not urged to speedily and favorably consider a measure which in the end must spell disaster?

Mr. President, a bad precedent is one of the most dangerous things in republican government. One of the great safeguards of constitutional government consists in precedents which square with power, and which, when doubt exists, resolve the doubt against its exercise.

We have made great strides toward centralization in this country. The old notion about State rights, which confined the central power to the exercise strictly of things expressly committed to its keeping, and which insisted upon the retention and exercise by the States of all others, without interference, has been greatly weakened. It is now to be abandoned by the party whose shibboleth it has always been, which, in theory at least, has been the advocate and proponent of a strict construction of the National Constitution, and to insist upon the exercise by the separate Commonwealths of all their elements of sovereignty not delegated expressly or by necessary implication.

Mr. President, let this amendment be established, and what may we expect of it as a precedent? Disguise it as we may, this measure provides for the establishment of a partnership between the Government of the United States and the cotton growers in order to sustain the price of cotton and hold a surplus from the market for that purpose. If it is not that sort of an association, then it is one in which the Government occupies the position of an indorser or guarantor; it lends its credit, your credit and mine, the credit of all the people, to sustain an industry which is suffering from serious depression.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask a question along that line. If the Government is in the position of loaning its credit to the southern cotton raisers or to those who are interested in cotton production, is the Government, upon principle, assuming any different position than when it loans its credit to the banks of this country, as it does, unquestionably, under the Federal reserve act?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I said a few moments ago that bad precedents were dangerous things, and I am reminded by the inquiry of the Senator from Idaho of the fact that the lending of the Government's credit through the deposit of the people's money in private institutions never should have been done. I am forced to concede, inasmuch as that custom has been established, extending through a period of many years, and inasmuch as it has been frequently used in later times for the relief of the market through a distribution of moneys belonging to the Government, to the end that contraction and other bad conditions, which may lead to still worse ones, may be avoided, that it would be extremely unwise to correct it at this time. I may say, however, that inasmuch as under the new law, soon to be placed in operation, banks chartered by the Government are to become the depositaries of the public money, the objection which might otherwise exist—and which, I think, does exist—to this practice will disappear with the disappearance of the evil.

Now, Mr. President, coming back to the statement which——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator leaves that particular point, will he kindly explain to us the difference in the position of this Government when it buys a certain amount of the cotton crop, creates a monopoly, and makes a corner upon that crop for the purpose of raising its price, and the position of a certain number of Chicago wheat gamblers when they buy up and corner the market on wheat in order to raise the price? If we are going to punish individuals for creating a monopoly under the antitrust laws, why should we not punish Members of Congress for voting the Government into a monopoly?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has anticipated something to which I intended to refer later. I do not see any difference between the instances supposed, except that one is a Government monopoly and the other is a private monopoly; and if we are to have monopolies in this country, then I am certainly in favor of those which are operated by the Government and for governmental purposes rather than those which are operated by private interests for their benefit and profit.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Government enacts a law, as it did a very short time ago, which provides a penitentiary sentence for the person who creates a monopoly in the sale of any commodity, then why are we not equally guilty if we allow the Government itself to become a monopoly?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I quite agree that the Government should not establish a monopoly in anything unless it be necessary for the public welfare. I do not believe that the purpose of this measure—I know that is not the purpose of those who are championing it—is to create a monopoly, but to give needed relief in a great emergency. I am inclined to think, however, that—and that was what I intended to say later on—one of the consequences of this action will be to produce a monopoly, in that there will be an enormous corner of a certain product purchased by the Government in good faith to relieve a bad situation, a product not only always threatening the market but will be continued in the hands of the Government so long as those raising the same product feel that its sale will affect the market to their detriment; in other words, if this amendment is adopted and this investment be made, then it is my belief that by the time the bonds mature, by the time the amendment shall have operated as to time, that petitions upon petitions will come before the Congress of the United States asking for postponement of the sale of this enormous mass of cotton because of its consequences upon the then existing market. But, Mr. President, that is to some extent by way of anticipation.

I contend that there is not a product known to commerce or industry that will not have the right, using this amendment as a precedent, and that will not exercise that right, of coming to the Government of the United States for similar relief whenever in the opinion of those engaged in that industry or a part of them, such relief is necessary to steady the market and to prevent the falling of prices below the alleged cost of production.

We are entering upon a new era when this amendment becomes a law, and we are saying to those who produce copper and lead and silver and iron and coal, to those who can salmon and dry apples, to those who produce marine supplies, to those who delve in the earth or upon the earth everywhere between the two oceans, that whenever their business is bad or the value of their commodities is threatened the Government must issue bonds and invest their proceeds in certain portions of the surplus commodity at prices away above the market, and take chances, Mr. President, of getting its money back. It is the precedent of which I am afraid—and there is just as much reason for invoking it in the supposed cases as in the other.

Even now amendments are offered similar in character asking for the exercise of this governmental power in the same direction in behalf of copper and other commodities; and I want to say, Mr. President, that if there is any reason for aiding cotton now—and I concede that the exigency is great—there is in a more circumscribed area the same reason for coming to the relief of copper.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], that copper is in the ground always. It is not true that the owner knows how much he has, what the specific contents of the ore may be, or what his profits may be. It is true that he may not take it out of the ground, but it is equally true, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] here yesterday, that cotton itself is indestructible except perhaps by fire or some great cataclysm, but, generally speaking, it is indestructible. The supposed difference between the two commodities does not exist.

Mr. President, I have here a letter dated the 2d day of October, written to me by Mr. K. R. Babbitt, the general counsel for three of the largest copper companies in the country. His purpose in writing was to endeavor to secure some relief, if possible, through the agency of the State Department from the action of Great Britain which interferes with the landing of certain copper shipments at Rotterdam, which had been interfered with by the British Government. Here is what he says incidentally:

> The situation generally in the copper industry is, as you must know, acute and practically every copper-producing company has curtailed its output one-half or more. Up to the present the companies I represent have endeavored to avoid a dismissal absolutely of a large number of men by putting the entire force on one-half time, but if the present situation continues it will not be very long before a very large number of men will be thrown out of employment.
> It happens that practically every copper mine of any size is situated in localities where it is the sole basis for the industry of such communities.

I may remark here, parenthetically, Mr. President, that I know that to be true. There are a great many mining districts in the United States where copper is produced the production of which constitutes their sole industry; they produce nothing else; they are dependent, not partially, not principally, but entirely, upon copper production and upon the copper market. I refer to the letter again. The writer says:

> This is true in Butte, Mont., in Bingham, Utah, in Ray, Ariz., in Santa Rita, N. Mex., where the Chinco Copper Co. is situated. It is also true in Glove, Ariz., in Ely, Nev., and in fact everywhere, so that the question of being able to market copper assumes far-reaching proportions entirely apart from the mere decreased earnings of these companies.

With that letter as a text I can duplicate the argument of the Senator from Georgia. I can show you that this industry is intertwined with the industries of every other civilized country on the face of the globe; I can show, Mr. President, its depressed condition—that this condition is everywhere operating to the disadvantage and sometimes to the ruin of men and women in many portions of the world, and I can also demonstrate with equal truth, though not perhaps to as large an extent and as affecting so many people, that the issuance of bonds by the Government of the United States for the purchase of the surplus copper at last summer prices, followed by nonproduction next year, will be temporarily a great benefit not only to us, not only to the people in the mining camps and to the operators, but to those of the United States generally, reflecting its prosperous changed conditions upon all other industries, and also extending its benefits across the seas.

Why, then, should not the owners of copper be entitled to the same consideration that we propose to extend to the cotton growers? Why should not the producers of lumber of the Pacific coast be entitled to the same consideration? Why should not the growers of barley and of oats and of wheat all over the United States be entitled to the same relief?

Mr. President, I can remember, and I presume most of those who are present can remember also, only a few years ago, when in Kansas and in Nebraska and in some other parts of the West men were engaged in burning corn for fuel not only to decrease the supply but because it was more valuable as fuel than it was as a foodstuff. I remember when the warehouse idea was formulated by the old Populist Party, how many of my distinguished friends on this side of the Chamber derided and ridiculed and denounced that ancient demand, which called for the establishment of Government warehouses, the storage of the surplus products in the warehouses, and the issuance of warehouse receipts to circulate as currency among the people, how that was stigmatized as socialism, as idiotic, and as unthinkable, and yet it seems to me that there is nothing more startling, nothing more extreme, nothing more dangerous in that proposition than in the pending one.

I am known, Mr. President, as a man somewhat radical in my views, and I hope that the reputation which I have in that direction is well founded; but I never supposed, until the Constitution of the United States was amended, that the Government could lend its credit to private enterprise; that it could issue bonds for the purpose of raising money to aid in private enterprises or occupations, however desperate they might be or however extensive those enterprises or occupations were.

This brings me, Mr. President, to the consideration of another element of this amendment. It is designed, among other things, to levy a tax next year upon a certain amount of the surplus product of cotton, the tax being intended, of course, to limit the production next year. Mr. President, is it possible that the Congress of the United States will set the precedent of using the taxing power of the Nation in order to prohibit overproduction and to keep up prices? Is the Democratic Party going to do it? We promised the people—and I think we have endeavored to observe the pledge—to reduce the high cost of living; but how can the high cost of living be reduced by legislation which proposes to limit the production of certain necessities of life? And if we are going to do it with cotton, why should we not do it with wheat and corn and the other necessities which people must have and ought to have as cheaply as possible?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Is not that in the nature of what we have been condemning and legislating against?

Mr. THOMAS. What is that?

Mr. WARREN. The matter of the formation of trusts to hold the prices of different commodities above what they naturally would be if the circumstances surrounding them were normal.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's question is somewhat analogous to that asked by the Senator from North Dakota. Of course legislation which raises prices necessarily tends to create trust conditions, if the legislation is successful; but I do not believe such legislation can be successful.

This proposal is nothing new in political history—the attempt to legislate to limit production. It is an interference with the eternal laws of supply and demand, as exemplified and developed by human experience. You can make them temporarily successful; you can make them, perhaps, locally successful; but in the long run the laws of nature will work themselves out.

The trouble is, however, that if this amendment becomes a law, we are going to be confronted with a series of applications for similar legislation applied to nearly all the productions of man, and can not consistently refuse them. I can not get away from the conclusion that if, in a case of emergency, we are to do this thing for cotton, we must in similar cases of emergency—and there will be plenty of proof with every bill that is offered that the emergency exists—do the same thing. Why not do it for copper right now? Why not do it for canned salmon right now? Why not for lumber right now? Why not for barley right now?

No, Mr. President, the principle is wrong, and we should not be deterred from voting against it because of the emergency which has evoked the application for it.

There is another feature of the subject that I want to speak of before I take my seat, and that is its protection feature. I may have a wrong conception of what governmental protection is. We generally speak of it in connection with tariff duties; but that is only one form of a protean element which, in government, can be applied indiscriminately. I think this amendment is the legitimate offspring of that protective condition with which long, long years of Republican tariffs have finally inoculated the American people. The Government of the United States has been in copartnership with private industries for so long that American enterprise has been largely diluted, and when trouble faces the average individual he necessarily asks himself why the Government should not protect him as well as the man who manufactures something that is manufactured elsewhere. As a result, the whole political and business morality of the American people has been saturated with the pernicious taint of protectionism. The liberty which is given by the police of the great cities to those nameless vices which flourish where population is abundant, the connecting link between the criminal and the man who ought to arrest and punish him, are the outgrowth of protection, and differ only in degree and not in principle from that protection which has found expression upon the statute books of the Nation for so many years. The application here to the Government to protect a great industry at present differs, to my mind, but little from the application of import duties to any established industry which has enjoyed protection and clamors for its continuance.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator think there is quite a difference, in this respect—that the policy of protection for American industries, as we understand it on this side of the Chamber, has operated to increase the product of American industries and to make the foreigner pay for the license to come in here and do business? Now, this measure, as it appears to me—and I say this with all the sympathy that a man can have for the situation which, it seems to me, is presented—is designed to prevent the growers of cotton from growing what they naturally would grow. In other words, the effect of one is to reduce the products of this country, and the effect of the other is to increase the products of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. It is true that the form which protection takes differs in this from other instances. As to the professed policy of the Republican Party in the matter of protection, the Senator from Wyoming has correctly stated it. Without stopping to discuss its practical effect, the thought which I have in my mind is that protection in this country is bearing, among other things, its legitimate fruit, and at the same time practically doing away with State lines.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. If I believed I could vote for this measure, if I were in a position to do it, if I did do it, I should clothe myself in sackcloth and ashes and, repairing to the shrine of Nelson W. Aldrich, do penance for the criticisms which I have made of his policies and of his tariff bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator to develop a little further his idea of protection, as he has just defined it, in comparing the protection of American manufacturers with the protection of nameless vices in great cities where there is a corrupt police force. I should like to know how the Senator establishes that analogy.

A police force is established for the purpose of protection. It protects legitimate property interests and legitimate personal rights and legitimate occupations. It seems to me there is some analogy between that sort of protection, the protection of those lawful interests and enterprises, and the protection of American industry by means of a properly arranged customs tariff; but I fail to see how the Senator can compare it with the protection of unlawful acts and nameless crimes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I said, I think, that one was the inevitable outgrowth of the other. As I understand protection in the political sense it means a partnership between the Government and the thing protected; and when the city government, through the agency of the officials in these great cities, permits certain favored individuals to carry on their nefarious pursuits and rigidly applies the law to all the others, those who are permitted to violate the law with impunity and share with the authorities their ill-gotten gains are protected. At least that is my impression concerning it. It may not be correct, but it is for that reason that I made the statement that one seemed to be the inevitable outgrowth or evolution of the other. I might mention a good many other instances of protection, but I have not the time and I do not think it is necessary.

Before I take my seat I want to refer to a matter that has been mentioned in private discussion, although I am not aware that anything has been said about it upon the floor. The statement has been made that there is an analogy between this measure and the Sherman law of 1890, under which the Government of the United States undertook to purchase, and did purchase, four and a half million ounces of silver per month for the purpose of "taking up the slack," as it was called. I confess that there is an analogy, perhaps the best one that the statutes of the United States affords. There a large amount of silver was accumulated by the Government, against which certificates were issued and circulated as money. That law was not demanded or supported by the bimetallists of the West. True, they were forced to accept it as a finality, but under protest, because they knew, as we all know, that it was the direct antithesis of free coinage, and necessarily would bring the latter, through a confusion of ideas, into disgrace; and it had precisely that effect.

The law was wrong, and I believe if a test of it had ever been made it would have been found to be without the Constitution. That law, however, can not be laid to the door of the bimetallists of the West, nor the Bland bill, for that matter. I beg to assure Senators that I am not going to discuss the silver question at this time. The Bland bill was amended in this Chamber and converted into a purchase act from a free-coinage act, as it was designed. Some say that it was a very beneficial change under the circumstances. I am not going to argue that question. The principle is wrong. It did not emanate from the owners of silver mines or from the silver-producing States. It was a result of a compromise forced upon the West by the enemies of the entire project, or those who sincerely believed that the project of free coinage was fraught with danger to the country. So that while that precedent exists it was not a precedent of our making, and I therefore perceive no inconsistency whatever between the position which I occupy, as a believer in the doctrine of bimetallism, and the acts of Congress for which bimetallists were not responsible. If there is such an inconsistency, it is not more glaring than that which confronts the advocates of the amendment.

I did not intend when I took the floor to speak as long as I have spoken upon this measure. I merely desired, in view of what was stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] during the discussion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to lay before the Senate some reasons why I, among others, had incurred the impatience of my very dear friend the Senator from Arkansas.

I shall conclude what I have to say by reading into the RECORD an editorial from the New York World of yesterday:

DOCTORING COTTON.

Because the prostration of the cotton industry at the South threatens to assume the proportions of a calamity, why, in an attempt to relieve the situation, go open eyed into disaster?

The remedy proposed by southern Senators is worse than the disease which they hope to cure. To issue $250,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales, or one-third of the crop, at 10 cents a pound or less, Government to hold the cotton three years if necessary, would be the biggest legislative speculation ever undertaken.

It is easy to believe the report that even the authors of this proposition have no hope of its acceptance, and that the motive behind it is political rather than financial.

I perhaps should say that I do not indorse some of the reflections of this editorial. The sentiment, however, which has direct reference to the amendment, is well expressed, and I think unanswerable.

Nothing ever proposed by Populists, Greenbackers, or Grangers in the wildest days of inflation and paternalism can compare with this enterprise either in magnitude or in folly. As a measure to be adopted for one time only, it is a colossal charity or a gigantic gamble. As a policy to be followed in other directions, it is State socialism on a scale never before contemplated.

The St. Louis plan, which has received the indorsement of the Federal Reserve Board, is sound commercially and otherwise, because it calls into action in a proper, although an extraordinary, way the banking power of the country. It does not buy cotton at a price higher than its value in the markets. It does not foolishly by act of Congress attempt to fix the price of cotton. It simply meets an unusual situation by concentrating and extending bank credit.

If the theory underlying the new banking and currency system is based upon a true principle, why should Democrats, even cotton States Democrats, discredit it at the start?

This editorial reminds of the private plan for the relief of the cotton growers which, I think, originated with Mr. Festus J. Wade, of the Mercantile Trust Co., of St. Louis, one of the ablest and most experienced bankers of this or any other country, because it seems to me to be very largely a solution of the immediate crisis. That plan proposes to purchase and store $150,000,000 worth of cotton at what is practically, as I understand, the market price. It has not only received the approval of business men, both North and South, but it is rapidly assuming the proportions of a successful engagement. It is, of course, entirely legitimate, and in all probability will be the precursor of similar, although perhaps smaller, syndicates that will serve to turn the tide of disaster that is now threatening to overwhelm the Southern States.

In conclusion, I want to say to my southern friends——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I have just entered the Chamber. He may have covered the point I have in mind, and if he has he need not repeat it; but if not, I should like to ask him what this plan contemplates as to raising the funds with which to make this purchase. If the Senator has covered that point, he need not repeat it just for my benefit.

Mr. THOMAS. I may not be able to state the plan with exactness. My understanding of it is a general one. It contemplates the formation of a fund, to be raised by subscriptions, of $150,000,000 in gold, to be used through the agency of the Federal Reserve Board, for the purpose of purchasing cotton and holding it until a better market and a better opportunity offers to dispose of it.

Mr. THORNTON. Lending upon it.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Louisiana corrects me. It is for the purpose of lending upon the cotton at a certain price, the cotton then to be stored and held, and eventually disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It contemplates holding or loaning.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will perceive that as to the details of it I am not so well informed as I ought to have been. I should not have referred to it but for the fact that it is mentioned in this editorial.

Mr. CLAPP. It is interesting. Anything that will present a remedy here, without the Government going to the extent of the proposed amendment, is certainly interesting. What I was getting at was whether this plan had gone so far in discussion among those who are able to carry it out that there is a probability of securing this sum by subscription.

Mr. THOMAS. My understanding is that the greater part of it has been raised up to this time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I should like to say to the Senator that $50,000,000 of it was subscribed on the condition that the Federal Reserve Board would assume the management.

Mr. THOMAS. I made the statement that that condition would be placed upon it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The papers tell us this afternoon that the Federal Reserve Board decline to assume the management, and therefore the scheme will not develop.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the scheme will develop. Even if the Federal Reserve Board has refused to operate the trust—and of course I accept the statement of the Senator from Texas as correct—I know the man who is behind it. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] knows him. He is not a man who goes in an enterprise of that kind lightly, and I am just as confident that he will bring it to a successful termination as that I am speaking on this floor.

Mr. STONE. I do know Mr. Wade very well. As the Senator from Colorado says, he is one of the clearest-headed and ablest bankers in the country and in a business way one of the most progressive men I know. I have talked with him about this plan, and to-morrow, if I get an opportunity, I may have something to say about it; but I will not enter upon it at this late hour.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in conclusion to my southern friends, Senators upon this floor for whom I have the highest regard both individually and collectively, and for whose people I have profound sympathy, that, in my judgment, the clouds which lower on their horizon are not as dark as they seem.

I say this, Mr. President, because we have been through the same valley and shadow. When England closed the Indian mints in 1893 and silver dropped within a week from 90 cents to less than 70 cents per ounce, when the mines were closing throughout the West, when smelters were compelled to suspend or limit their output, and miners were compelled to seek work in foreign countries, many of them going to South Africa, others to South America and Australia, when ruin stared us directly in the face and confronted us in every direction, when every pursuit in that great section which is the metallic storehouse of the Nation was blasted and paralyzed by the blow that was struck its every interest, when men tried in vain to sell their belongings for enough to pay their debts and enable them to turn their backs upon that favored land, when eyes were turned to Washington in the hope that some substitute for the repeal of the Sherman law might be found to parry the second blow so soon to fall, when hope seemed to have departed forever and the raven croaked despair from the pedestal of every household, the end looked very near and very dark.

But, Mr. President, the indomitable and unconquerable energy of the American people always finds expression in the supreme crises of national and community life, and this instance demonstrated the truth of the assertion. After the stunning effects of the blow had passed away men began to gather their wits about them and look into the future and realize the tremendous responsibility shouldered upon them, not only on their own account but on account of their wives and their children and their Commonwealths. They took new heart because they had to, and they turned their attention in other directions, began the development of other pursuits, accepted existing conditions as unavoidable, and adapted themselves slowly and painfully, but successfully, to the repair of their fortunes and the requirements of the times. In six years——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment.

In six years, Mr. President, the ruinous effect of these terrible conditions had largely disappeared. In a dozen years they had been overcome. We discovered that ruin, although apparently upon us because of the destruction of a great industry, only served to bring out the best that was in our people by the exercise of their energy and their talent and their resources in untried directions. The Mountain States became prosperous. Her people still believe in the gold and silver money of the Constitution. Both will come in the course of years, and then the whole Nation will rejoice exceedingly.

I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that I have been advised that the press report to which I referred is incorrect, and that the Secretary of the Treasury stated to-day that the Federal Reserve Board has not declined to assume the management of this pool if it should be formed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am very glad that is the case, but I reiterate the statement that if there is anything that could operate to prevent the administration of that fund by the Federal Reserve Board I feel sure that the men at the head of it will make a success of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think that the conditions brought about in his State on account of the action of the Government in striking down silver was a great mistake, and that it would have been very much better for the country if the Government had given notice of its proposed action in order that the people might be prepared for the change that came? Would it not have mitigated the damages that were sustained by the people if the Government had done that?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, there is no doubt about the fact that if silver had not been demonetized the evil conditions to which I referred would never have come about, and that which now burdens the South would not be so severe.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Would they not have been greatly mitigated if the people had had notice that it would be done at some time in the future, so that they might have adjusted their interest?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true. The blow fell just as this did. There came without a moment's notice the closing of the Indian mints, the last refuge of free coinage in the world.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator realizes that that act was not done in the interest of the great toiling masses of the world, but that it was done in the interest of a few people who profited by it.

I agree with the Senator that if the conditions which exist in the South to-day were the result of any economical mistake or mistakes committed by the people in the management of their own affairs it would not be the proper thing for the Government to render assistance, but it came to us as a storm from a cloudless sky, and they are simply asking that they may be able to bridge this chasm, that they may be able to live until normal conditions return. It is not asking the Government to give them anything, but simply to lend its great function and its great power until they may adjust themselves to the new conditions.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I fully recognize the truth of all that the Senator has stated, not only as to the extent of the calamity which has befallen the South but also as to the suddenness with which it descended. If the Government had the authority, if it comported with the purposes for which the Government was created, if in the exercise of our power under the enumerated powers we had the right to give the relief that is here demanded, I should still hesitate to do it, as I have hitherto said, because of the certainty that the precedent thereby established would be utilized for the demanding of relief as to every industry that is pursued or that may arise in the United States.

That any box in which apples shall be packed and offered for sale in interstate or foreign commerce which does contain less than the required number of cubical inches, as prescribed in section 1 of this act, shall be plainly marked on one side and one end with the words "Short box," or with words or figures showing the fractional relation which the actual capacity of the box bears to the capacity of the box prescribed in section 1 of this act. The marking required by this paragraph shall be in block letters of the size not less than 72-point block gothic.

SEC. 3. That standard boxes marked "Standard" as hereinafter provided when packed, shipped, or delivered for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce, or which shall be sold or offered for sale within the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States of America, shall bear upon one or both ends in plain figures the number of apples contained in the box; also in plain letters the style of pack used, the name of the person, firm, company, or organization which first packed or caused the same to be packed; the name of the locality where said apples were grown; and the name of the variety of the apples contained in the box, unless the variety is not known to the packer, in which event the box shall be marked "Unknown." A variation of three apples from the number designated as being in the box shall be allowed.

SEC. 4. That the apples contained within the said standard box when so packed and offered for sale, shipment, or delivery in interstate or foreign commerce shall be well-grown specimens, of one variety, reasonably uniform in size, properly matured, practically free from dirt, insect pests, diseases, bruises, and other defects, except such as are necessarily caused in the operation of packing.

SEC. 5. That standard boxes packed in accordance with the provisions of this act may be marked "Standard."

SEC. 6. That boxes containing apples marked "Standard" shall be deemed to be misbranded within the meaning of this act—

When the size of the box does not conform to the requirements of section 1 of this act, and when the markings on the box and the contents thereof do not conform to the requirements of sections 3 and 4 of this act: Provided, however, That all shipments in boxes to foreign countries in which a standard box may have been established may be marked "For export, quality of contents equal to American standard."

SEC. 7. That any person, firm, company, or organization who shall mark or cause to be marked boxes packed with apples intended for interstate or foreign commerce, or sell, or offer for sale, shipment, or delivery, in interstate or foreign commerce, apples in boxes contrary to the provisions of this act or in violation hereof, or shall sell or offer for sale or delivery in interstate or foreign commerce in a standard box apples other than those originally packed therein without first completely obliterating the original markings and labels on such box and mark the box to conform to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty of $1 for each box so marked, sold, or offered for sale or delivery, and costs, to be recovered at the suit of the United States in any court having jurisdiction: Provided, That the penalty to be recovered on any one shipment shall not exceed the sum of $100, exclusive of costs.

SEC. 8. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1915.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there has been no recommendation or request from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures since this bill has been upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If that is true, that ends it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, this bill was called up and asked to be taken from the Speaker's table some time in the latter part of August. Objection was made at that time that the bill had not been considered by the committee, and the matter went over. The committee was then called together, and on September 1 a quorum of the committee was present and considered the Senate bill, and I was instructed, as acting chairman, to call it up. I understand, however, that since that time the bill went back to the Senate for further consideration on the part of the Senate and has since been returned to the House. If that invalidates the action of the committee, of course it will have to go back to the committee again.

The SPEAKER. How many members of the committee were present at that meeting?

Mr. ASHBROOK. A quorum.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill. Is there a similar House bill on the calendar?

Mr. ASHBROOK. There is a similar House bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Did the committee ever give any authorization to the chairman to call up this bill?

Mr. ASHBROOK. It did; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] was present when I was authorized to call it up.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, that was before the bill went back to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. What did the Senate do to the bill after it got it back?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Nothing.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, may I answer that question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. When the bill was returned to the Senate, under the rules it laid the required number of days on the Vice President's desk. Then an effort was made to reconsider, and that motion was voted down, and the bill was returned to the House in the same form in which it was originally, without any change or reconsideration whatever.

The SPEAKER. Did the bill pass both Houses?

Mr. RAKER. A similar bill, H. R. 11178, coming from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, was reported favorably to the House.

Mr. ASHBROOK. It has not been passed by the House.

Mr. RAKER. It is on the House Calendar. A similar bill was passed by the Senate and was on the Speaker's table. While that bill was on the Speaker's table the Senate asked to have the bill returned to the Senate. It was returned to the Senate, and no consideration was had so far as the bill is concerned. A motion was made to reconsider, and that motion was lost, and the bill was then returned to the House. That bill is now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair wants to find out is this: Is this the same bill that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures authorized the chairman to call up?

Mr. RAKER. It is, without one word of change.

The SPEAKER. Then the point of order made by the gentleman from Iowa is overruled.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] states that this is the same bill as the bill that is on the calendar. That statement is not exactly correct. The bills were originally the same, but the Senate has made some five amendments that are not in House bill 11178, now on our calendar.

The Senate bill 4517, which is now on the Speaker's desk, so far as the State of Colorado is concerned, is not the same bill at all. The Senate bill contains the following proviso, which is not in the House bill, namely:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the packing, shipment, or offering for sale of apples grown in the State of Colorado in boxes or containers whose dimensions do not comply with those herein above described.

Mr. RAKER. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In a moment. Now, my inquiry of the Speaker is whether or not that Senate amendment exempting the State of Colorado from the operation or requirements of this act is of sufficient difference to make it dissimilar under our rules? It seems to me that that one amendment is sufficient to prevent the consideration of this Senate bill in this way without reference to the other four amendments put into the bill by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The rule is, if they are substantially the same. Now, if these other four amendments which the Senate put in are a radical departure or a substantial departure from the House bill, the rule does not apply.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I can not say they are a radical departure. I am not insisting that the point of order is well taken. I simply want to give the facts and submit the inquiry to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Nobody ever raised that point of order. The point of order that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] raised was that the gentleman from Ohio as chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had never been authorized by the committee to call up this bill in this way.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The Chair's statement is that it never has been made.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will now make the point of order that the two bills are not the same, and that the Senate amendments are a substantial and radical departure, and that the Senate bill can not be taken from the Speaker's desk and considered under the rules. The two bills are certainly as far apart as the North and South Poles, as far as the State of Colorado is concerned. The House bill pertains to all the States of the Union, and the Senate bill does not pertain at all to the State of Colorado, which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. Speaker, these standard apple box bills may possibly be wise and beneficent measures, and when my constituents have had a sufficient opportunity to thoroughly consider and understand them they may approve of them. Of course I can not tell what their ultimate position will be. But since these bills were actively brought up some time ago the great majority of apple growers in Colorado have been so intensely busy that they have not had time to systematically consider these measures, and it is true that the shippers seem to very largely approve of the measures. But the growers and small dealers in two of the largest fruit-growing counties in my district—Montrose and Delta Counties—seem to be almost unanimously opposed to the measures in their present form. They especially do not like the feature of counting the apples and showing the number contained in each box. But I will not discuss the details of the bill at all. I merely desire to take the position of some of my constituents upon the matter by inserting some resolutions, telegrams, and letters pertaining to it.

I feel that a bill of this far-reaching importance throughout the United States ought to be very carefully considered before it is passed, and there will be ample time to consider it at the short session next winter, inasmuch as it ought not to go into operation right now in the midst of the apple-gathering season. I therefore insist upon my point of order, primarily for the purpose of putting the bill over until next winter for further consideration.

Some of the protests which I have received objecting to the bill are as follows:

PAONIA, COLO., July 30, 1914.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reference to the standard box for apples as outlined in the Raker bill, we wish to call your attention to the following facts and conditions: The apple growers of the western slope have used the Colorado standard or the United States standard box until they have established a trade and created a demand that is not satisfied with the Northwest box, such as is proposed in the Raker bill.

In the said districts our apples in the Colorado box have the call over the northwest apples. Again, the apples of the Northwest are larger than our Colorado apples, and when tiered and numbered as demanded by Raker bill will make a better appearance than our smaller Colorado apples, though color and keeping qualities may not be so good.

This regulation would handicap our sales and disappoint the trade, and would virtually be class legislation for the benefit of the Northwest growers

Therefore we ask you to use all fair means and influence to defeat this bill, and let each district remain free to supply the trade it has built up. We believe this will give a square deal to all growers.

Respectfully,

DEAR SIR: We earnestly request that you use every endeavor within your power to defeat the Raker box bill now pending in Congress, as we fear that it would greatly injure the apply industry of the western slope. Well-informed persons claim that our apples can not be packed in the size box contemplated in the bill. There would also be an unjust discrimination against Colorado apples because of the fact that they do not attain the size of those grown in the Northwest, although of superior quality and flavor.

Undoubtedly the bill was prepared in the interests of the dealers and against the interest of the farmer. Thanking you for the interest you have already shown in our behalf,

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Congressman at Large from Colorado, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your several wires and letters, also letter written you by Mr. Fletcher, of the Grand Junction Fruit Growers' Association. Mr. Fletcher's letter has been forwarded through Mr. Moore to Mr. Craig, of Paonia. We are under obligations to you for the interest you are taking in the apple-box bill, but are at a loss to add very much to what we have already said as to why we think it would be a detriment to the growers of apples in Colorado to have this bill passed, and we are of the opinion that Mr. Fletcher's second letter to you, in which he opposes this bill being made mandatory instead of optional, seems to us as a strong argument as to why this bill should not be passed, for we can see no reason for passing an optional bill; and if the bill, mandatory, is a detriment to the apple growers of Colorado, then we see no reason why the bill should be passed. It puts Mr. Fletcher in exactly the position that we wired you he was in—that he hoped that the passage of this bill would give him and his association an advantage over other apple-growing districts in Colorado. Now, we have insisted all along that this bill was absolutely in the interest of the Northwest, and this letter, in my judgment, shows you why. The apples are now growing on young trees, and are larger, and they have a very much larger per cent of fancy and extra fancy apples than we have, and they are unable to get their lower grades into the market, and by passing this bill and making it mandatory they hope to stop us from marketing our lower-grade apples. We find that by reason of the fact that we are able to put up our apples in an inexpensive pack that that is a source of a great deal of revenue to us, and if we are compelled to pack them in the expensive way that the people of the Northwest pack them we will be unable to market them.

We are spending a good deal of money in a suit that the people of Montrose and Delta Counties have commenced before the Interstate Commerce Commission in an effort to get lower rates on our bulk apples and on our apples in boxes to some territories, so as to enable us to market our fruit at a profit, but I fear it will be of little benefit to us if we are compelled to follow out the plan laid down by the Raker bill.

I note you said in your wire you had received a great many wires from the dealers in Denver asking you to use your influence to pass this bill. We are unable to see what interest the dealers in Denver have in a bill concerning the apples grown in Colorado. If you should happen to be in Denver during the months of December, January, and February, you will notice a very large per cent of all the apples handled by the dealers in Denver are grown in Idaho, Oregon, and Washington, and they use very few apples grown in Colorado.

I trust you will see your way clear to oppose this bill and induce, if you can, other members of the Colorado delegation in Congress to do the same.

With kind regards, we are,

Very truly, yours,

J. F. KYLE.

GRAND JUNCTION, COLO., July 25, 1914.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your wire of the 21st, I can add but little to my wire to you of the 20th; and I still contend there is not 10 per cent of the growers in Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, Kansas, Nebraska, or, in fact, in any of the States east of the Rocky Mountains, that know there is a bill now before Congress regulating the regular size package and a particular style packing. With a few exceptions, the only ones that know anything about this bill are the shippers and the growers in the Northwest; that is, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and California. It seems to me this is sufficient reason this bill should not be passed at the present time; in fact, until all apple growers have become familiar with the contents of this bill.

I am also strongly opposed to any bill being passed except it be mandatory. If we are going to have a standard box for apples, it should be the standard box for all grades of apples, the same as the standard barrel is for all grades. The box now used in Colorado contains exactly one-third of a barrel, according to the law now in effect in New York State, also the barrel designated in the bill which passed Congress a year ago, known as the Sulzer bill.

I also believe when a box is adopted as standard we should even go a little further and adopt grades. If you will read over the Sulzer bill, you will find they not only designate the size of the barrel but also the grades.

Mr. J. F. Kyle sent me a copy of your letter to him under the date of July 17, also two letters from Mr. Fletcher, of the Grand Junction Fruit Growers' Association, under date of July 7. You will notice from his second letter of that date he is opposed to this bill being mandatory instead of optional—he says for several reasons, the main reason being that in all the orchards there are apples not suitable in quality to be packed in any expensive manner; and while he urges the passage of this bill, he admits that to pack apples in that manner is very expensive. Mr. Fletcher might have gone on and stated truthfully that there is not to exceed 35 per cent of the apples grown in Colorado that would grade as well as the apples produced in the Northwest on account of size. I never felt so sure of anything as I do that, if this bill becomes law, and we are compelled to go to the expense of packing our apples according to the tenor of the bill, it will be a great detriment to the majority of our growers.

The tendency of the times, Mr. TAYLOR, is a larger quantity of any article at the same price; but this bill reduces the quantity; but for what few apples the grower saves by using the smaller box, the expense of putting up this pack more than offsets the few apples he has saved. On the other hand, the consumer is paying fully as much and getting less in quantity and no better fruit.

I notice in your wire you mention Delta County Fruit Growers' Association as being in favor of the bill. I was surprised to know that, for the reason I had understood they were opposed to it; but I will say to you, Mr. TAYLOR, the Delta County Fruit Growers' Association is not an association of growers; it merely means Mr. George Conklin and three or four of the stockholders that absorbed the old Delta County Association; and I do not presume they have handled as much as a hundred cars of apples any year for the past several years.

John Denney, of Chicago, operates quite extensively in all western Colorado districts. He also operates in Idaho and other northwestern districts. I inclose you a letter from Mr. Denney, from which you will find he is very much opposed to Colorado adopting this expensive pack.

Now, it is a fact, Mr. TAYLOR, 90 per cent of our apples are sold throughout Minnesota, the Dakotas, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, and Louisiana. Early this spring I wrote practically all the trade in these districts to whom I have sold apples for 15 years, and without a single exception they all urged me to stay with the old-style box. And for your information I am inclosing you copies of some of these letters. I have picked out just a few of the representative ones from the different localities. And I have learned as a fruit shipper that the best principle to work on is to put out your product in the way your customer prefers it, regardless of what our own opinion might be.

One of the reasons our apples grade smaller than the Northwest is our orchards are old, and after their orchards become older they will grow a larger portion of small apples the same as we do; but they do not seem to realize that at the present time.

The Northwest caters to the trade in the large cities that sell apples by the dozen, while our trade lies almost entirely with the smaller markets and country where they are looking for all they can get for their money, and, as you know, this class of people constitutes the very large majority of people that use apples. You remember, Mr. TAYLOR, the old Democratic slogan, "The greatest good for the greatest number," and I am working on the principle, the greatest amount of fruit at the least expense.

Also all measurements, as near as I can learn, in all the States are based on the bushel; that is, berries, for instance, the standard half pint, pint, and quart are integral parts of the standard box or of the standard barrel.

I sincerely urge you use your influence against the passage of the Raker bill.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN F. MOORE FRUIT CO.,
J. F. MOORE.

PAONIA, COLO., August 21, 1914.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: Your letters of June 17 and July 17 have gone unanswered because of my absence from town. On my return I wired, asking you, in substance, to kill the Raker bill, and I trust that has already been accomplished.

I do not know what arguments you have had pro and con from growers and shippers, but in my interviews with local persons these difficulties have been encountered: First, it is impossible to mark the number of apples and the style of pack used. The Colorado box contains a full bushel. Retailers can get 4 pecks from it, but they can not get more than 3½ pecks from the standard box of the Northwest. This generous measure has given Colorado fruit preference in a wide range of markets, and they (the marketmen) look upon this bill as nothing less than a sort of last stand on the part of the northwestern shippers in defense of their unsuccessful attempt to force their short box on the market.

Line 23, page 2: To mark a variety of apples "Unknown" costs the grower from 25 cents to 50 cents in many cases, where the apple is of good quality and appearance. A local designation, such "Colorado Favorite" or "Mountain Beauty," should be permitted, as dealer, retailer, and consumer alike shy away from anything "Unknown."

Another bad feature of the bill is that it robs the Colorado shipper of his right to the use of the grade designation "Standard," which is widely in vogue. "Standard" fruit has always meant fruit of marketable quality, not necessarily fancy fruit. The trade does not interpret it to mean the highest degree of excellence obtainable from that shipper, but rather the opposite.

The provisions of section 6 are intolerable. Growers and shippers have always held that it should be the cubical contents and not the specific dimensions of a box that should govern. If I am not mistaken, there are still three or four separate sizes of boxes being used by packers in different parts of this State, in most cases job lots, but all containing more than a bushel.

The statements in Mr. Fletcher's letter (which is returned herewith) are all very true, so far as I know. His support of the bill, however, is, or should be, passive rather than active, since he has nothing to gain by trying to help the whole apple-growing country to be the "fittest to survive." In other words, if he thinks it is a good thing, the longer other districts leave it alone the better off his companies will be. I have heard his question thrashed out time and again in jobbers' conventions and other similar meetings, and the boosting for the Northwest box always had to come from shippers, fair promoters, or exclusive selling agents. The dealers were almost unanimous in their commendation of the full bushel. Mr. Fletcher's position is such that his companies have nothing to lose if the bill fails of passage, while these districts that cling to the full bushel would be seriously crippled if it becomes a law.

Sincerely, yours.

A. L. CRAIG.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, M. C.,

Referring to your wire concerning the Raker apple-box bill, we oppose the bill in its present form and prefer that Colorado be left out. Our legislature can pass a bill that will comply with the conditions in Colorado. We favor a box containing one-third the cubic contents of the standard barrel, irrespective of number of apples in box. There are two things we want to avoid—counting the apples and selling in boxes less than a bushel.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.:

We strongly oppose Raker bill. New York law, now effective, specifies capacity of package; also different grades for apples (see Brookes branding law, New York State, sections 16 and 17; also pamphlet St. Joseph Hartigan, commissioner, mayor's bureau weights and measures, New York State). We understand Ashbrook-Senate bill, passed this session of Congress, defines barrel of 70,056 cubic inches, or subdivisions of third, half, and three-quarters barrel. Colorado box complies with this law; other States using same capacity baskets for peaches, pears, apples; also Colorado using baskets largely for peaches, same capacity as our box; these known in all markets as standard bushel baskets. Indications baskets will be used more extensively each season for all kinds of fruit, especially east of Rockies. Colorado box subdivision of standard barrels should be adopted as standard bushel box. Northwest pushing bill in self-defense. If our box designated standard, would compel them to mark theirs short. Raker bill hardly been mentioned in trade journals, horticultural journals, or newspapers, excepting in Northwest. Very few growers or shippers informed on this measure. Use best effort either to kill or suspend this measure. If compelled, accept. Our opinion, better exclude Colorado. Will try to have legislature adopt standard Colorado bushel box.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

We know, with exception Grand Junction Association, all shippers in State oppose Raker bill. It is our opinion not 10 per cent of the Colorado growers know this bill now before Congress. For some reason association has not advised their growers in reference to this bill. It has not been published in local papers in any apple district. Growers should have opportunity to know something about its contents before bill becomes law. We know dealers are anxious for uniform box; so are we. Contents of our box now in use is one-third of a barrel. Proposed bill, House Calendar 4899, also standard barrel adopted and now enforced by law for both fruit and vegetables in New York State, while box proposed is no specified portion of standard barrel. Colorado apples sold principally in Dakotas, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. Practically all dealers in these markets urge us to continue using bushel box, as they sell by peck. Northwest sells principally to large cities, where apples sell by dozen. We believe it class legislation to compel us to specify the number of apples in container while barrel shippers are not compelled to do so. Do not fail to give us your best effort against this bill.

MONTROSE, COLO., August 14, 1914.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of August 10, copy of the bill was not received, but unless its amendments are favorable to the people of the intermountain States, I can not withdraw my objection to House bill 11178.

I have no desire to criticize your motives, and believe that it is done with the sincere purpose of trying to unify the apple business, something which will be utterly impossible. The only unification that I can see possible would be a standard bushel box. The box you plan would regulate packing, but is under a bushel and no part of a barrel.

I know that certain fruit associations have indorsed this bill without understanding what it means. The regulations attached in your bill would be to cripple the fruit industry in Colorado. A great many people are led off by the theories advanced by men who have never shipped an apple, newspaper writers, and by the commission men.

Let me make a comparison. I have a certain trade in Chicago, Des Moines, and occasionally Sioux City for potatoes. It is immaterial to me much what the prices are, because this trade demands a fancy potato. Last year I received for my potatoes from this trade $1 to $1.15 per hundredweight f. o. b. Montrose, while the average field run was selling for 70 to 75 cents. To meet the requirements of this trade all my potatoes go over a 2¼-inch screen, while the ordinary run for Kaw River, Red River, and other potato-producing sections, including your State, have a 2 and 2¼ inch screen. Now, we can grow potatoes in this country which run 75 per cent fancy. Would it not be just as consistent to say that all potatoes must be graded to a certain size and the number of potatoes contained in a sack given, based on kind we grow, as to say that the intermountain people should with their apples meet the requirements embraced by the Northwest?

We know the Northwest grows a larger apple. The more humidity and the warmer the nights, the larger the fruit will grow, but the poorer its keeping quality. We have built up a trade with a shuffle pack, which pack, the way we pack them, runs a trifle over a bushel. The rule for our apples to make a fancy for this trade is 2¼ inches for Winesap, Jonathans, and Grimes Golden; 2½ inches for all other varieties.

While the last few years I have not been much of a shipper except from my own place, I might say I have not been without experience in this line, because I have handled the western business for, first, Porter Bros., and F. Newhall & Sons, Sylvan Newhall, Cruchfield, Woolfolk & Gibson, and then the Gibson Fruit Co., and during that time I handled many thousand boxes of apples. These apples went into storage mostly, and were not taken out until after the northwestern apples were disposed of. It is well known that the higher the altitude the smaller the apple, but the better its flavor and keeping quality.

In addition, I would call your attention to the fact that in your own State conditions are rapidly changing to meet the trade. They are demanding of you people bushels, and if you will examine shipments for this year you will see that your State and Texas are shipping many cars in bushel baskets or carriers. Indications are that Colorado and Utah this year will ship a thousand cars of peaches, the bulk of which will be in bushel baskets. This is an entirely new departure for us, but shows how conditions change. I am also reliably informed that Michigan has a standard law for bushel baskets. My judgment is that in five years time the intermountain fruit trade will all be on a basis of some kind of bushel measure.

I realize that as a Nation we have been exceptionally bright in many things, but we are the crudest of any Nation on earth when it comes to assisting the farmers. Everything has tended toward increasing the greater production, but the essential of true business has been overlooked, namely, the marketing of these products.

I can cheerfully say that I am ready to assist at any time in something that would tend to better this condition, but I am very fearful of the effects of this bill, should it become a law. I believe you have no desire to break down an industry in one section for the benefit of another, is the reason that I have taken the liberty to go into detail as fully as I have.

With best wishes,
Sincerely, yours,

T. W. MONELL.

PAONIA, COLO., August 15, 1914.

Mr. JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to yours of August 10, inquiring about our opposition to a bill establishing a standard box for apples by Mr. RAKER, our first grounds of opposition is that the box specified by the bill is a standard of nothing. It is neither a bushel nor one-third of a barrel; consequently its contents can not be specified in any unit of measure. It is neither a bushel nor any multiple of a bushel.

Secondly, it incurs unnecessary expense on the part of the grower to prepare his apples for market, as he has to grade the apples into different sizes. While it is a known fact that all our standard apples, if perfect in form and color, 2¼ inches and larger, make an extra apple, while with grading apples as provided by this bill will throw the 2¼ up to 2½-inch apples, no matter how handsomely colored and perfectly shaped, into the lowest grade and sell for less money.

In addition thereto, parties running two or three hundred packers will find it absolutely impossible to get the correct number of apples in the boxes, so that they will continually be paying fines.

Further, we have for 15 years marketed our apples in the box we are using now, which contains a few inches over a bushel; have established a market for them in these boxes, in which they sell as readily or more readily than apples put up in the box you wish to make standard and packed according to the rules of the proposed bill.

We have been successful in marketing our fruit in the package we now use, and have been able to put the fruit up at minimum cost, and we can see no justice or really any sense in a bill which strives to change our pack and make a standard out of a box that contains no unit of measure and has nothing to recommend it as a standard box, except that the people of the Northwest have used it. If they have been successful in marketing their apples in this box, we see no reason why they should not continue to use it; but if we are to have a standard box, we can see no reason for using anything for that standard but the bushel box.

But as to the grading, every community should have the privilege of grading apples to suit the apples they raise in that community.

If the eastern growers were compelled to grade apples by the rules we use in this country, they would not find one apple in a thousand with enough color to be classed as an extra apple; while if the people of the Northwest had to grade according to our rules on color, they would not be able to get one-half the extra apples they do now, while if we were compelled to grade according to their rule on sizes, we would not be able to market half of our apples.

It is our belief that if we have a few more freak bills passed by Congress and a few more freak rulings by the Pure Food Commission, that half of the growers in the United States will be forced out of business. They will not be able to stand the expense of preparing their fruit for market under the rulings of these freak bills and rulings.

MONTROSE, COLO., August 20, 1914.

Mr. A. J. COOK,
State Commissioner of Horticulture, Sacramento, Cal.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of August 15, will say you are correct in your surmise that I am actively opposed to your fruit-box and pack bill. I am aware that most of the apple regions were in favor of this bill, but I take pleasure in informing you now that many of them have seen the error of their indorsement and are now actively opposing it. In addition, a great many of the distributers now realize that the passage of this bill would cripple the industry in many sections of the country. We are in favor of the standardized box that contains a bushel, and if you people want to meet us on that ground we are ready to meet you; but you have no right to say how we shall pack our fruit. We know our own business, and have built up the trade on an honest box of apples or a certain style and package, and no other State has a right to say that we shall pack to suit them. The package you propose is no equal part of a barrel, and is not a bushel, and the only advantage it would be would be to the Northwest. I am reliably informed that certain parts of your State will be seriously injured to comply with it.

I do not think that there is any reason to believe that the bill will pass in its present form, as it is so manifestly unfair and injurious that I feel that Congress will not be led into accepting something for the benefit of some one section and a detriment to another. To say how we shall pack our apples would be just as consistent as for us to turn around and insist that your apples should be kept in cold storage the same length of time that ours are; and you know that that is an impossibility. The consumers of the United States are entitled to receive what they pay for, and the Colorado pack has always given them 1 bushel of apples.

So as not to take up too much of your time and the time of others interested, I am writing this on the behalf of our different associations, Mr. J. F. Kyle, and the granges.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. MONELL.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be recognized?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to suggest that under the statement made by the gentleman from Colorado they undoubtedly are not similar bills. I really rose to make the point of order. If they have undertaken by the Senate bill to exclude a State, why, of course, they would not be similar bills.

The SPEAKER. That is what they do undertake to do. They state in so many words that it shall not apply to the State of Colorado.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That makes a change in substance; so much so that the point of order, it seems to me, is well taken.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I want to say the committee was of the opinion that this amendment to the bill put in by the Senate excepting the State of Colorado should be stricken out, and the committee is favorable to the striking it out. But the bill is substantially the same; one amendment changed the time of its going into effect from 1914 to 1915, and the other two amendments are minor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that would not affect the question of consideration which the gentleman raised. I think its consideration depends upon its being precisely the same in substance as the Senate bill. Of course if it should be considered by unanimous consent, which the gentleman could ask, that would be a different proposition. The fact that the committee is willing to have the House strike out the amendment would not affect the parliamentary situation under the point of order made by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. RAKER. Will the Speaker hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In my statement to the House, so there will be no misunderstanding, the Senate bill that was originally upon the Speaker's table and which as sent to the Senate and back to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is identical and is the same bill; and I desire to make this statement so as to clear up the statement of my friend from Colorado. Now, House bill 11178 as reported by the committee with the two amendments is identical, with the exception, possibly, of three words in the first paragraph, with the Senate bill, save and except the statement which I will now make.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. LOGUE. Is not the subject of this bill the establishment of a particular standard?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. And is not the question of the State merely regulative as to where it will affect?

Mr. RAKER. I think so. The first and only change is in line 3, "hereafter provided for"; otherwise the two bills that were reported by the committee to the House and passed by the Senate are the same, save and except the proviso on page 11, which is as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent packing, shipping, or offering for sale apples grown in the State of Colorado in boxes or containers whose dimensions do not comply with those hereinbefore described.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention particularly to the rule that bills have to be substantially the same. The State of Colorado is not exempted from this bill. None of the States are exempted from this bill; but there is one provision, and one provision only, which relates to the dimensions of the boxes, and says that the State of Colorado may use a different dimension as to the standardization, of developing, and of marking the boxes and the kind of fruit grown. Otherwise the bill is the same in Colorado as in every other State. Now, does the word "substantial" mean anything? That rule must have been adopted for some elastic purpose; it must have been adopted with some idea of elasticity and of change, because if the House bill and the Senate bill were the same then there would be no necessity for the purpose of using a proviso if the House bill is substantially the same as the Senate bill. Both bills relate to the same subject; both bills cover every subject under consideration, and the only difference is as to that one exemption relative to the dimension of the boxes. In section 1, lines 6 to 10, it provides the kind and character of boxes to be used in the United States. The proviso, and the only exception, is that in the State of Colorado there may be a different size of boxes or containers, whose dimensions do not comply with these provisions herein described.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What other important thing does the bill seek to accomplish besides standardizing an apple box? Is not that the important thing of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. No. That is the minor consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will not the gentleman explain what is of more importance in the bill than that?

Mr. RAKER. That is as to the size of the box, and is of minor consideration. The question in the bill that is important is that the box should be marked "Standard," and when it is marked "Standard" that means that the name of the owner is placed thereon, the place of the growth of the apple, the kind and character of the apple, and the further provision that the apples offered for shipment in interstate and foreign commerce are of a well-known species, that they are all one variety, that they are reasonably uniform in size, that they are fully matured, that they are practically free from insect pests, that they are free from disease, that they are free from bruises and other defects; so that when a man buys a box of apples, whether the box is 10 by 14 inches, or whether it is 12 by 16 inches, he knows he is buying one grade of apples, one kind of apples, well-matured apples, and that they are free from insect pests and diseases.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to know if there is any difference in the Colorado apples and those from other States. Why do you differentiate?

Mr. RAKER. There is none whatever. That is the purpose of the bill. Those who use the standard box put it on the market with all of these conditions and of size and quality marked on the box, and if they violate them they are then subject to a penalty provided for in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment as to Colorado makes the bill obnoxious to the rule. We can not say they are substantially the same with that provision in there.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN (at the request of Mr. J. M. C. SMITH) was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of death of nephew.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 646 (H. Rept. 1192).

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution, H. J. Res. 241 with the Senate amendments thereto shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; that there shall be 30 minutes of general debate on said resolution, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the motion to concur in all the Senate amendments.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss the rule unless the gentlemen on that side wish to do so. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire time?

Mr. MANN. I want a little time on the bill.

Mr. HENRY. On the report?

Mr. MANN. No; on the bill.

Mr. HENRY. You want it on this resolution?

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether it is on the rule or not. There is half an hour general debate provided.

Mr. HENRY. There will be no trouble about that. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address on rural credits, by ex-Judge R. W. Winston, of Raleigh, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing remarks by Judge Winston, of North Carolina, on rural credits. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by the Hon. John Skelton Williams before the Indiana Bankers' Association, at Indianapolis, a few days ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Hon. John Skelton Williams——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was that address delivered?

Mr. COX. About two or three weeks ago; I do not remember exactly.

Mr. HENRY. Is it on the currency question?

Mr. COX. On the Federal reserve act.

Mr. HENRY. I shall not have any objection, if I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter which I recently wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] couples with that request that he may be permitted to extend his remarks by printing a letter which he recently wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury on the same subject.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury bearing on the same subject has not already been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HENRY. I do not know that it has.

Mr. MANN. It has been.

Mr. HENRY. Then I will change my request and ask leave to print in the RECORD a little bill of four or five sections, which I have prepared.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to print both?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas fell into error about what was said over on this side. It was the Secretary of the Treasury's letter that was printed.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to find out if what the gentleman wanted to print is an answer to what the Secretary said about financing the cotton situation?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Then I see no objection to having the answer printed.

Mr. HENRY. It is not only an answer, but a complete answer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks leave to couple with the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] the request that he be permitted to print a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury on the cotton question. Is there objection to either request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a communication that I have here, entitled "National Issues; or, Why Republican Legislators Should Be Returned to Congress," by Prof. A. S. Boles, of Haverford, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some resolutions of my constituents concerning this apple-box bill that I just objected to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting some resolutions of his constituents concerning the apple-box bill. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] makes the same request—to extend his remarks on the apple-box bill. Is there objection to these requests?

There was no objection.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I take it that under the rule just agreed to the half hour of general debate will be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] on that side and by myself, chairman of the committee, on this side.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. I do not see the gentleman from California here.

The SPEAKER. In his absence the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will control the time. Who is the second on the committee?

Mr. HAY. I do not know; but I see the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], a member of the committee. But there will be no trouble about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for the election of five members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. The resolution when it passed the House provided for the election of four, and when it went to the Senate the Senate amended it by increasing the number on the board from five to seven and provided for the election of five of those members. The only question is about the concurrence of the House in the Senate amendments, and at the proper time I shall move to concur in the Senate amendments, under the rule.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. As I stated the other day to the House, I do not believe that this was a wise conclusion on the part of the conferees. As the president of the board of trustees of one of the largest State soldiers' homes in the country, we have reduced the number of trustees from 11 to 9, and from 9 to 7, and are getting better, more efficient service and more activity on the part of the members of the present board of trustees than when we had a larger board.

Now, while I do not believe the conclusion reached is wise, I am not going to oppose the measure, because of the lateness of the session and our desire to have this matter settled finally.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia reserves 13 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes up on a special rule, and so, I suppose, a discussion of the rules of the House would be in order in connection with that. It would be in order, anyway, under general debate. It is known that under the Philippine bill we have a right to extend our remarks in the RECORD, but I wish to make some remarks that I do not want to extend in the RECORD without putting them on in this way.

It is known that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] submitted a suffrage amendment to the Philippine bill, and stated that he was going to do all that he could to put the House on record on that proposition. It is known that after that I submitted several amendments along the same line and did what I could to put the House on record, and made the statement that all the votes against them came from one side of the House, and therefore put the Democrats, to a certain extent, on record in committee in reference to that matter.

Then, when it came to the time to offer the motion to recommit, I had in the meantime offered a prohibition amendment, and I desired to get a roll call on that prohibition amendment, and I was depending on some one from the other side of the House here to carry out the threat of the distinguished and able leader of the minority. Still I was not too reliant, for I went to the Speaker personally and asked for recognition to make my motion to recommit. I was informed that the committee member [Mr. TOWNER] had the right ahead of me, and I did not make the motion to recommit. So I prepared a substitute, thinking I could probably offer it as an amendment and thereby get the matter before the House. But when the motion was made, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] moved the previous question on his motion to recommit, although his was a fake motion, because it did not recommit with any instructions whatever, so that it was only designed to absorb and take up that opportunity to make a motion to recommit, because it could not have had any other purpose. It was solely to make impossible what the motion to recommit is designed to accomplish.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that the RECORD shows that these two amendments were prevented from having a record vote here in this House by the gentlemen on this side of the House surely as much as by the gentlemen on that side of the House. I do not know why it was done, or what the purpose of it was; but it certainly was a bipartisan action, and the defeat of the prohibition amendment was especially brought about by the previous question being attached to this fake motion, this sharp motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], designed to make impossible a vote on suffrage and prohibition in the islands, when he moved to recommit the bill without any instructions whatever.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman why he insisted that it was a bipartisan action? What did we on this side have to do with that motion?

Mr. BRYAN. One thing was that the distinguished gentleman from Colorado, who is an ardent friend of suffrage, did not try, on that side of the House, to make a motion to recommit. If he had done that, it would not have been a bipartisan action; but there was nobody on that side of the House who wanted to make such a motion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that the rule expressly provides that the minority are entitled to recognition to make that motion, and that a gentleman who is opposed to the bill is entitled to recognition?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman has the advantage of that. It has got to be some one opposed to the bill. I concede that; but it seems to me the suffragists ought to have been enthusiastic enough to at least try to get in on the lines.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Under the right to extend in the RECORD on this subject, I call attention to the fact that the suffrage amendment has been on the calendar a long time, and certainly the Democrats have prevented a vote and now the Republicans do the same thing. I would call that bipartisan.

There has likewise been pending before this House for a long time on the calendar and ready for vote a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the Hobson amendment for prohibition of the liquor traffic. That amendment is supported by a larger number of petitions than any that has ever been submitted to Congress for consideration. It has back of it the churches, the civic organizations, the uplift societies, and the best citizenship of the Republic. It is as certain of passage soon or late by Congress, in such form as may be determined upon, as is the eternal principle of truth. Men have arisen here the last few days and spoken with fervent eloquence of the consent of the governed as applied to the Filipino, and have urged the independence of the islands in some day yet to come, but this prohibition amendment has more importance attached to it than our policy in the Pacific or any other policy of this country, whether foreign or domestic. In this debate on the Philippine bill we have heard something about preambles, but here we have a preamble to this proposed amendment that means what it says, and says what it means. There is no exaggeration contained in its awful recitation, which certainly ought to stir to action those who are here as the servants of the people sworn to render faithful service. Here is what that terrible recitation contains:

Whereas exact scientific research has demonstrated that alcohol is a narcotic poison, destructive and degenerating to the human organism, and that its distribution as a beverage or contained in foods lays a staggering economic burden upon the shoulders of the people, lowers to an appalling degree the average standard of character of our citizenship, thereby undermining the public morals and the foundation of free institutions, produces widespread crime, pauperism, and insanity, inflicts disease and untimely death upon hundreds of thousands of citizens and blights with degeneracy their children unborn, threatening the future integrity and the very life of the Nation: Therefore be it—

What a terrible indictment against alcohol! How can men of heart and conscience, men of integrity and faith in a hereafter, men who believe in punishment on earth and in the world to come, stand in this House in the presence of the American people and give aid and comfort to such an enemy of our homes, our country, and our God!

Hear the condemnation contained in the preamble to this resolution:

"Alcohol is a poison." No man would deny that. Every school child knows it is true.

"Alcohol is destructive and degenerating to the human organism." Let the man who denies that drink a pint of the stuff.

A STAGGERING ECONOMIC BURDEN.

New York City spends $1,000,000 per day, or $365,000,000 per year, for drink. This Nation's drink bill is reliably estimated at $1,724,607,519. The New York Tribune places it somewhat lower, at $1,410,226,702, and says:

All the corn, wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, and potatoes put together will not pay it. The liquor traffic calls for each year more than our whole civil service, our Army, our Navy, Congress, the rivers and harbors, pensions, all we pay for local governments, and all the schools in the country.

LOWERS AVERAGE STANDARD OF CHARACTER.

Only an inebriate or a devotee of the traffic who has already lost his character to the traffic would deny that.

UNDERMINES PUBLIC MORALS.

Go to the grogshops, the bawdy houses, the road houses, and then visit the police courts and hear the testimony they offer to verify this charge.

PRODUCES WIDESPREAD CRIME.

Figures compiled from the United States Statistical Abstract show one homicide in prohibition cities to three in license cities; one homicide to 14,513 of population in license cities and one to 44,026 in prohibition cities; one arrest to 92 of population in license cities and one to 299 in prohibition cities.

PRODUCES WIDESPREAD PAUPERISM.

Out of 3,230 inmates in almshouses in Massachusetts the State bureau of labor statistics reports 1,274—47 per cent—were due directly to the personal use of liquor. Many more were there as children and dependents of drunken and debauched parents.

PRODUCES WIDESPREAD INSANITY.

A Pennsylvania commission, acting under the direction of the 1911 legislature, makes this report:

The fact that alcoholism and feeble-mindedness are so intimately related brings this subject within the province of this commission, which, from its investigation, feels warranted in making the declaration that alcoholism, next to heredity, is the most prominent contributory cause in producing mental defect, degeneration, and disease.

INFLICTS DISEASE AND UNTIMELY DEATH UPON HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS.

Is there a worse disease conceivable than alcoholism itself? A drunkard! An inebriate! What is he fit for except a drunkard's grave? As to deaths due to alcohol, the Vindicator, published at Franklin, Pa., says:

Something less than two years ago a prominent New York life insurance man, Mr. E. P. Pheips, the editor of the American Underwriter, undertook a study of the mortality caused by drink, with the announced purpose of showing that the estimates of the Prohibitionists are exaggerated. When his figures were completed he himself had arrived at the conclusion that drink is a factor every year in the death of just less than 66,000 Americans.

This showing was so unacceptable to the liquor interests that they have spent a large quantity of perfectly good printer's ink in attempts to break the force of it.

BLIGHTS WITH DEGENERACY CHILDREN UNBORN.

Alcoholism, syphilis, and tuberculosis are the trinity of diseases that lay the heaviest toll of degeneracy on the race to the third and fourth generation. The alcoholic most readily falls a victim of syphilis and tuberculosis, and the drunkard's baby suffers from the nonsupport and the debauchery of a drunken husband. The degenerating effect of alcoholism is an admitted and scientific fact.

THREATENS THE INTEGRITY AND LIFE OF THE NATION.

This statement is merely a résumé and a necessary sequitur of what precedes.

The preamble is a conservative indictment of a great national curse.

If it is not a curse, why have 10 of the sovereign States of this Republic voted to cast it out as utterly unfit? Why have the good people of these States risen in their dignity and, ignoring the cry of revenue and business and personal liberty, and all the other arguments that could be presented, voted to totally prohibit the traffic within their borders? Are the people of those States deluded and crazy? Here is the roll: Maine, Kansas, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, West Virginia, North Dakota, and Virginia.

And if the indictment of the churches and the forces opposing the liquor traffic is not true, why is there such a bitter and determined fight in six other leading States to drive the traffic outside of their borders? Here is where they will vote in the pending election on this subject: Ohio, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, California, and Arizona.

If the indictment is not true, why is it that there is so much dry territory in the following States that they are known as near-prohibition States: Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, and Vermont.

If the indictment is not true, why does the United States prohibit the sale of liquors to Indians and on certain islands of the Pacific? And why is the Secretary of the Navy trying to eliminate it from the mess of the officers of the Navy? Why do so many of the fraternal bodies exclude from their membership men engaged in the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquor?

With the truth of this awful indictment before Congress, I now revert to the amendment offered by me to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the Philippine Islands. Republicans on this floor have been freely criticizing the Democrats for not bringing out for a vote the Hobson prohibition amendment. But in this case I thought the amendment would surely meet with enough success to get a vote on the proposition for the Philippine Islands. I was met by a Republican Member with a point of order. Mr. STAFFORD, the gentleman from Milwaukee, Wis., made the point that the amendment was not germane, first, to the bill itself, and, second, to the place in the bill where I was introducing it as a new section. Those interested may read the record. It was held out of order three times when offered in three different places. The Chair had ruled that it would have been in order as a part of section 3.

The only way the amendment could then be offered to section 3 would be to obtain unanimous consent to revert to that section. This, of course, could not be obtained. Later I offered the amendment as a new section, to be known as section 30, at the end of the bill, which provided for a repeal of certain laws and the maintaining of certain other laws in force. Another distinguished gentleman in the chair ruled that the amendment was out of order in that place. There remained one opportunity to have the amendment considered, and only one. That would have to be by a motion to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to amend the same by inserting the amendment in section 3. This motion could only be made after the committee had risen and reported the bill back to the House for final vote. Only one motion to recommit is allowed. Such motion may be amended, however. I sought opportunity to submit this motion to recommit, but the Speaker stated to me that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] had first right to be recognized for that purpose. I then prepared to offer an amendment, or substitute, for the Towner motion and thereby obtain a vote on the proposition; but when Mr. TOWNER made his motion he followed it immediately with the following words: "And on that motion I move the previous question."

The effect of this was to make it out of order to offer amendments or substitutes, and although I rose in my seat and called the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that I had a substitute prepared involving the question of prohibition in the islands, still he took advantage of his right to move the previous question and prevented the amendment. Notwithstanding his motion to recommit was merely a formal motion, not involving any instructions or amendments whatever, it did not ask for an amendment to the bill, but the sole and only purpose of his motion to recommit was to prevent me or any other person from offering a motion that would propose an amendment; and in this way a vote on prohibition in the Philippines was prevented. Full credit for this feat should be given to the Republican Party and the gentleman that was representing that party on the floor, Mr. TOWNER. Of course the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], another high-ranking Republican on this floor, made the points of order on which the amendment was ruled out of order by the Chairman. But we have here an illustration of the working of the bipartisan machine in this House. The Democrats have opposed a vote on the Hobson amendment and the Republicans have criticized them for it. Yet, when an opportunity is given the Republicans to permit a vote on prohibition in the Philippines, they deliberately block the way by parliamentary tactics.

Prohibition of the liquor traffic in the Philippine Islands is of the greatest importance. It is reliably stated that when the Americans took the islands the natives were not addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors to any great extent, and that the introduction of the American barroom has had a very bad effect on the inhabitants of the islands. I have a clipping from the Post of October 10, 1901, which is interesting and bears upon this subject, and which I here insert in my remarks:

BARROOMS IN MANILA—EFFORTS IN THE SENATE TO END A NATIONAL SCANDAL—WOULD REVOKE LICENSES.

The existence of American barrooms in Manila, which have flourished to such a degree that they have become a national scandal, engaged the attention of the Senate yesterday. The sentiment against these barrooms was so intense that the following proposed amendments to the Army bill were offered and are likely to be adopted:

"By Senator LODGE: The importation and sale of distilled spirits into the Philippine Islands or their dependencies, except for medical purposes or for use in the arts, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioners of the United States, is hereby prohibited.

"By Senator GALLINGER: That all licenses heretofore granted, or that may be granted prior to the approval of this act, for the establishment of American saloons in the Philippine Archipelago, are hereby revoked and annulled, and hereafter no such licenses shall be issued."

In discussing the situation of affairs in Manila, in relation to the saloons, Senator Teller declared that the United States was cursing the people of those islands with a curse as "vicious and vile as any the Spanish ever placed upon them." It was, he said, in the power of the President and within the power of Congress to destroy Government encouragement of drinking among the soldiers of the American Army and the Filipinos. He directed attention to a statement of President Schurman, of the old Philippine Commission, to the effect that one of the most demoralizing influences taken to the Philippines by the United States was the American saloon. He said that the few thousand Americans in Manila drank more per capita than the same number of Americans anywhere.

CONDEMNED IN STRONG LANGUAGE.

"The establishment of American barrooms in Manila in the wake of our Army," said Senator LODGE, "is an evil of the worst kind, and if there is any way to have them closed I should be glad to see it done."

"It is in the power of the President," replied Mr. Teller, "to close every one of them as quickly as a telegram can reach Manila. If the President declines to do it, then it is in the power of Congress to compel it to be done. Will anybody say that it is not our duty to act promptly?" Mr. Teller asserted that if the President and Congress failed to act, they would "deserve the condign contempt of the American people."

With the remark that saloons in Manila had done incalculable harm, Senator LODGE introduced the amendment to the Army bill already quoted. Senator GALLINGER quoted an Army officer as saying that the 400 or 500 saloons in Manila ought to be abolished at once, and then he introduced his amendment revoking all licenses. Senator McComas said that he would be glad to vote for any amendment still further suppressing American saloons and the sale of poisonous and native distillations. He called attention, however, to the fact that the Taft commission had already taken some steps toward restricting the sale of liquor.

LEGISLATION FOR THE PHILIPPINES.

There was very general impression both on the Republican and Democratic sides of the Senate yesterday that Senator LODGE'S amendment would pass, and Senator GALLINGER'S proposition to revoke all licenses also found much favor. "I would like to add an amendment prohibiting the importation of American citizens into the islands," was the remark of Senator Jones, of Arkansas. Some Senators, while they favored the purpose of the amendments, expressed doubt as to the propriety of Congress undertaking to legislate for the Philippine Islands, and this question may now be interjected into the Army bill debate. Senator Bacon said that if the President really desired to stop the excessive sale of liquor he could do so under the autocratic power with which he ruled the islands. "The same signature which approves an Army bill containing the prohibition," he said, "could to-day sign an order accomplishing the same result. The responsibility for the disgraceful condition lies with the President, not with Congress."

I also insert a clipping from the Pittsburgh Daily News of February 28, 1901, which shows that the Filipino was not entirely free from the use of a certain form of alcohol before American occupation, but the clipping is of considerable interest:

FILIPINO GIN KILLING MANY—A SERGEANT HOME FROM MANILA SAYS SOLDIERS ARE FOND OF THE NATIVE INTOXICANT AND PAY HEAVY PENALTIES FOR ITS ABUSE.

Sergt. Ausburn Wayson, of Company C, Fourteenth Infantry, which is stationed in the Philippines, passed through Pittsburgh this morning from San Francisco on his way to New Kensington to visit his brother. Sergt. Wayson has been in the Philippines over a year. Last summer he fell a victim to the fever and was confined in the hospital at Manila for several months. He was discharged last November on account of disability, and arrived at San Francisco the middle of January. Sergt. Wayson says that the liquor traffic on the islands, and especially Manila, is growing to be an extensive business, and that the natives are getting to be hard drinkers.

Continuing, he said: "Much evil will result from the introduction of American liquor into the Philippines. The natives are becoming very fond of United States liquors, and, on the other hand, our soldiers would rather drink the Filipino gin than any liquor of home manufacture. This native gin is awful stuff and when enough is taken it will keep a man in an intoxicated condition for days. I believe that much of the sickness prevalent among the soldiers in the Philippines can be traced to the excessive use of this stuff. The surgeons have observed that a soldier who is accustomed to drinking this gin is more susceptible to fever than the one who has not used it.

"All of the surgeons have advised the soldiers to let it alone, but many of them pay little heed to this advice. It is dangerous for a person who has been on the islands for only a short while to drink native gin. One must be thoroughly acclimated before the system will stand even a little of this liquor. It is known that a number of soldiers have become insane through the abuse of gin."

Sergt. Wayson says that the report that some of the soldiers were disabling themselves to get discharged and afterwards lay claim for a pension is true to a limited extent only.

I insert, also, another editorial taken from a newspaper of about the same date. The name of the newspaper is missing, but the facts contained in the article are of interest:

GEN. KOBBE'S PROHIBITORY LAW.

The commanding officer of the Department of Mindanao and Jolo, Brig. Gen. W. A. Kobbe, United States Army, issued, on May 30, a very comprehensive order against the liquor traffic in that department, which will go into effect on the 1st of August.

The first paragraph of the order absolutely forbids the retail sale of beer, wines, spirits, and all beverages containing alcohol, and orders the closing of all places which, under any name, sell such articles. The second paragraph permits the sale of beer and wines having less than 15 per cent of alcohol in original packages containing not less than a dozen quart bottles or two dozen pint bottles; spirits and beverages containing more than 15 per cent of alcohol may be sold at wholesale, in original packages, "only on the written order of the senior officer commanding present, who before giving such order will assure himself that neither the whole nor any part of the articles enumerated are intended for resale or to reach persons who would be likely to abuse the privilege of having them in possession."

Then follows the nub of the whole matter: "No sales will be made to Moros or to persons living in Moro communities." None of the articles mentioned is to be disposed of by gift, by sample, or otherwise than at bona fide sale, or consumed on the premises where sold. Commanding officers are to see that the order is not violated at places not occupied by troops, but large enough to attract saloon keepers; and the inspector general of the department is charged with keeping officers up to the mark.

Gen. Kobbe remarks in his order that he is receiving applications in large numbers from ex-soldiers and others for permission to open saloons, but none from trained business men, farmers, or mechanics who have come into the department to pursue their vocations.

The success or failure of this order will be of interest, both to the temperance people and to those who do not subscribe to the prohibition creed. If there is any place where prohibition can be enforced, it is within the limits of a military government. The missionaries are charged by cynics with bringing intoxicants in their train, and temperance and antiadministration papers have commented bitterly on the alleged increase of the liquor traffic in the Philippines since we assumed possession. Gen. Kobbe is in earnest, and the reason for his order, the protection of the native inhabitants, is excellent; it remains to be seen how he manages to enforce his prohibitory law.

Our island of Tutuila, one of the Samoan group of islands, has for several years had prohibition, and it is stated that the law is well enforced, and one writer states the natives are content to live without alcohol.

For many years the British Government has prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors to the natives in all the western Pacific islands not within the limits of the colonies of Fiji, Australia, or Papua. As far back as 1888 a regulation to that effect was issued throughout the following islands: Friendly, Navigators, Union, Phœnix, Ellice, Gilbert, Solomon, New Hebrides, Santa Cruz, and so forth, in which it was declared:

If any British subject in the western Pacific sells or gives or otherwise supplies, either directly or indirectly, any native of any island or place within the western Pacific islands any intoxicating liquors, he shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to punishment as follows: (1) Imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, and with or without a fine not exceeding £10 ($50); or (2) a fine alone not exceeding £10 ($50). "Native" shall mean and include in its reference every person in the western Pacific not of European descent. "Intoxicating liquors" shall include all spirituous compounds and all fermented liquor and any mixture or preparation containing any drug capable of producing intoxication.

I look upon this proposition as one of tremendous importance. There is an opportunity now in the very hands of the prohibitionists of this country to end forever the liquor traffic in the Philippine Islands. There is every reason in the world why it should be done, and I now take advantage of this opportunity to urge the prohibition newspapers of the country, the prohibition speakers and writers, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union organizations, the churches, the ministers, the antisaloon leagues, and the people generally of the United States to write letters to Senators urging upon them the necessity of placing a prohibition amendment in the Philippine bill when it is considered during the short session beginning December 7. If this proposition is forced as an issue, so that there will be a roll call on it in the Senate, there can be no reasonable doubt that the amendment will carry. I am thus stating it in this form in the hope that great publicity will be given to the facts presented, so that those who are interested may know that they have a duty to perform; and if they do not perform their duty, they should forever hold their peace when it comes to criticizing public officers for failing in their duty. Prohibition in the Philippine Islands is a matter of easy accomplishment. Will the people of the country do their part to force the issue in the United States Senate? I sincerely hope and pray that they will.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, whenever an effort is made to dispense with a useless office, the one making the effort has a rocky road to travel. A few years ago the House, thinking that there was no need of the expense of so many managers of the soldiers' homes, and really with the design largely of doing away with that method of handling the soldiers' homes, cut down the number as the offices became vacant. It looked like an easy proposition to leave a man in the office until his term expired and then vacate the office entirely and abolish it. Even that met with opposition, but it carried. I am not sure whether it was in the last Congress or the preceding Congress, though my recollection is that there was a reduction made in the last Congress by the Democratic House. But along comes the time when you want to fill some vacancies and there are not enough jobs to go round. Then what do we do? Do we cut out the gentlemen who want the jobs or increase the jobs? We increase the jobs. At different times we have heard a great deal about economy and dispensing with useless offices; but because the gentleman from Illinois wanted to go as a manager of the soldiers' home, and another gentleman from Ohio wanted to go on, and another gentleman from Indiana wanted to go on, and another gentleman from Kansas wanted to go on, and another gentleman from Maine wanted to go on, instead of appointing by resolution the number provided by law we propose to increase the number in order to take care of all these gentlemen. If some active Member of the House had desired an extra manager from the State of New York, or Maryland, or Pennsylvania, or any other State, we would have increased the number still more. The essential provision of this resolution, outside of naming these managers, is that—

Said board, after the passage of this resolution, shall be composed of seven members.

As I understand, that is an increase in the number. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia if it is?

Mr. HAY. It is an increase of two. I will state to the gentleman, however, that the board has not been decreased to five as yet, and would not have been decreased to five had it not been for the fact that one of the members of the board who would have served until 1916 has died.

Mr. MANN. The number would have been decreased to six?

Mr. HAY. Yes; it would have been decreased to six.

Mr. MANN. And finally, as the vacancies occurred, it would have been decreased to five.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But the moment we get to the point where we could dispense with a useless office we yield our power to the Senate, and instead of dispensing with the office we enlarge the number of offices. I have reached that point in legislation where I feel there are times when we can afford to dispense with useless offices, and I know of quite a number that could be dispensed with without any loss to the interests of the Government and with a saving to the Treasury of the Government. And while it is true these managers do not receive a salary, it is also true that they receive expenses, which amount to something; and it is also true, as I believe, that the only purpose of increasing the number is to make some places for some men who want the jobs. That to me is not a sufficient reason for yielding to the Senate amendment.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman from California care to use any more time?

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman desire to use any of his time?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

Mr. KAHN. I do not desire to use any more time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a request for unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD. On the 19th of September there was dedicated a beautiful monument at the Battleground National Cemetery near this city, and on that occasion addresses were made by two distinguished Members of this House from the State of New York, Mr. GRIFFIN and Col. GOULDEN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by the publication of their addresses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to extend his remarks by having printed the speeches of two of his colleagues on the occasion named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a published letter by the Speaker of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter written by the Speaker of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement made yesterday, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I would like to yield 30 minutes of my time now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and then have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] consume an hour, and then yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may go ahead now, and I will arrange with him afterwards.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I have risen for the purpose of discussing in the brief time allotted to me the distressing cotton situation in the Southern States, and trust that I shall utter no word here to-day that shall not be deliberate and in exact accord with the facts. It is no exaggeration to say that the condition in the Southern States is absolutely distressing. On account of the war in Europe the market for cotton has been paralyzed, and we now have no market. In a little while the purchasing power and the debt-paying power of the Southern States will be gone. Cotton is the great staple of the South. It is the great export that we send to foreign countries for the purpose of bringing gold back to our shores, and to-day distress is widespread everywhere in the cotton-growing States. In a little while the tonnage on the railroads will be so reduced that they will be embarrassed. Whenever cotton is not shipped, then the railroads immediately feel the effect, because necessarily their tonnage is greatly reduced and there will be but little commerce going out of the Southern States or coming in. While you gentlemen from the Northern and Eastern States do not yet feel the blighting effects of this prostration of the cotton market, in a short while you will understand and appreciate our dire distress. You will not be able to sell your manufactured articles to our people, for when they can not sell at least a part of this cotton crop of 1914, which is worth $1,000,000,000, then the manufacturers of Massachusetts, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut and all of the other States of this Union will feel the result.

The other day I had a letter from a shoe manufacturer in the State of Virginia, and he wrote me that he had already felt the effects of this terrible panic now sweeping over the South, and in a short while he would have to close his shoe factory, because the people there were not able to continue their purchases as heretofore. I shall not parade these things before the House or before the country, but, Mr. Speaker, I do say, and measure my words when saying it, that if this great Government does not come to the rescue of our people in some way, within less than 60 days the business conditions of the South will be worse than since the conclusion of the Civil War, and in my humble judgment there will be widespread bankruptcy, business disturbances, starvation, and hunger in many of the homes of our people.

Having said that much about the conditions, naturally the question arises, What is the remedy? Mr. Speaker, when I first realized the situation, I said that this great Government should come to the rescue of a third of the people of this Republic, of 30,000,000 of citizens, who are a part of this Union, and lift them from this prostrate condition. The Secretary of the Treasury could have immediately deposited in the banks of the South the public moneys that were at his disposal or that could have been placed at his disposition by the passage of adequate legislation, and, Mr. Speaker, I shall not unjustly criticize the Secretary of the Treasury. I am making no war upon him, but in this crisis now upon our people I have a right to appeal to the cold facts of history and the truthfulness of the transactions in the Treasury Department. Only to-day there was authorized to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech of the Comptroller of the Currency in regard to our fiscal affairs. We asked the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit in the national banks, the fiscal agents of the Government, enough funds to be loaned to the producers of cotton to relieve them from their present embarrassment. We asked that those funds, the people's money, be put there upon terms and conditions that would make the money available to the men who produced the crops. Immediately the Secretary of the Treasury replied to me and said that he did not have the funds, that he did not have the power to deposit them there if he wished to do so. Let me do him exact justice. I appealed to him to deposit $50,000,000 only in 15 Southern States. That would have been a great relief. We needed more, but his reply was that under section 5153 it would be inequitable for him to deposit the public funds in the Southern States. Let us analyze that proposition for a moment.

In this speech, which was delivered just a few days ago in the State of Indiana, the Comptroller of the Currency makes this statement. When the panic came on in New York because of the situation in Europe, this is what happened: There was great distress in New York City. Financial matters became very tight there. An appeal was made to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, and here is what Mr. Williams, the Comptroller of the Currency, stated, and I quote him exactly:

> Responding promptly to urgent appeals, the Secretary of the Treasury went over to New York Sunday afternoon, August 2, and held a conference that night with a score or more of the presidents of the leading banks and trust companies of the metropolis. He heard their statements, analyzed the situation, quickly saw what was necessary to enable the banks to meet the demands upon them and to restore confidence, which had been so racked by the world-shaking events of the week.

I here omit a few lines, and he continues:

> Anticipating the situation as it was laid before him at that conference, he had that Sunday morning before leaving Washington directed the shipment by express to the subtreasury in New York, for the New York banks, $40,000,000, and the Treasury forces and the express companies at that moment were taxing their resources in hurrying the execution of the order. The announcement that the Treasury had arranged to give the New York banks a hundred millions of currency was flashed that night over the wires to every section of the country, along with the assurance that the New York City banks were prepared to honor all requests of their country bank correspondents for shipments of currency against their balances—

Omitting again a few lines—

> and would accept a fair proportion of New York City notes or bonds as the basis for such currency, in order to help the bankers carry out the plan for the funding of the city's floating indebtedness, and since that time the Treasury Department has actually furnished to the New York banks $50,000,000 of additional currency, making the total amount credited to the banks of that city since August 1 more than $140,000,000

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to submit a question?

Mr. HENRY. I can not submit to an interrogatory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. Speaker, I say, as an humble Representative of a congressional district upon the floor of this House, that if the Secretary of the Treasury had pursued the same course, had taken a lightning express train to the Southern States, and summoned the great bankers and officials at the head of the trust companies, and said to them, "You must relieve the distress of the Southern States as we relieved the situation in New York," this curse would not have been upon the South to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I announce that if the Secretary had stood up boldly, courageously, and had said to the world, to the speculators, to the banks, and to the stock gamblers and those who despoil the producers, "You can not rob the southern producers of their cotton crop at 5 and 6 cents a pound, but this great Government will come to their rescue and save this crop already produced," the condition would be different. But he has not done that.

Mr. GARNER. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. I did not yield to my other colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and I dislike——

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to get my colleague's exact position in reference to the Treasury Department.

Mr. HENRY Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman's argument, the Treasury Department has not done what it should have done and ought to have done toward the South in this exigency?

Mr. HENRY. That is as true a statement as was ever made in this world.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman from Texas called it to the attention of the President of the United States?

Mr. HENRY. Well, now, since the gentleman has asked that question, I will state that I have gone to the Secretary of the Treasury, I have gone to the Federal Reserve Board, I have gone to the President, and laid those matters before them and appealed to them to save the South in its distress, and have also submitted these things in writing.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand my colleague, then he has drawn this matter to the attention of the administration, and his indictment is against the administration for not coming to the rescue of his people?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I am not making any criticism. I am simply discussing facts, and no living man can answer them. The President will do his duty as he sees it. But I am not through, Mr. Speaker. I want to say to the gentleman now what I intended to say a little later on, that this Congress ought not to adjourn until justice has been done to our people; and, as far as I am concerned, if I have the power to prevent it, we never shall adjourn until we have legislation on the cotton situation. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; having yielded to my other colleague, I will yield this time, and then I am done.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to ask my colleague what was the nature of the $40,000,000 currency deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury in the New York banks; and was it any different from the $68,000,000 of currency which the Secretary of the Treasury has deposited in the southern banks? In other words, was it Government money, was it a Government deposit, or was it emergency currency that any section of the country might obtain upon application, and that the South could get, to which it is entitled to the amount of $151,000,000 additional?

Mr. HENRY. I yielded to a question, and the gentleman is making a speech; but I will answer that question, because I believe the gentleman from Virginia, a southerner, will come to our rescue in order to help save the South from the wild orgy of bankruptcies that are now overhanging 15 Southern States.

Mr. GLASS. It is not a question of rescue that I present; it is a question of fact.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; it is a question of rescue, and I summon the gentleman to the aid of his own people, as well as the people of every State in this Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Comptroller of the Currency says that this was public money, the people's funds, which were taken from the Treasury and were carted over to New York City to relieve the situation there.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I can not yield any further.

Mr. GLASS. Let us state the facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY. I am stating the facts. The gentleman can reply to them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, here goes on the statement of the other eloquent Virginian, John Skelton Williams:

> For under the direction of Secretary McAdoo more than $160,000,000 of currency has already, since August 1, with impartial hand, been distributed to the national banks in every section of the country where it has been needed, from Boston to San Francisco, and from the Great Lakes to the cities on the Gulf, helping to dispel and neutralize the poisonous fumes of distrust, alarm, and fear which had begun to manifest themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman raises the issue that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act did the work, I wish to say it has proven to be a snare, a delusion and fraud upon the rights of the people. It is true that they did issue this Aldrich-Vreeland currency to banks, allowed them to secure it practically without limit, and it is true that a lot of that currency went in the Southern States; but instead of the banks using it to relieve the distress of the cotton producers, they used it in their own business. They bundled it up and shipped it back to New York and to other money centers to pay their obligations. So I say that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act did not do the work. Furthermore, I say that if the Federal reserve act were in operation now—and I do not mean to criticize that act—we would have had the same result. These banks would hoard their funds; they would take the currency they are authorized to issue and would use it in their own business. They would ship it back to New York to pay their own obligations. You must find another way of getting these funds to the people. Mr. Speaker, here is what ought to be done: The Secretary of the Treasury ought to put the public moneys at the disposal of the Southern States. He ought to establish every national bank a depositary, which he has authority to do under the law, and ought to put the public moneys there. He ought to forget the Aldrich-Vreeland Act; he ought to forget this Federal reserve act; and if he has not the public funds to relieve our distress, should come to Congress and say, "Authorize me to issue United States notes as they did during the war, possessed of all the legal qualities with which those notes are now endowed, and let them go to the distressed people of the South." And if that authority is questionable, or if it is not sufficient, then let him sell the Panama Canal bonds and put the proceeds of those bonds in the banks of the South and relieve the situation.

Why, Mr. Speaker, here comes the Secretary of the Treasury—and I admire his patriotism, his ability, his sagacity, and all those things—with a bill that I have before me and asks that Congress appropriate $10,000,000 to purchase ships, and in the same bill that he be authorized to sell $30,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds in order to purchase those ships. Ah, gentlemen, would it not be better to forego the passage of that bill for just a little while and sell those $30,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds and put the proceeds in the southern banks in order that our farmers might be relieved from this awful condition?

Am I traveling outside the record when I make those statements? I say if the Secretary of the Treasury will come here and ask Congress to give him the public funds we will pass a bill authorizing the issuance of $250,000,000 of United States notes redeemable in gold, and we will put them in the banks of the South in less than one week, and, if that is not enough, we will authorize him to sell the Panama Canal bonds now in the Treasury, amounting to $240,000,000, and will increase the interest from 2 and 3 per cent to 4 per cent, and then he can put the proceeds of the bonds in the banks. Ah, but they say, "You can not sell Panama Canal bonds now." Why, Mr. Speaker, think of that proposition! If we can not sell our bonds now, suppose we should happen to be drawn into the terrific conflict now going on across the Atlantic Ocean, then where would we get the money with which to finance the needs of our people in carrying on the war? We are powerless now to sell bonds to relieve our people from distress and bankruptcy; with no war in this country, at peace here between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, at peace with the Western Hemisphere, and yet we are met with the proposition that we can not sell bonds.

Let me go back a little further and recount some more history. We had a little flurry that was a mere morning's breeze compared with the present awful condition in the South. I refer to the panic of 1907. You all remember it. What happened? In that panic the banks of the South would not honor our checks when our money was on deposit in them. What happened? Immediately the President of the United States instructed his Secretary of the Treasury to deposit in the banks public moneys to the extent of $245,000,000, and by the 1st day of December, in 1907, we had in the States of this Union, and most of it in the agricultural States of the South and West, $245,000,000 of money, public funds, taken out of the Treasury of the United States and put where it could relieve the embarrassment of the people.

But the President and the Secretary did not stop there. Let me read you from the Atlanta Constitution of November 18, 1907. The headlines are to this effect:

UNCLE SAM TO THE RESCUE—$150,000,000—WITH HIS BONDS AND NOTES.

QUICK RELIEF WILL BE GIVEN BY GOVERNMENT.

Decision to End Money Pinch Follows Conference at White House.

TO ISSUE CANAL BONDS AND TREASURY NOTES.

$50,000,000 of Former and $100,000,000 of Latter Necessary—The Government Will See that Money Gets to South and West, Where It Is Needed to Move Crops.

So, in addition to the $245,000,000 that were taken from the Treasury and deposited in the banks, the Secretary of the Treasury supplemented that with an order that $150,000,000 more should go. And they issued circulars, one to sell the Panama Canal bonds, $50,000,000, and another to sell $100,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness under the act of June 13, 1898. What happened? The minute the President and the Secretary said that these people must be relieved, it was not necessary to sell all the bonds and all the certificates of indebtedness bearing 3 per cent interest, but they only sold in the aggregate $40,000,000. And the condition was relieved, and those gentlemen in New York, who had manufactured and brought on this panic without any rhyme or reason, were thwarted in their will. And I say to-day, if there is a conspiracy to sacrifice this cotton and force it upon the market at 5 to 6 cents a pound, at the price at which it is now selling in the South, this great Government should come to our rescue, as was done in 1907, and these funds should be put in the National and State banks, where the people who have produced the crop can secure them.

Ah, but some of our friends want to make this a banking proposition altogether. They say that you can not do business without the aid of the banks. I am willing to admit that banks are good institutions, that they are necessary to commerce, civilization, and business, and I undertake to say that if the Government can deposit its public funds in the vaults, to be loaned upon the terms and conditions which the banks may fix themselves, to relieve the stock market in New York, and to relieve similar conditions, this same Government has the power to pass this statute and to fix the terms and conditions upon which these fiscal agents shall advance this money to the distressed producers of the South.

Is there anything revolutionary in that? Mr. Speaker, I decline to arraign the patriotism of the banks as some gentlemen do. I believe that those banks in the South that have already loaned their money as far as they could with safety, that have already advanced it on this crop, and for other purposes, to supply the needs of the people, would be glad to get the Government funds from Washington on any terms that the Government might fix in order that they could relieve the producers of cotton and tobacco, so that they might pay their debts and might pay the banks and the merchants, and those who had financed them in making this crop.

Now, that is the situation; and if the national banks were not willing to do it, the State banks would be glad to take this money and loan it on any terms. At first I suggested that if 10 cents a pound could be advanced, it would be all right, and we could get along. But they said, "You valorize the crop," and then I rewrote the bill, and said, "If you will advance the farmer $30 a bale, 6 cents a pound, and give the Secretary of the Treasury plenary power to get these funds into the hands of the farmer, you can relieve the situation." But that has not been done.

Now, what is confronting us in the South? October has come on. The crop has been produced. It has cost from 8 to 10 cents a pound to raise this crop. Our people are in awful distress. They owe these debts, incurred for making the crop. They must be met, but they can not sell their cotton for any price exceeding 6 cents a pound. And, gentlemen, it will go to 4 cents. It will go below that. It will go down and down until there is absolutely no local market for it. It is a billion-dollar crop. Thirty millions of people are involved in this transaction, and yet there is no relief from this great Government. Must it be a banking transaction? They admit they have already issued over $300,000,000 of emergency currency. It did not go where they wanted it to go. The Secretary of the Treasury boasts that under the Aldrich-Vreeland amendment a billion dollars of emergency currency could be issued. But you can issue a billion or five billions of emergency currency and it would not reach the producers of cotton as the Secretary of the Treasury wants it to reach them, never under the present system.

So you must come quickly to our relief. Something must be done in the way of legislation. We must give the Secretary of the Treasury more power. We are suffering. Let me say to you gentlemen you all love the South. We are all citizens of this great Republic and love this Republic as much as you do. But let me tell you gentlemen on that side of the aisle that to-day tenants—and three-fourths of the crop in my State is raised by tenant farmers—those tenants have abandoned their own fields, have left their crops there, have left these great white fields of cotton unpicked because they could not sell it for anything. Their wives and children are in want for meat and bread. They have gone to the neighbors who had a little cash and received pay from them for picking cotton. As long as they had employment they have gotten from their neighbors meat and bread for their families. Gentlemen, help us, and let us not adjourn this Congress until we have relieved the South, as we would be ready to relieve any other State in this Union under other circumstances. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And further expressing my views on the several phases of this question, permit me to submit a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury:

OCTOBER 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Secretary of the Treasury can announce that within one week he will deposit in the national banks throughout the South several hundred million dollars and very largely dispel the gloom overhanging the Southern States on account of the prostrated and paralyzed cotton market. You have this indisputable right under section 5153, Revised Statutes, which gives you plenary powers.

In March, 1913, a terrible storm flood swept over the Ohio Valley. In your annual report of 1913, in the very front page, with apparent exultant pride, you recite: "The banks of that city were afraid to reopen their doors because of the temporary impairment of confidence." You further add: "The citizens' relief committee asked that a representative of the department be sent right away to see about financing our banking institutions. * * * A national bank examiner was immediately dispatched to Dayton, and within 24 hours after his arrival the department designated every national bank in Dayton as a Government depositary, and announced that it would deposit in said national banks $2,000,000 of Government funds, to be secured by State, municipal, or other local bonds acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury. The effect of this action was to restore confidence at once. The banks reopened their doors, and instead of the anticipated need of $2,000,000 the Treasury was called on for only $182,000. If you will use this example of depositing millions in a small locality like Dayton and spread out public funds in the same proportion over the entire South, you can promptly save our people from the impending disaster now upon them. A simple announcement of your intention would preserve your native land from bankruptcy. You have unquestioned authority to say to every national bank in the South: "Take cotton as security at 8 cents per pound, require the farmer's note running for six months, bearing 3 per cent interest. Do this as the fiscal agent of the Government under section 5153, Revised Statutes. The Government will at once place in your hands the public funds to finance those transactions." Thus, as you saved Dayton, Ohio, last year you can rescue 30,000,000 of people in the South.

You can deposit the money, make terms with every national bank in the South as trustee, persuade them as fiscal agents to gather in warehouse receipts on cotton and utilize those receipts as security for the loan of Government funds at a very low rate of interest, as you did when you scattered the crop funds throughout the States in 1913. You justly glory in that on page 2 of your report, and are proud that you stretched the precedents. You say: "The Secretary announced that as security for such deposits 'high-class commercial paper' would be accepted at 65 per cent of its face value," etc. You add: "This was an unprecedented step, because commercial paper had never before been accepted as security for Government deposits." And: "The moment it became known that the Government stood ready to assist, the tension was relieved, business resumed a normal aspect, and the fall movement of crops, trade, and commerce proceeded upon an easier and safer basis than for many years past."

As Secretary of the Treasury, shift the Government deposits, now about $74,000,000, to the South, sell two hundred millions of Panama Canal bonds to those getting up gold pools for Europe and on New York City loans, and utilize our cotton as security for the Government loans, as you did "commercial paper" last year, and in one short week you can rescue the South from ruin and a wild orgy of bankruptcies soon to ensue.

If you need a little more legal authority to do this, you can win the President in an instant to help you, and the message of both the President and yourself to Congress can strengthen and free your hands in an hour to do just as you please to find a way to save a billion-dollar cotton crop. Aye, if you wish it and will say the word, we can instantly add to those Government deposits and the proceeds from the Panama Canal bonds combined $200,000,000 more by the issuance of United States notes.

It is with you. Congress can provide the additional funds when you and the President say go forward, and we can authorize you in a few brief words to use our cotton this year as security instead of bonds and commercial paper, as you did last year, and the glorious deed is done. Will our Secretary of the Treasury rise to the occasion? You can.

Please let me have your attitude on these points at the earliest practicable moment, as it will determine my official conduct as a Representative in Congress.

With cordial regards, I am,
Sincerely, yours,

R. L. HENRY.

OCTOBER 12, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 9.

First. In reply I still insist that you have the indisputable right under section 5153, Revised Statutes, to deposit public moneys in the national banks throughout the South in any manner you may deem "equitable" to the extent of the funds in your hands or that may be supplied you by congressional action. It would not, under the present law, be "inequitable" for you to deposit in the national banks of the cotton and tobacco States $50,000,000 of the $74,000,000 now due the Treasury.

You deposited $50,000,000 for crop-moving purposes in the agricultural States last year and with justifiable pride flaunted the fact in the faces of the New York bankers, coupled with the statement that if said New York bankers menaced the money market you would cause $500,000,000 additional under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to be taken out by the banks in the Southern States to thwart the menaces of the bankers in money centers. You were right then, and you would be right again to pursue the same course even if you had to use the just and influential prestige of your high office to induce Congress to furnish you with all the public moneys you need for the present crisis, which far surpasses our difficulties last year.

I still maintain that if you will announce to the world in a ringing proclamation that as Secretary of the Treasury you propose to use the public moneys on hand and to be secured by prompt and adequate legislation, to the extent of any number of millions of dollars necessary for the purpose of saving our cotton crop from sacrifice, you will avert the calamity now overhanging the South from the paralyzed market. Such an announcement by you and the President of the Republic will set at naught the greed and defiance of the spinners, bankers, and speculators in cotton. It will instantly revive our prostrated market throughout the earth.

Second. You assert your disinclination to sell Panama Canal bonds or to issue additional United States notes. You doubt that you can sell Panama Canal bonds. Permit me to remind you that I now have in my hands a special rule to bring up for consideration the Alexander bill, "to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade of the United States," etc. And you not only request the immediate appropriation of $10,000,000 from the Treasury, but, in addition, provide that you be allowed to call into requisition the acts authorizing Panama Canal bonds, and that you be empowered to "issue and sell or use for such purchase or construction" any of those bonds now available "to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000." It will convince you, as well as the simplest mind, to merely state that if you can find purchasers of those bonds for the purchase of the Government merchant ships you can easily sell the same bonds to save our cotton crop already produced, and thus avert the impending bankruptcy banging over the 30,000,000 people in the South. The President and yourself have asked Congress to pass this ship-purchase bill. Hence I maintain that if you will come to Congress and urge that you be given power to sell Panama Canal bonds at a higher rate of interest, if necessary, and to issue "United States notes" in sufficient amounts to be deposited as "public moneys" in the banks of the South to save our cotton crop, already grown, in this temporary war crisis brought on by the appalling conditions in Europe, you will find a quick response on our part. Will you do this to save our southern people through this feasible and perfectly constitutional plan? My deliberate judgment is again reiterated that you should not hesitate a moment.

Third. You further say, "Since the 1st of August there has been issued to the national banks in the Southern States, including Missouri and Maryland, $68,000,000 of additional bank currency. The national banks in those States may, by complying with the law, receive $151,443,000 of additional national-bank currency." Then, after taking note of certain public deposits already in those States and additional national-bank circulation issued since the beginning of the European war, you add: "And there is available to the national banks in the Southern States, upon their compliance with the law, additional national-bank currency amounting in the aggregate to $151,000,000."

Again, permit me to suggest that all this "additional currency" has not reached the distressed cotton producer. You will instantly recall that you have just finished a brave fight against the banks for "hoarding" their currency and unjustly monopolizing it and preventing it from going into the hands of the farmers. You have admitted, and must again admit, that a very small per cent of this additional money reached the farmers. Hence it failed in its purpose. The banks "hoarded" it, and by defying your ambition to get it into the possession of the farmers diverted it from the intended course and used it in their own business. So even you are brought by logic and fact to the conviction that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act in this emergency has proved to be nothing less than a huge farce and comes dangerously near being a fraud on the rights of the people and the Government.

Fourth. Again you say, "Moreover, existing law authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to issue more than $1,000,000,000 of currency to the national banks throughout the country. * * * I am firmly convinced that neither additional nor unlimited issues of paper money will help the cotton planter. I am equally convinced that the inevitable inflation which such issues would cause would hurt him and hurt the country."

Permit me to redirect your attention to the fact that you charged several weeks ago that banks were "hoarding" this currency. You have been powerless under the present law to get it to those in distress and into the real hands for whom you intended it throughout the South. You know that much of it was shipped back to the money centers to liquidate debts there. It is quite evident that under our present law the banks seem to have the power to expand and contract the currency at their will, to fix prices, depress and inflate values, affect wages and all property; and yet with all this "inflation" pointed out in your letter to me the money has not reached the people in localities where it is to-day needed. Something is wrong with the law or system in this crisis, or you would have been able with your known courage and ability to drive some of this vast amount of boasted new currency into the hands of the cotton and tobacco farmers.

Undoubtedly you need help from Congress, and you should come and aid those of us in that body ambitious to do this work right, in order to secure "public moneys," that will certainly go into the depositaries of the South, to become absolutely available to the farmers upon fixed conditions.

Yes; I think and deliberately reassert that you must issue Treasury notes or sell Panama Canal bonds or other bonds, or both, in order to get the money into the hands of the producers, through the instrumentality of the banks as fiscal agents, at a low rate of interest, upon terms and conditions fixed by law. If you do not do this, the banks will continue to defy and thwart your will; and you must agree they have been doing that for more than 60 days.

Fifth. Finally you present this point to me: "Is it wise to issue $400,000,000 of Government bonds and greenbacks merely to lend on cotton? Tobacco, naval stores, copper, silver, lumber, and other things have been hurt by the European war. All have applied to the Treasury for relief. If we disregard every suffering interest except cotton and make it the sole beneficiary of governmental favor, what becomes of the Democratic principle, 'Equal rights for all, special privileges for none'?"

You must allow me here to mention the "direct loan" of $1,400,000 you recently found and inspired for Tennessee. Perhaps I can afford to call it a "directed loan," and solve the very slender doubt in your favor, inasmuch as the papers indicated that you "directed" Senator LEA and Secretary Snead to the National Park Bank, of New York City, where they could find $1,400,000 available to take up the notes of the State of Tennessee after you had lodged in the hands of that bank the sum of $400,000 of the "public moneys," besides other deposits going before this, so that these gentlemen would not find themselves at the end of a false rainbow when they walked through the doors of that bank and into its vaults. In old-fashioned parlance, those gentlemen, in their quest of funds for distressed Tennessee, through the good offices of almost magical financiering, "found the gold at the end of the rainbow." It was not a rainbow of hope, but one of reality. I see nothing wrong or dishonorable in this loan, so efficiently directed by you according to newspaper accounts now in my hand, coupled with your letter to Maj. E. B. Stahlman.

But, Mr. Secretary, you can never convince any reasonable intellect that there is the slightest difference between the principle of that "directed loan" to Tennessee and a direct—or directed—loan through the banks of the South, as fiscal agents of the Government, to the farmer on his cotton or tobacco, at a reasonable rate of interest, of public moneys, in accordance with conditions fixed by law. The Government has as much right to fix the conditions upon which it loans its public moneys as it has to authorize the banks to loan the same funds upon conditions to be fixed by the banks themselves. There is no chance for the Government to lose a penny on cotton and tobacco. They are produced, and will be in warehouses. The principle is the same, and since you have aided in exercising it for Tennessee to save her credit you can not dispute it with the farmers of the South when they beseech you to save their purchasing power and debt-paying power through the same means.

Hence my course is fixed, and I shall go forward and contend for legislation treating the farmers of the South as we have done with Tennessee, with the Dayton banks during the great flood in Ohio, and as was done in New York during 1907, when over $40,000,000 of public moneys were deposited with the banks to relieve the stock market and finance the needs of Wall Street speculators.

Our need is overshadowing and pressing. You should join us and help to get legislation to sell the Panama Canal bonds and issue United States notes. Restrain the banks, hold them in leash, and prevent their further inflation of the currency, which is not reaching the farmers this year.

With cordial regards, I am,
Sincerely, yours,

R. L. HENRY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] such time as he may desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this bill under pressure of a special message delivered recently to both Houses emphasizes the difference in method and of limitations in framing revenue laws and appropriating the moneys derived thereunder. Before the days of the income tax Congress knew beforehand that the money required to run the Government was derived from customs duties, internal revenue, and miscellaneous receipts, and therefore limited its appropriations accordingly, cutting the garment to suit the cloth. Accuracy in estimating the income from these sources from year to year and fear of a deficit enabled Republican Congresses for 16 years to keep the Government on an even financial keel. During all these years the revenues were abundant, without need of the issuance of bonds at high rates of interest to maintain the gold reserve, as in Cleveland's time, or imposition of direct taxes in time of peace.

With the enactment, however, of the Underwood tariff-for-revenue measure, confessedly reducing customs duties, as estimated by its author, by forty millions for the first year of its operation, and with its individual income-tax provisions yielding less than half the revenue estimated, this Democratic Congress has been heading for the rocks upon an uncharted sea.

The stern limitations which restrained Republican Congresses in making appropriations so as to keep them within the Government's receipts, accurately estimated in advance, no longer control. On the contary, this Congress in its joy ride of extravagance based its appropriations upon expectations as to income and not upon accurate estimates. Its expectations as to the amount of reduction of customs duties resulting from the new tariff were found to be too low, and its expectations of the amount to be derived from the individual income tax proved to be too high. The Democratic Party, in thus trying to run the Government by guess, has run it into financial straits, and this, too, uninfluenced by the war in Europe.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The President in his special message of September 4, referring to the reduction in customs duties of over ten millions for the month of August as compared with August of 1913, and a probable falling off of from sixty to one hundred millions for the current fiscal year, declared as follows:

> I need not tell you to what this falling off is due. It is due in chief part not to the reductions recently made in the customs duties, but to the great decrease in importations, and that is due to the extraordinary extent of the industrial area affected by the present war in Europe.

The President drew too broad a deduction from the falling off of the customs duties for the month of August, a falling off which can no doubt be largely attributed to the sudden upheaval in Europe, temporarily cutting off commercial relations with the belligerent area, but his alarm is not fully justified, in view of the fact that after a momentary shock and the reestablishment of "lanes of commerce" with England, France, and neutral European countries there has been a steady increase of importations week by week, the importations at the port of New York for the week ending September 12, of $16,930,576, being only $2,000,000 less than for the week ending August 1, the date when hostilities actually began. Conceding that the war now in progress, by depriving us of customs duties from goods which otherwise would be imported from Germany and Austria and from the allied powers, because of their lessened production, the loss is not likely to be as great as indicated by the President's message, and certainly not enough to justify Congress in levying war taxes to the extent of over one hundred millions in time of peace.

GENERAL FUND IN THE TREASURY.

On October 9 of this year there was a balance in the general fund of $102,776,123.93, as compared with $165,960,984.79 at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, when Republican tariff laws were still in force. Notwithstanding this reduction of over $63,000,000 in the last 15 months, there are sufficient funds to run the Government if economically administered. But the President argues that as some $75,000,000 of this present general-fund balance are deposited in national banks, subject to call, their withdrawal at this time would bring about "probable consequences of inconvenience and distress and confusion," that therefore direct taxes of over one hundred millions must now be levied. We do not believe that this is the only alternative.

This vast sum asked to be raised will not come into the Treasury at once, but gradually, as the business taxed can develop it, and on the average of some eight millions a month. This being true, would inconvenience, distress, and confusion come to the banks and to business if the Secretary of the Treasury withdrew these $75,000,000 now deposited with the banks at the rate of $8,000,000 per month? With deposits of over six billions, with over three hundred and fifty millions of asset currency already issued under the much maligned, but now much needed, Vreeland-Aldrich act, and many millions more issuable, with enlarged powers of rediscounting possible under the Federal reserve act, now about to be put in operation, is there anyone who believes that our national banks will be seriously affected by the gradual withdrawal in the course of an entire year of only $75,000,000?

Why should not the Government be able to withdraw its own money—the people's money—to meet its own needs? Why should the people be taxed over one hundred millions in order that the banks may draw interest at the rate of 8 per cent and over on seventy-five millions, for the use of which the Government gets but 2 per cent? The withdrawal of these funds from the banks would not withdraw them from circulation, for the Government would immediately disburse them and they would again enter the channels of trade and business and ultimately again into the banks. When the average business man has a deposit in the bank he draws it out to pay his debts or to meet current expenses, or if he has no deposit he borrows the money, but he never would think of taxing his customers.

ANOTHER ALTERNATIVE.

There is another alternative which the President might have employed to meet what he considers the present grave financial crisis, an alternative which the Spanish War revenue act of 1898 gives the Secretary of the Treasury in just such an emergency as the present of borrowing money at not exceeding 3 per cent per annum on short-time certificates running not to exceed one year, and in denominations of $50 or multiples thereof. The President is opposed to this alternative, asserting that we ought not to borrow, as doing so would make an untimely and unjustifiable demand on the money market and increase the present embarrassment.

I am not impressed with his objection. If these short-time certificates of low denomination were offered for public subscription, they would be largely taken up by our people, and with little or no withdrawal of funds from the banks. Certainly, a Nation with a per capita circulation on October 1 of $37.15 and general stock of money of over four billions, ought to be able to absorb the small sum of $8,000,000 a month without danger to the money market. But the money so raised, as I have already stated, would not be permanently withdrawn, but would at once be disbursed and, entering the channels of business, would soon return to the banks. Would not the payment by thousands of our people of over one hundred millions in a single year of direct taxes be just as much an embarrassment to the money market as to raise the same amount by gradual sale of short-time certificates, under the act of 1898, or the gradual withdrawal from the national banks of the seventy-five millions belonging to the Government?

THE WAR AN ANCHOR OF HOPE FOR DEMOCRATS.

The falling off of customs duties since the Underwood bill became fully operative, as shown by decreased exports and decreased customs duties, notwithstanding increased imports, had become more manifest with each succeeding month prior to the outbreak of hostilities on August 1. This decrease, therefore, could not in any way be attributed to the war, but was the logical effect, as predicted by Republicans, of a bill which when being considered in the House was declared by its author to have nothing of protection in it, but was one for revenue only. With falling revenues and increased and increasing expenditures, relief for the Treasury was a matter of time. The sudden outbreak on the 1st of August, involving most of Europe, was providential for the Democratic administration. The greatest war in all history was to be turned to political advantage and all our financial ills attributed to it. Emergency legislation in the form of burdensome direct taxes was to be put through under gag rule to replenish the Treasury. War beyond our borders, and not ill-advised legislation here at home, was to be charged with the responsibility for our present state.

I do not believe our people can be so easily deceived. They had seen too many evidences of the disastrous effects of the Underwood and other bills in paralyzing business, reducing wages, increasing unemployment, and lessening confidence prior to the opening of hostilities in Europe to believe that this war was solely or even largely the cause of all our woe. A few statistics will be conclusive. The excess of exports over imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, was almost $653,000,000, while for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1914, it was only $470,457,375, notwithstanding the fact that the Payne tariff rates were operative from June 30 to October 4, 1913, and decreases on wool and woolens and on sugar did not go into effect until some months later. The record for the first seven months of this year is as follows:

Excess of exports:
January	$49,323,680
February	25,875,369
March	4,943,930
Excess of imports:
April	11,339,544
May	3,476,896
June	654,522
July	6,462,233

In other words, the excess of exports over imports, or balance of trade in our favor, during the first seven months of this year was only a little over fifty-nine millions, as compared with a balance in our favor for the first seven months of 1913 of over three hundred and eight millions. The war, by stimulating the exportations of foodstuffs and war material will, during the last five months of this year, check further decline and may considerably increase our balance, but these are abnormal and temporary influences, and the fact remains that during April, May, June, and July, and prior to the outbreak of war the tide of an excess of imports had set in, and accounted for large recent exportations of our gold to Europe.

Were this increase of importations during the first seven months of this year largely of crude materials for use by our manufacturers in making finished products, we might have less cause for apprehension, but the statistics show that of manufactures ready for consumption and upon which no American labor need be employed before use by our consumers there were almost $40,000,000 worth more imported than during the like period of 1913. That means that our own labor was deprived of the wages it could have earned had this excess of manufactured goods been made here.

Not only has labor been deprived of the opportunity of making the goods and earning the wages it is entitled to, but capital has been discouraged from enlarging plants, making new investments, and protecting itself and its workmen against foreign competition. Prior to and immediately following the passage of the Underwood bill many industries, in their efforts to adjust themselves to the new conditions, were compelled to reduce wages, the number of their employees, and their output. The administration, through the Secretary of Commerce and the author of the bill, declared that investigation at Government expense would be made of every such reduction claimed by business men to be necessary because of the new tariff, and if in the opinion of highly paid Government experts outside of the civil service their claims were unjustified they would be hung "high as Haman." Notwithstanding the activity of these experts, there have been no hangings to date. Adverse trade balances, lessened revenues of common carriers and most lines of business, lessened savings banks deposits, lessened wages because of reduction of orders and of output were the overwhelming and incontestible testimony which prevented verdicts of hanging.

INCREASE OF IMPORTS BRING LESS INCOME.

Not only had our imports during the first seven months of this year increased and during the last four months of this period exceeded our exports, throwing the balance of trade against us, but because of the reduction of the rates to a free trade or revenue basis the duties collected were less than for the corresponding period of 1913, when the Payne rates were in operation, by the sum of $23,360,549.39. This means but one thing—that we were permitting foreigners to import more manufactured goods which our own labor and industry could produce, while at the same time depriving the Federal Treasury of millions of dollars.

In other words, the foreigner got our money, we got his goods, but the Treasury lost the revenue, and all this without a reduction in the cost of living. Had adequate protective rates been adopted, or had even the rates of the Payne bill, defective as many of them were, been collected at our customhouses, the general fund in the Treasury would not be as depleted as it is now and there would have been no need, because of the present crisis in Europe, to burden the people with over one hundred millions in direct taxes. No amount of "whetting of wits" by our manufacturers, as recommended by the President, has yet enabled them to conquer the markets of the world. Up to the present, under the restrictions and handicaps to which they have been subjected during the last 12 months, they have been unable to even regain the home market to which they are entitled, but from which they have in many instances been driven by the competition of cheaper foreign products.

THE FARMER ALSO HIT.

The Democratic Party chiefly won success in 1912 because of its promise to reduce the cost of living. In its platform of that year it charged high cost of living to the protective tariff and the trusts and monopolies which such tariff fostered. To make good its promise it placed many of the agricultural products of the North and West upon the free list and materially reduced others. The argument used with the farmers, and one, I regret to say, many accepted, was that the protective tariff which the Republican Party had consistently maintained on products of the farm was of no benefit to them; that as we were exporters of such products there was no need of protection, and importations from other countries would have no effect. To show the enormous increase of importations of farm products during the nine months ending June 30, 1914, under the Underwood bill, as compared with the importations for the corresponding fiscal year under the Payne bill, ending June 30, 1913, I submit the following instructive table:

Excess in value of these importations under the Democratic tariff law, $48,186,728.

With such vast increases of importations there could be but one result—that our northwestern and border farmers got less for the output of their farms than they were entitled to and less than they would have received had not the duties been greatly reduced or entirely removed. At the same time the lessened prices paid to the farmers resulted in little or no reduction to the ultimate consumers, as, in so many other instances, the difference inured to the advantage of the carriers and middlemen. The fiftyfold increase in the importation of corn, principally from Argentina, inured to the benefit of the Corn Products Co. and the Whisky Trust.

It seems strange that the Underwood bill should free list the products of the farms of the North but retain a tariff on those of the South. Why should there be a tariff on peanuts and none on potatoes; a tariff on angora wool grown in Texas and none on wool grown in the North; a tariff on rice and none on corn; a tariff on wheat sacks and none on cotton bagging?

On top of such withdrawal of protection and such sectional discriminations the farmer is called upon by the pending bill to pay a considerable sum in direct taxes. He will not warm up to the proposition, but will resent the imposition of such taxes. Already he is dissatisfied with the party in power because of its failure to fulfill its promises to him. In their platform of 1912 the Democrats promised him legislation providing for farm credits, which the platform stated was of equal importance with currency reform. Notwithstanding a commission spent much time and money investigating the systems of farm credits abroad, notwithstanding much testimony was taken and many hearings and conferences were had and bills based thereon were reported, no action has as yet been taken and none is likely during this Congress. Either the President has not yet made up his mind or his mind is not in accord with that of his party in Congress.

Another promise the Democrats made the farmers was "national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads." While the House passed a bill appropriating $25,000,000 for this purpose, the bill slumbers in the pigeonhole of a Senate committee; and there is no prospect of road legislation in this Congress.

While some good laws in aid of agriculture have been passed by this Congress, the two measures in which the farmers are most vitally interested and the enactment of which were specifically promised have failed to pass. This Democratic Congress could not find the time to pass these measures, but it not only found the time but manifested the greatest eagerness to pass bills to appropriate thirty millions for the purchase of merchant ships and fifty-three millions for a "pork-barrel" river and harbor bill.

DEMOCRATIC EXTRAVAGANCE.

Had the present Congress exercised reasonable economy in framing the appropriation and other bills, the President could have had no excuse to ask the imposition of over one hundred millions of direct taxes. The President can not escape blame for the unheard-of extravagance of his administration. In none of his messages to Congress has he impressed it with the necessity of hewing appropriations to the bone and of keeping expenditures within the income of the Government. Both he and his party seemed to have forgotten this pledge of their platform:

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of the recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people

In the light of what has happened in the last 18 months this part of the platform, to use the words of the President, must have been "molasses with which to catch flies."

The appropriations of this session exceed those of the last Republican Congress, excluding from both the rivers and harbors bill, by about $100,000,000, and this, too, notwithstanding the appropriation this year for pensions, owing to the increasing death rate among veterans of the Civil War, was eleven millions, and that for the construction of the Panama Canal, owing to the conclusion of that great work, was fourteen millions less than even those of the last fiscal year. What becomes of the charge of "profligate waste" by Republican Congresses in the light of these figures?

The Democratic platform "demands a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people," and here, in the words of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], are some of the instances showing how they observed the letter and spirit of this covenant with the people:

The new banking law creates five new offices with salaries of $12,000 each and increases the salary of the Comptroller of the Currency from $5,000, at which sum it had remained for 50 years, to $12,000 per annum.

The new Trade Commission act creates five commissioners at $10,000 each and a secretary at $5,000.

A new board of appeals, consisting of three members at $4,000 each, is created in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

For commercial attachés, to be appointed by and compensated at such salaries as the Secretary of Commerce may fix, and a clerk for each at $1,500, and for traveling expenses, the sum of $100,000 is appropriated for a year.

The salary of the private secretary to the Secretary of the Treasury is increased from $2,500 to $3,000, which means that the private secretaries of the other nine Cabinet officers must also be increased from $2,500 to $3,000.

A chief of division created less than a year ago under the income-tax law is increased from $2,500 to $3,500.

Six Assistant Attorneys General in the Department of Justice have their salaries increased from $5,000 to $7,500.

The salary of the assistant to the Attorney General was increased during the extra session on an urgent deficiency bill from $7,000 to $9,000.

The salaries of our diplomatic representatives to Argentina, Chile, and Spain were raised from $12,000 to $17,500 each per annum, and the three secretaries of the legations to these countries are increased from $2,625 to $3,000 each.

The mission to Paraguay and Uruguay is divided and a new minister authorized with a new salary of $10,000.

The only way to effect economy is to economize. Platform platitudes and campaign oratory are of no avail and will not satisfy taxpayers when the bills are presented for payment. The time for thoughtful consideration is before the bills are incurred. Better hit a slower gait than end a joy ride with disaster. In times when private business is compelled to exercise the strictest economy in order to survive the Government should be the last to set an example of unbridled extravagance. In the recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the advance-rate cases the railroads were told to economize and their net earnings would increase. Why does not the administration take this advice to heart? Why seek to crowd through a river and harbor bill against the strenuous and prolonged protests of Republicans in House and Senate, carrying fifty-three millions in cash and forty millions in continuing appropriations, when there was "a depleted and depleting Treasury"? Republicans saved Democracy against itself by reducing these amounts to a bare $20,000,000, and should receive the commendation of a grateful people. The Republicans paved the way for "a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government," but Democracy refused to follow.

A few voices from the Democratic side were raised in vain efforts to stem the ever-rising tide of extravagance and "profligate waste." The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on April 10 last, thus chided his recreant brethren:

Whenever I think of the horrible mess I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party I am tempted to quit my place. I am looking now at Democrats who seem to take amusement in soliciting votes on the floor of this House to overturn the Committee on Appropriations in its efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform. They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey their platform and to live up to the promises they made to the people. * * * My colleagues upon this floor seem either to be so indifferent to a very perilous situation for our party, or else, which I do not wish to believe, have so far forsaken Democratic practices and Democratic principles as not to deserve to continue in control of this Government.

Not only have the Democrats been guilty of gross extravagance, as thus admitted by one of their most distinguished floor leaders, but they have shown their customary inaptitude for the conduct of public business. When Democrats had control of Congress in Cleveland's time they failed to pass the appropriation bills until after the date they should have gone into effect. During the 16 years the Republicans were in power such delay never happened. During these last 3 years, with the Democrats in a majority in the House and with full responsibility for the passage of these bills, they never passed all of them before the commencement of the fiscal year for which the appropriations were made. This slothful conduct is indefensible and leads to waste and confusion.

CIVIL SERVICE UNDERMINED.

Not only has there been delay and extravagance in the matter of making appropriations, but grave assaults have been made during this Congress upon the spirit and letter of the civil-service law—a law designed to promote efficiency by insuring stability in office of the servants of the Government. So eager were our opponents to secure patronage that many offices, such as deputy revenue collectors, deputy marshals, assistant postmasters, and others, were taken from under the protection of this law to give opportunity for partisan appointments. In addition, new offices created by new legislation, with a pay roll of $4,000,000 per annum, were not placed in the classified service, but were left purely political.

When it was found that the individual income tax yielded less than half the amount estimated by the Treasury Department, its officials charged this failure to tax dodging, and at once asked for an appropriation, amounting to thousands of dollars, for tax ferrets, thus providing many lucrative and desirable appointments for those who had borne the heat of the day in political campaigns. With the widespread depression in business in no way attributable to the war, with passing of dividends and increasing receiverships, I predict that even with the aid of these officials the income taxes collected for the year 1914 will be less than those collected for 1913.

THE WAR TAX.

Taxation by way of stamp duties, such as proposed in the pending bill, has been resorted to during periods of crisis in our history. This bill is in large part a verbatim copy of the war-tax bill enacted in 1898 to meet the extraordinary expenses caused by the War with Spain. That was a Republican measure, and our opponents compliment us by adopting a plan of taxation which we in the hour of need found efficacious. But the circumstances now are very different from those which existed in 1898. Then we had an army of some 300,000 men to equip and place in the field. We were short of munitions of war, of uniforms, of medical and commissary supplies. All these had to be provided without delay, for we were at war by land and sea. Even under the pressure of such a crisis, when patriotism spurred men on to support their Government, the cry of opposition was heard. Our distinguished Speaker, Mr. CLARK, spoke and voted against the war-revenue bill of 1898, and the present leader of the majority, Mr. UNDERWOOD, bitterly assailed the bill, saying:

This tax will fall almost entirely on the hard-working and industrious artisans, merchants, mechanics, farmers, and professional men of the country, but not on idle wealth that is protected but never made to pay for the benefits received.

I know its features are partisan and unjust; they will oppress the masses of the people; they are unnecessary, and the same amount of revenue could be raised from sources that would equalize the burdens of taxation and not be felt by the people.

Now, with absolute peace within our own borders, and with neither war nor the rumors of war to frighten us, the same distinguished leader himself frames and introduces an almost identical bill, and appeals to Congress and the country to support him in his effort. His party, with only two or three exceptions, voted solidly in the House against the act of 1898 and withstood all appeals to patriotism. Now, the Republicans in the House, with like unanimity, voted against the present bill, not from any want of patriotism but because there are still a hundred million dollars in the general fund of the Treasury, three-fourths of which fund is deposited in favored banks, most of these banks being located in the South, and, further, because many of the funds appropriated by this more than billion-dollar session need not be all expended by department heads and subordinates before the expiration of this fiscal year, on June 30, 1915. Because Congress appropriates a hundred thousand dollars for a given purpose it does not thereby compel the department for whose benefit and upon whose request this sum was granted to spend the full amount. In many instances prudence and the exercise of a wise economy would dictate the expenditure of a less amount. If this principle were kept constantly in mind and enforced there would be no need of war taxes for months to come, and perhaps not at all, on account of the disturbance of commercial relations due to the conflict now raging in Europe. During all the years of Republican control a full Treasury was maintained, and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that during the last 10 years there was paid out of it, without bond issues, two hundred millions for the construction of the Panama Canal.

I am as sensitive to the demands of patriotism as any Member of this House, but with me sense and sanity fix the limitations within which I manifest it. Believing that at this time of general depression, when taxes are high "and the purchasing power of the people's toil is reduced," in the words of the Baltimore platform, I believe it is ill advised to still further burden the masses. I am all the more convinced of the rectitude of my position because of the necessity of reducing and not of increasing the cost of living.

Is there anyone who can successfully contend that the levy of over $100,000,000 by stamp duties and other means, as provided in the pending bill, will not increase the cost of living? This bill touches not merely the rich, but the thousands in moderate circumstances and thousands more who are poor. At a time when the cost of living is higher than ever before, what hypocrisy is there in the Democratic pledge to reduce this cost by levying taxes which will inevitably increase it! I do not envy Democracy its present plight. None are so blind as those who will not see. Verily, the ass is proving too weak to carry the load of government. The elephant will soon be called to take his place.

As indicating the general opposition to the pending bill, even among Democrats, I wish to read a resolution adopted September 26 by the Democratic county committee of Dane County, in my State. This county is the second largest in the State, and contains the city of Madison, our State capital. It is as follows:

We commend the action of those Members of Congress who favor reduction of expenses, thus obviating the necessity of a special war tax. We deprecate a war tax at this time, believing that provision could be made for any deficiency which might occur by drastic reductions in the appropriation acts and in general retrenchment of governmental expenses.

I am confident this resolution declares the sentiment of thousands of Democrats throughout the country, and the congressional elections on November 3 will give a fitting opportunity for its expression.

WHAT THE WAR TAX TAXES.

This bill as it passed the House is estimated to raise $105,000,000 in taxes, distributed as follows:

On fermented liquors	$32,500,000
Wines	6,000,000
Gasoline, etc	20,000,000
Special taxes	16,500,000
Stamp taxes	30,000,000

In order to clearly indicate the amount and character of these taxes, the following schedule is taken from the report of Mr. UNDERWOOD:

STAMP TAXES.

Articles upon which a stamp tax is levied and the rate of tax.

Bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness, etc., for each $100	$0.05
Certificates of stock, original issue, for each $100	.05
Certificates of stock, transfers, for each $100	.02
Sales of products at exchanges, for each $100	.01
Promissory notes, for each $100	.02
Express receipts	.01
Freight receipts or domestic bills of lading	.01
Bonds of indemnity and bonds not otherwise specified	.50
Certificate of profits, for each $100	.02
Certificate of damage	.25
Certificates not otherwise specified	.10
Broker's contract	.10
Conveyances, exceeding $100, for each $500	.50
Entry of goods at customhouse (according to value)	.25–$1.00
Entry for withdrawal of goods from customs bonded warehouse	.50
Insurance:
Life, on each $100 of the amount insured	.08
Marine, inland, and fire, on each $1 of premium charged	.0½
Casualty, fidelity, and guaranty, on each $1 of premium charged	.0½
Mortgages and conveyance in trust, exceeding $1,000, for each $1,500	.25
Passage ticket (according to value)	1.00–5.00
Power of attorney to vote	.10
Power of attorney to sell	.25
Protest of note, check, etc	.25
Sleeping and parlor car tickets	.02

While the Senate will make many important changes in and additions to this schedule and has already agreed to eliminate gasoline, the essential features will remain and become law. The taxation of promissory notes and mortgages hits the man already in debt. If one signs a deed or other conveyance of a certain amount, sends a package of freight or express, a telephone or telegraph message, takes out insurance, purchases a sleeping-car ticket or a ticket abroad, he must pay the tax.

While the bill limits the payment of the stamp taxes to the 31st of December, 1915, taxes when once levied are hard to revoke. If there is plausible need of further revenues by the end of next year, there will be strong temptation to retain the taxes. A wiser course would be to withhold action for the present and await the restoration of our foreign commerce and in the meantime exercise in every department of the Government a pitiless economy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have just listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], but I am not going to refer to the question of cotton. I simply want to make this statement, that when the gentleman from Texas depicts the conditions of the South he accurately depicts the conditions of the West. The South to-day is in no worse condition than the Pacific coast.

What I intend to talk upon for a short time is the question of our merchant marine.

The alarming condition in which we find ourselves to-day because we have no merchant marine is entirely due to our own inexcusable neglet. Those to-day who are most frantic in appeals for help are most to blame for our present situation. It has been the cotton raiser of the South and the corn grower of the Middle West that has prevented us to-day from having a merchant marine in this time of great stress to carry our foreign commerce and to bring home American citizens now stranded in Europe. While we to-day regret this calamity that causes all to suffer, yet, in the fact that the farmer of the South and the Middle West is hardest hit there is a sort of retributive justice. The condition that has come upon us was a danger that was perfectly apparent to anyone who has studied that question. I make no claim to be either a prophet or a statesman, but I have given some study to the shipping question. For a decade I have been trying to arouse the Congress and the country to our danger of being without ships to carry our foreign commerce. In a speech made on the floor of the House on February 27, 1907, I used this language:

The pride, the patriotism, the honor, and the safety of the Republic imperatively demand that, whatever the cost may be, no power shall drive our flag from the sea.

Our foreign commerce is to-day almost completely in control of foreign nations. We are almost entirely dependent upon foreign ships to reach foreign markets. Most of the many million dollars' worth of products that go abroad each year must depend on a foreign flag to reach their purchaser. What would be our condition to-day if one of the leading shipping nations should become involved in war, or, worse still, if two such countries should go to war with each other and should withdraw from our carrying trade, as they would, for war purposes the vessels now engaged in carrying American commerce? We can get some estimate of what would follow such a war by studying the results of England's little contest with the Boers; and, strange as it may seem, the interest first and worst hurt was not the shipper, nor the importer, nor the exporter, nor the manufacturer, but it was the farmer. The farmer discovered then that he was interested in shipping. England withdrew her best ships immediately and substituted old, slower, and inferior vessels to carry our trade. Not only were inferior vessels substituted, but freight rates were immediately increased more than 30 per cent. From some ports on the Pacific coast freights were increased more than 150 per cent. On the Pacific coast the farmers had the price of their wheat reduced 25 cents per bushel because of the increased price charged for foreign charters. England levied tribute upon the farmers of the Pacific coast to pay the expense of the Boer War. She compelled every farmer in America to contribute for that purpose.

If such damage could come from a war so insignificant, with our policy of each year more and more placing our commerce in the absolute control of foreign ships, what would be the results that would follow in case of a war between England and Germany or between either of them and another first-class power? Our foreign commerce would be destroyed, our vast over-sea commerce would be paralyzed, our crops would rot unharvested in the fields. Industrially this Nation would suffer all the horrors of war. The probability of such a war, of such conditions arising, is much greater than is the probability of our ever having any use for the magnificent Navy we are constructing. While we most willingly spend millions each year for our Navy to protect our commerce, we are unwilling to spend anything to prevent its destruction by conditions more likely to arise at any time when our Navy would be entirely useless. We are willing to spend millions to protect our commerce in time of war, but refuse to spend anything to protect it in the more perilous times of peace.

And what was the response to this appeal? What was the answer made to those who pointed out the pending danger to our country that is now upon us? The only reply was "subsidy." Yet we have already lost more money than it would have taken to subsidize a merchant marine sufficient to carry our commerce for a quarter of a century, to say nothing of our lost trade and prestige. We are now daily expecting to be called upon to raise a hundred million dollars by war taxes—a war tax brought upon us in times of peace simply because we did not have the intelligence and patriotism to prepare for what could be plainly foreseen. This refusal to do anything for our merchant marine has been principally due to the fact that some gentlemen in order to keep in public place constantly cried out that they were against a "subsidy." If this European war lasts a year, it will cost this Nation ten times more than it would have cost us to build up the greatest merchant marine that ever floated and maintain it for half a century. Let it not be forgotten that the only ships that are to-day under the American flag running across the Atlantic Ocean are subsidized ships; that they are running to-day only because a Republican Congress had the wisdom and patriotism to place upon the statute books the subsidy act of 1891, an act that has been constantly condemned and denounced by those so-called patriots that have opposed our building a merchant marine. But where is the man to-day who would strike down this subsidy act of 1891? Where is the man in America to-day who regrets that it is upon our statute books?

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. My friend from Washington, with myself, was a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for eight long years. The Republican Party was in power for 16 years. Why did you not put through a subsidy measure if you think so much of it and think it a wise and prudent and patriotic thing to do?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, but I must say that his memory must be a little deficient. After I made that speech, from which I have just quoted, this House passed a subsidy law. It went over to the Senate, and there in that body it was filibustered to death by two Democratic Senators.

If that bill, filibustered to death in the Senate by two southern Democrats in 1901, had gone upon the statute books, we would to-day have 50 or more great modern steamships upon the Atlantic under the American flag. We would have one-half that number or more upon the Pacific. These vessels could have at once brought home all American citizens in Europe. They would have saved this Nation millions of dollars already lost in their trade. They would be ready to serve us in time of war and we would not be placed in the perilous condition that we are to-day with our troops in Mexico and our transports being used to bring civilians from Europe back to this country. If this law had gone upon the statute books it would have saved us all this loss, and it would have saved us the humiliation of having advertised to the world our ignorance, our weakness, and our neglect. But those who shouted "subsidy" loudest, and who posed as great patriots in fighting these bills, are now standing before the country as the demonstrated enemies of the Nation's best interest and as the unconscious helpers of the great foreign steamship combine that has lived and fattened at the expense of the American people.

I well remember that a distinguished Democrat, then the leader of the Democratic minority in the House, now a member of another body, replied to my plea for a merchant marine in the speech to which I have referred, that it was one of the most eloquent appeals for the American shipowner to get his hand into the National Treasury that he had ever heard. This same gentleman to-day, now that the conditions have come upon us that I predicted would come, is frantic to throw open the doors of the National Treasury to help cotton growers of the South. He and his party are willing to spend millions now to secure a lot of foreign second-class ships, built by foreign cheap labor, to relieve them in this emergency, but they were unwilling then to spend anything to secure first-class ships built in American yards by American labor. For the first time in 25 years the subsidy cry of the demagogue is stilled in the presence of this great national emergency. The Democratic Party that has so long denounced subsidy once more repudiates its platform and now passes a bill that contains a direct subsidy provision. Not only does this bill, passed by a Democratic Congress and signed by a Democratic President, propose to pay a direct ship subsidy, but it is proposed to pay this subsidy directly out of the National Treasury to foreign-built ships. This is a subsidy proposition that the Republican Party never advocated.

The Republican Party has advocated a ship subsidy, but only that it be paid to American ships. Of all subsidy provisions that have ever been written upon our statute books this provision of this Democratic law is the most indefensible. They have gone from one extreme to the other. From denouncing the proposal to pay a subsidy to American ships built in American yards they now favor paying a subsidy to foreign-built ships built by foreign cheap labor. Of all popular cries that ever went up in this country for political purposes only this cry of "subsidy" was the most hypocritical and cowardly. It deceived a great portion of the American people, and this fight against a so-called subsidy was largely created and greatly fostered through that portion of the American press that received a subsidy amounting to millions annually, paid in the shape of advertising by the giant foreign steamship combine. These advertisements were often accompanied by prepared editorials and press notices pointing out the great evil of Americans doing anything to build up our own shipping. These editorials constantly denounced subsidy, and declared that it was to the great advantage of the American people to have their commerce carried under a foreign flag. Think of the good faith and patriotism of publications of this character taking advertisements and receiving the cash for them, and publishing these furnished attacks upon shipping legislation! Talk of being reformers or the friends of the people! Think of the good faith and patriotism of the publishers, and especially of the magazines in this country that denounce subsidy, when the publishers in this Nation receive a direct subsidy from the National Treasury of more than $63,000,000 each year! This $63,000,000 is paid to these publishers "to make profitable an unprofitable business." It is paid out of the Treasury of the United States by the people directly to these publishers. The periodicals in this Nation would want to start a revolution in this country if any other industry was so favored and subsidized as they are. It is rather a discouraging lesson in patriotism to take up one of these public periodicals during the last 10 years and see its great advertisements of foreign steamships for which millions of dollars were paid, and then remember the giving of millions of dollars out of the Treasury to keep in circulation these periodicals, and then read on its editorial page an inspired article by these "holier than thou" publishers about the iniquity of the Government giving a subsidy to build up our merchant marine. There never was any sincerity in this "subsidy" cry in practice in Congress or out of it. We subsidize everything in this country except our shipping. We subsidize argiculture more than $20,000,000 annually. We subsidize mining. We subsidize our rivers and harbors more than $50,000,000 annually, largely to accommodate foreign ships. We voted a subsidy to kill the cotton-boll weevil, to kill the cattle tick and the gypsy moth, and for ten thousand other purposes. We subsidize everything on land, and why? Because on land a specific part of every subsidy is spent in somebody's district, or directly benefits some one in some one's district.

For 12 years I have been a Member of this body, and I challenge any man—Democrat, Republican, or nondescript—to show that he ever voted against any subsidy of any kind or character, great or small, that was to be expended in his own district. You may search the records in vain and you will find no such exalted individual in either the House or the Senate. If there is any such person, let him stand up, that he may be photographed and let the country look upon his benign countenance. [Applause on the Republican side.] I notice no one is standing up.

Here is the solution of the opposition to a ship subsidy: No part of it would be expended directly in the district of the man who voted against it. But to-day conditions have changed, and many of these patriotic gentlemen now believe that the money that they would take out of the Treasury to secure foreign ships will directly benefit their district, and, of course, they are in favor of it. And those who have formerly denounced it the loudest are now the most clamorous for a bill of this character.

NO RELIEF FROM THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

There will be no great American merchant marine built up under a Democratic administration. The Democratic Party is irrevocably committed against any remedy that would be effective. The Democratic Party is hopelessly committed to that sweet human delusion that you can "get something for nothing." The Democratic Party is always wedded to something free. Free ships, free trade, free silver is the trinity of their deluded faith. For years they met every attempt to help American shipping by denouncing it as "subsidy" and declaring that the one thing necessary was free ships.

They wailed about an imaginary shipping trust and insisted that if only the American citizen was permitted to go abroad and buy his ships these foreign-built vesels under the American flag would soon crowd the seas. It was utterly useless to call their attention to the facts. On the floor of the House I called attention to the utter absurdity of such claims. I pointed out that it was not the cost of the ship but the cost of operating the shipping that had driven the American flag from the sea. At that time I used this language:

A free-ship policy in this country would not be of any effect.
If the American owner can not run at profit the vessel he already owns, certainly the most stupid would not contend that he would buy and run another, however low the purchase price might be.

But, notwithstanding these facts, so plain that none could be deceived, the Democratic Party continued to insist that the only remedy was free ships, and they used this argument on every occasion to defeat any bill that would have been of real assistance. Finally a bill was reported from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I was a member, having a free-ship section. Much to the surprise of many of my Democratic and Republican friends, I favored this provision and declared on the floor of the House that I favored it, because if we adopted it it would demonstrate its utter worthlessness and would put an end to this free-ship propaganda. A free-ship provision was finally enacted into law in the Panama Canal act. It has been upon the statute books for more than two years. My prediction has proven correct. Not a single ship has taken the American flag as the result of that legislation. The falsity of the free-ship argument has been fully demonstrated, so much so that even the Democratic Party no longer uses it.

But even this has not been sufficient to divorce the Democratic Party from its policy of delusion and folly of "getting something for nothing." It still advocates the policy of free trade on the seas. They call this policy a "discriminating duty." It was proposed to reduce the duty on goods carried in American ships 5 per cent. Of all the absurd, pathetically ridiculous propositions ever seriously urged in Congress as an efficient remedy to build up an American merchant marine, this proposition stands first.

But, as with free ships, it was no use to present facts and figures. So this absurdity was written into the Underwood tariff bill. The history of American legislation furnishes no example of a more indefensible act of Congress. In the first place, we had but few American ships, so the result would have been practically negligible in any event, as the amount was not sufficient to cause an additional American ship to be run or to cause one already running to make an additional voyage. What little influence it would have would be to open our markets to foreign goods and not foreign markets to our goods. If such provision would have any influence whatever it would be to increase imports and decrease exports. In other words, it was a free-trade proposition. What little help it would give was a mere gratuity, a pure subsidy that went either to vessels already receiving a subsidy from the Government or to vessels operated by cheap Chinese crews. To secure this subsidy these favored vessels were not required to perform any service for the Government or to give any additional services whatever for the benefit of American commerce.

Of course, between here and South America and between here and the Orient is where we are most greatly in need of American ships. But this free-trade provision of the Underwood bill in the trade with these countries would not give sufficient amount to put a "painted ship upon a painted ocean." A large part of our imports from South America and the Orient is upon the free list. Taking the actual figures from the customhouses, a reduction of 5 per cent of the duty would give the great vessels of the Pacific Mail not more than $5,000 for each round trip, while the vessels of its Japanese competitor, making exactly the same voyage, receive $100,000 in gold from the Japanese Government for each round trip.

I showed from the reports of the collector of customs from the Puget Sound district that this 5 per cent provision, if the vessel got it all, would give the giant Minnesota, the greatest vessel on all the Pacific Ocean, for each round trip of more than 12,000 miles less than $2,000, hardly sufficient to pay the salary of the cook, although if this great vessel was subsidized in the same amount as her Japanese competitor she would receive about $150,000 each round trip.

The figures from the Treasury Department show that this reduction of 5 per cent as proposed by the Underwood bill, if the vessels received the entire 5 per cent, would not be sufficient, as I stated when discussing the proposition here on the floor of the House, to run a line of Indian canoes between here and South America.

Under the provision of the Underwood law, a tramp vessel coming from Europe to this country would receive greater compensation for carrying a single case of champagne than a modern ocean liner would receive for bringing $5,000,000 worth of rubber, or hides, or coffee, or meat, from the distant coast of South America. No words can demonstrate the utter absurdity of this provision of the present tariff law as do the Government official figures that I have placed in the RECORD.

But nothing could convince the Democrats that they could not "get something for nothing." They had to try this provision as they had to try free ships before they were satisfied. But even now I understand that some of the worshipers of free trade are not entirely cured of their delusion as applied to our merchant marine.

It has been repeatedly declared that the 5 per cent discriminating duty provision in the Underwood law is the plan followed by "our fathers"—under which we once had a merchant marine that was the glory of the seas and the pride of the American Nation. Nothing could possibly be further from the facts. The plan of our fathers was to increase the duty on goods carried in foreign ships. The plan of the Underwood bill is to decrease the duty on goods carried in American ships. The plan of the fathers affected all imports alike, whether dutiable or free. The Democratic law affects only goods that are dutiable. The plan of the fathers was protection. The plan of Democracy is free trade. The plan of our fathers was effective. The plan of Democracy is ridiculous.

The plan of our fathers suited their time. It was effective and it showed their wisdom and their patriotism, but in this modern world of commerce the plan of our fathers would be as antiquated as would their ancient flintlock rifles, with which they gained their liberty, in a war to-day against modern weapons.

The Democratic Party has forever pledged itself against direct aid to shipping and against any increase of duty on imports. There is but one other way left, and that remedy the decadent Democracy of Jefferson and Jackson are already claiming is the only remedy, and that is the socialistic remedy of the Government buying, owning, and operating its own vessels. Six months ago I made the prediction that before the end of this administration the Democratic Party would be insisting on the Government buying and operating ships as a way to get a merchant marine. There could be no doubt that they would do this if they did anything, for it was the only method left open to them.

This socialistic proposition is already with us. The European war demonstrated the result of our folly. We were reaping our reward. A demand came for American ships. This time the cry did not come from the shipper of the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts; it did not come from the American manufacturer. Cotton was hit. All cry of "subsidy" and "graft" and "special interest" died suddenly upon the lips of Democracy. There was a frenzied and hysterical demand that the Treasury be thrown open and that the Government, regardless of cost, must come to the relief of the cotton planter. The very men that had for years blocked every attempt to prepare for such an emergency were now the ones most frantic for "subsidy." These excited gentlemen are still so feverish and hysterical that they do not even yet see the inconsistency of their present attitude or realize their responsibility in bringing upon the country our present deplorable but inexcusable condition.

At present it appears that the plan that the Democratic Party will finally follow will be Government ownership, with all the extravagance, incompetency, corruption, and scandal that such plan must bring.

Those who have long been abusing subsidy the loudest are now loudest in their demand for this socialistic proposition. They no longer care who makes a profit or who pays the expense so long as their constituents get immediate relief.

THE RECENT LAW.

The bill just passed may bring some temporary relief, but it will not be of any permanent benefit unless it is followed by other legislation. As soon as the war is over the foreign cheap ship, with its foreign crew, subsidized by its Government, will soon force all the vessels that take advantage of the present law again under a foreign flag. So transparent and plain is this proposition that most of the ships we are purchasing in good faith will be bought with this very purpose in view. It is the only possible way that the purchaser of a ship can have any reasonable hope of a profitable return upon his investment. It is argued that there are already many ships under foreign flags that are owned by Americans, and that these ships under the present law will seek American registry. This they may do, but it will probably be because they wish to be protected from seizure by foreign nations. But even if this class of vessels does come under the American flag, it will do but little toward relieving the present situation, because they will continue in the same trade where they now run. Take, for illustration, the United Fruit Co. vessels, now under the English flag. They may take the American flag. It will protect them from any danger of seizure by German warships, but these vessels will undoubtedly continue to run in the same business in which they are now running.

I will yield, even if I have but one minute left, to any gentleman who will stand up and tell me what benefit has come from that law. Not a vessel has come under the flag since that law went upon the statute books, except those belonging to great corporations, with a single exception.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman said he would yield. I would like to have the gentleman say whether or not in passing that law allowing for the registry of foreign-built vessels we did not at the same time so limit their uses as to leave them just exactly where they would have been if they had flown a foreign flag?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You did exactly what the Democratic Party always does in regard to merchant-marine legislation. You placed something upon the statute books that was of no effect. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was absolutely absurd. Just as your free-ship proposition was absurd, just as your discriminating-duty proposition was absurd, so you followed it with this last absurdity.

The only people who have been benefited by this recent law are the great corporations that own these vessels. They have been protected from seizure by hostile warships. It has been a benefit to them, but they still run exactly where they ran before. They still carry the same traffic; they are still performing exactly the same duties. The Government has not benefited in a single instance. Not a single additional ton of American commerce has been carried because of that law. The only exception to these great corporations is one vessel on the Pacific coast, a German vessel that has been renamed the Sacramento, but which will probably be seized by an English naval vessel the moment it gets outside of the Golden Gate.

The only thing that is left for the Democratic Party is the socialistic one of Government ownership, and that is the one that we are now told must be passed when we meet again. What is that proposition, in a few words? That the Government shall buy foreign cheap ships, built by foreign cheap labor, place upon them foreign seamen—Chinese, Lascars, or any that they can get—man them by foreign officers, and the only thing about the vessel American will be the flag; and unless this administration changes its policy, even that may be manufactured abroad. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] That is the proposed Democratic ship-subsidy legislation. I want my friends on that side of the aisle to remember this statement: Not only do you propose to take these foreign cheap ships and man them with foreigners, but you propose to subsidize them under the subsidy act of 1891. If we can only get a merchant marine composed of foreign-built ships, manned by foreigners, and still have to give them a subsidy, then I for one do not think it is worth the price. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the Government should go into the business of buying and running ships, then the present law would be of little or no benefit whatever, for it is hardly to be supposed that any American citizen in good faith would buy vessels and undertake to run them in competition with the Government, with the United States Treasury back of the scheme to meet the loss that would occur.

I see no hope of any merchant marine as long as the Democratic Party controls the country, for they stand where they have always stood—absolutely opposed to anything that will permanently build up American shipping. Repeating a statement I made upon the floor of the House many years ago when arguing this same question:

> It is useless to attempt to persuade them to see the error of their way. The Democratic Party is for free trade. It is wedded to a corpse; it never unites with the living. When you attempt to convert the Democratic Party, when you attempt to persuade it to favor any proposition that is right, to vote for any policy that is for the general good, in the language of Holy Writ, "You might just as well fill your belly with the east wind." "Yea, they have chosen their own ways, and their souls delight in their abominations."

IF WE WERE AT WAR.

Our financial loss by this war in Europe because of our being without a merchant marine can never be measured. It is beyond human calculation. But vast as it is, by comparison it is as nothing to what we would lose by having no merchant marine if we were to become involved in war with some powerful nation. We have practically no transports for our Army and practically no auxiliary for our Navy. If we were at war to-day, we could with greatest difficulty, notwithstanding the Panama Canal is now open, because of our lack of American ships, get our battleship squadron from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. If our battleship squadron were there it could only fight along the shore. It could only be used as a mere coast defense, because of lack of merchant ships to support it.

When our battleship squadron went around the world it could only do so because we employed foreign ships to carry the coal, a thing we could not do in time of war. Had war been declared while that trip was being made, all these foreign ships would immediately have left our service, and the best that we could have done would have been to have run our mighty battleship squadron into a neutral port and there dismantled the vessels and abandoned them until the end of the war. Our condition is little better to-day. Now we have but few transports, and most of these are old and antiquated and utterly unfit for over-seas voyages. With a few of these transports sent to Europe to bring home stranded Americans, our army at Vera Cruz is now practically helpless. We have no vessels left to either send them reinforcements or to bring them away.

If war were declared to-day, we could not get 25,000 soldiers to the Philippines in a year if the fate of the Nation depended upon it.

A navy is practically worthless without a merchant marine. We build a navy for the protection of our country. A merchant marine is as essential for the common defense as a navy. Why should it not be the business of the Nation to provide the one the same as the other? They are both for one and the same purpose. To build a navy without a merchant marine as an auxiliary is an inexcusable waste of public money. To build a navy and not a merchant marine is criminal stupidity that may any day threaten the integrity of the Republic.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced House joint resolution 372, "Providing for a national security commission."

This resolution calls for an investigation the purpose of which is to ascertain whether the United States is prepared for war. To-day I am addressing this body because I need help in pressing that resolution to a hearing.

A DELIBERATE DELUSION.

For a dozen years I have sat here like a coward, and I have listened to men say that in time of war we could depend for our defense upon our National Guard and our Naval Militia, and I have known all of the time that it was not so. I am a former militiaman myself. I am a veteran of the Spanish War, and I tell you that any such doctrine is the supremest folly. Under that delusion in 10 short years we have allowed our Navy to slough away from a strong second to England, until now it is a very bad third and is fast sinking to fourth or fifth place. The theory in this country that we can create an army and a navy right off the reel is totally and entirely wrong After war breaks out you can not improvise a dreadnought, you can not improvise a torpedo, you can not improvise a 42-centimeter howitzer, you can not improvise a traveling concrete plant, you can not improvise plants for inflating Zeppelin balloons, you can not improvise sailors.

All those things must be provided in time of peace, and yet we are neglecting them. And, my friends, you can not make a fighting regiment out of a militia organization until you have either eliminated 20 per cent of the personnel of that militia organization or stiffened their resistance against the instinct of self-preservation. I have been a militiaman. I have seen militiamen go into the Spanish War. Many a lad enters the National Guard in times of peace and then is ashamed not to volunteer when war breaks out. He goes to war half-heartedly, hoping against hope that when the time comes he will be brave. Perhaps he may be brave, but often and often the spirit is willing and yet the flesh is weak. That 20 per cent I spoke of is quite enough to disorganize the best material which ever went to war.

The militia has seldom been dependable in a tight place in the past. You have got to go through the long, weary process of cutting out the timid and hardening the rest before your National Guard regiment will become an effective Volunteer regiment.

THE STORY OF THE SPANISH WAR.

"Oh, yes," somebody says to me, "that is the same old story that we have been hearing so long—that the United States is not prepared for war." My friends, it is the same old story, and it is a true old story. We were not prepared for war when the Spanish War broke out in 1898 and we were not prepared for war when the Spanish War ended.

At the end of April, 1898, war was declared against Spain, and there came a call for volunteers, for 125,000 only. Afterwards, in May, came a call for 75,000 more volunteers. Did those volunteers mobilize, all equipped, rushing to the front like the coming of the wind? By no means. A great many of those volunteers have not mobilized yet. Did you know, Mr. Speaker, that in the Spanish War a great many States of this Union were unable to supply their entire quota until after the war was ended? If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Gen. HULINGS, were here to-day, he would tell you that on the 9th day of August, 1898, at Coamo, P. R., three months and a half after war was declared, he led his men into action, armed with rifles which had only been in their hands for three days. In Cuba during the Spanish War, in the month of July, two regiments went into battle armed with short-range Springfield rifles, shooting black-powder cartridges. There in the press gallery sits Sergt. Goodwin, of Company K, Third Texas. Were he on the floor he could tell you how his company for five months had to put up with antique black-powder Springfields. To be sure, many of those valuable relics were at least safe, for they had no triggers and no plungers.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I can assure the gentleman that the situation is not as bad as that to-day. We have 800,000 rifles of the Springfield 1904 pattern, and that is the greatest reserve that this country has ever had at any one time.

Mr. GARDNER. I was coming to our rifle reserve. On my right another Spanish War veteran, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, reminds me that those two regiments in Cuba of which I spoke were armed with ramrod bayonets instead of intrenching tools.

DEAF TO EVIDENCE.

Let us see if the situation is much better to-day. The naval board is continually dinning into our ears a story of the unpreparedness of the United States for war. Every time he issues a report, Gen. Wood tells us the same thing about the Army. He appeals to us to arise from our lethargy and take an interest in these questions which are vital to the Nation. Yet we go on slumbering and gibbering and scattering money for all sorts of projects wherever the votes grow thickest, and I am just as bad as anyone else in that respect. What is the matter with us? Are we blind? Are we crazy? Do we not see? Of course we see, but we know that every boy in the United States is brought up to believe that we can "lick" all creation, and we are ashamed, we are afraid, to go to our constituents and tell them the truth. I have been afraid all these dozen years to turn around and say to the National Guard in my district, "We can not depend on the greater part of the National Guard to do effective service in time of war." In all the dozen years that I have known that fact until this minute I have never said so.

We Congressmen have been salving our consciences by trying to believe that no one would dare attack the United States. Are you so confident of that assumption now, gentlemen? Do you believe that if, after this war, Germany found the Monroe doctrine standing in her way—Germany or any other powerful nation—do you feel so sure that she would pay any attention to that doctrine of ours if the redundancy of her population forced her to look about for colonial outlets?

THE MONROE DOCTRINE AND ASIATIC EXCLUSION.

The United States by the Monroe doctrine has said to the world, "You must not colonize in Mexico and you must not colonize in South America—rich, fertile South America. We do not intend to colonize there ourselves, but you shall not colonize there, either. You shall not be allowed to overflow America with colonies recruited from your teeming population." Do you believe that we can maintain any such doctrine unless we are prepared to fight for it? Then, again, we have looked square in the eye of the most military nation which Asia has ever known, and we have said, "We will have none of you within our borders." Do you suppose a proud people like the Japanese will continue to listen with equanimity to a doctrine like that, unless behind that doctrine lies a force which can put it into effect? Perhaps men may say that the Monroe doctrine and the Asiatic exclusion doctrine are prompted by national selfishness. So be it. I concur in both doctrines. I am ready to battle for them and I am ready to pay the bill for enforcing them.

Possibly the world may think that this country is a dog in the manger in its attitude toward South America and Mexico. At all events let us not be toothless dogs in the manger, who bark noisily, but when it comes to biting are found wanting.

THE NAVY.

I believe that our naval school at Annapolis leads the world. My race prejudice leads me to believe that perhaps English-speaking men make a little the best sailors in the world. There our advantages end. Let us try not to fool ourselves. Competent officers and brave men will not offset the difference between a 6-inch gun and a 12-inch gun.

How many men do you think we need in order to man the modest Navy which we have? We need from 75,000 to 100,000 men. And how many do you think that we have? We have just about 50,000 men and some 9,000 Naval Militia. Before we can mobilize our entire fleet, if it is all worth mobilizing, which it is not, we must enlist approximately 41,000 raw recruits, many of whom never saw the sea in their whole lives.

We have been reading about the exploits of the submarine which the Germans call U.9. We are told that she sank three British cruisers by three successive torpedoes. Perhaps you think we might do the same thing. We might if we had the torpedoes, but do you realize that we have on the average only one long-range torpedo, built or building, for each torpedo tube with which our vessels are supplied?

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is, and I ask if it be correct, that the United States has spent more on its Navy in recent years per year than any nation except Great Britain; that we have exceeded annually the naval expenditure of Germany by twelve or fifteen million dollars. Is not that the fact?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know. What effect does that have on the argument?

Mr. BORLAND. Under those conditions ought we not to have a better Navy?

Mr. GARDNER. I can not tell the gentleman. I am talking about the results, not about the causes. I do not wish to go into controversial matters of that sort. I know the answer and so does the gentleman who interrupted me. Construction is expensive in this country and our crews are highly paid. The German crews are unpaid, I think.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, we have only one long-range torpedo for each torpedo tube. You might almost as well have one projectile for each gun, except that torpedoes cost $8,000 each, and they are said to take nearly one year to build.

The plans of modern warfare on the sea require fast scouts to keep in touch with the enemy and find out where he is. These scouts must have a minimum speed of 30 knots an hour. How many such scouts do you suppose we have? Mr. Speaker, we have only three of these scouts with which to obtain our information. Germany has 14 fast scouts, and Great Britain has 31. How about the great fighting weapon, the ship which must lie across the ocean paths and intercept the enemy? How about the dreadnought and the dreadnought cruiser, the great, strong fighting men-of-war? Let us see how we stand in that respect. Great Britain has 42 dreadnoughts and dreadnought cruisers built and building. Germany has 26. We have only 12, and 3 just authorized. "Oh," you say, "the day of dreadnoughts has gone by; it is submarines which we want." I do not agree with you that the dreadnought's day has passed, but most certainly I believe that we need a powerful fleet of submarines. Let us see how we stand in that respect. Great Britain has 64 submarines, and we are fourth on the list. So it goes—we are short of nearly every kind of vessel and nearly every kind of armament. The longer it takes to build things, by some strange chance it seems as if the shorter we were of them.

Now, if we have not got a fleet, ship for ship, which matches the fleet which comes against us, we probably can not stop that opposing fleet. If we can not stop his fleet, the enemy can land his troops anywhere on the coast of the United States that he sees fit. We have no Army wherewith to oppose him.

THE ARMY.

Do you know what we have got in the way of an Army? Do you know what we have got with which to oppose 4,000,000 trained men, which happens to be the war strength of the German Army? Do you realize that we have only about 85,000 regulars and about 120,000 militia? Are those militia trained? Why, Mr. Speaker, 60 per cent of the men in the militia who are armed with a rifle do not know how to use it properly. Sixty per cent last year were unable to qualify even as third-class marksmen.

Half of that 60 per cent—30 per cent—did not even try to qualify with the rifle. That is all we have got to defend us. What is the use of talking this arrant humbug any more to the country? I am telling you the truth. That is what we have got to face. But I do not blame you gentlemen. I blame the inflated optimism which has led us to believe that we can whip all creation.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said, it is a fact that at last we have nearly one million modern rifles on which we can depend. How about our artillery? Let us see what Gen. Wood, the Chief of Staff, said in his report last year. He tells us of the "alarming condition of shortage" in our field artillery guns and ammunition. Present-day events are showing that it is mighty dangerous to be weak in artillery.

Of course, it is evident that our main defense must be the Navy. This country will not tolerate these huge European land armaments. But at all events we can vastly increase the Regular Army without putting an undue burden on the taxpayers. Furthermore, we can equip it with plenty of the latest artillery; we can equip it with plenty of the latest machines for fighting in the air; we can double the number of our officers; we can treble the number of our noncommissioned officers; and, by the way, all England to-day is posted with advertisements offering inducements for old noncommissioned officers to rejoin the colors.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How long does it require to manufacture the ordinary field artillery?

Mr. GARDNER. The 3s?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I do not know how many "3s" there are.

Mr. GARDNER. No one knows how long it takes to manufacture the 42-centimeter guns, because they are quite new in war. I understand that it takes a year to manufacture certain kinds of cannon, but I believe that it can be done more expeditiously in the Krupp factory than in the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I am speaking of the character of field artillery that we have now.

Mr. GARDNER. A member of the Committee on Military Affairs on my right tells me that it takes nine months to make the ordinary field artillery; that is, the horse artillery.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman will pardon me. The answer usually made is that it takes a long time to build a navy, but that we could very readily put an army in the field, because we could get the men.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman has followed my argument he knows that I believe that we can not get the men in a short space of time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I believe so, too. I believe as the gentleman does. It would be utterly impossible for us to equip the Army with artillery under 12 months, it matters not how much money we were willing to spend.

Mr. GARDNER. If you want to build this enormous German artillery, which is drawn by two motors and pushed by a third, no one knows how long it will take to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not understand the gentleman's statement just now. Was it that we could not get the men, or what was it?

Mr. GARDNER. In my opinion it would take a long time to get the men. I have stated my own belief that militia must not be depended upon for our defense.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the gentleman what is the need, then, of exposing our weakness to the world at this particular time?

Mr. GARDNER. That is what gentlemen have been saying right along. Meanwhile we have gone ahead telling our boys that we can whip the world without half trying. The gentleman says that we must not tell the world of our weakness. The fact is that foreigners already perceive our weakness a great deal more clearly than the American people do.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The fact is that the American people are the only people who do not know it. Is not that a fact?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has referred to the report of Gen. Leonard Wood of last year in reference to our inefficiency in the artillery branch of our establishment. Does not the gentleman know we appropriated some millions of dollars for the increase of the artillery in the last military appropriation bill?

CONCLUSION.

Mr. GARDNER. I know there has been an improvement in artillery, but what I am contending for is a radical change, not a palliative. The whole matter lies deeper than Congress. The trouble is that we have never dared to tell the people that they are living in a fool's paradise, for fear that we should antagonize somebody and perhaps incur the charge that we are revealing our weakness to foreign nations, as if there were any secret about our weakness which we could conceal if we tried. The truth is that each one of us is afraid that some National Guard man in his district will say, "Why, that man GARDNER says I am no good. I will teach him." That is why the people of the United States have not yet awakened to the understanding that 42-centimeter guns and superdreadnoughts present stronger arguments than past victories and present treaties.

APPENDIX.

Statement given to the press October 15, 1914, by Congressman GARDNER, of Massachusetts, upon the introduction of House joint resolution 372, "Providing for a national security commission:"

TOTALLY UNPREPARED FOR WAR.

I have introduced this resolution to investigate the military status of the United States, because I know that a public searchlight will open the eyes of Americans to a situation which is being concealed from them.

The United States is totally unprepared for a war, defensive or offensive, against a real power. In my opinion, the effect of the vast sums of money spent by Mr. Carnegie in his peace propaganda has been to blind Americans to the fact that our national security from a military point of view is undermined.

Nearly every Army and Navy officer to whom I have spoken tells me the same story of inadequate security. I have yet to speak to a single member of either the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives in whose judgment I have confidence who does not, in private, make exactly the same admission. Yet all these gentlemen seem to consider it their duty to refrain from making any public statement.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

We are the most prosperous nation on earth, and to the south of us lies the wonderful South American continent, which we have closed to European colonization by the Monroe doctrine. I simply can not understand how any intelligent student of history can fail to see that we are impotent to defend ourselves and to enforce the Monroe doctrine by moral suasion and financial might alone.

THE GERMAN MENACE TO DEMOCRACY.

The time has not yet come when the United States can afford to allow the martial spirit of her sons to be destroyed, and all the Carnegie millions in the world will not silence those of us who believe that bullets can not be stopped with bombast nor powder vanquished by platitudes.

It is true that with respect to the present European war my views are not those of a neutral. I am entirely convinced that the German cause is unholy and, moreover, a menace to the principles of democracy. Furthermore, I believe that the god of battles will visit defeat upon the Germans.

OUR SECURITY DEMANDS IMMEDIATE ACTION.

But no matter which side wins we must remember that since the beginning of time victorious nations have proved headstrong and high-handed. We must begin at once to reorganize our military strength if we expect to be able to resist high-handedness when the day of necessity comes.

Of course, all this is unpopular doctrine. It would be far easier for me to declare that all is well and that our present military establishment, coupled with our National Guard and our Naval Militia, is to be depended upon for our defense. Unfortunately I can not bring myself to believe any such thing.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14233. An act to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes;

H. J. Res. 241. Joint resolution for the appointment of five members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and

H. J. Res. 362. Joint resolution to correct an error in the enrollment of certain Indians enumerated in Senate Document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, enacted into law in the Indian appropriation act approved August 1, 1914.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 196. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission to the Southern Commercial Congress to place a tablet at Gamboa, Canal Zone, as a memorial to the late Senator John T. Morgan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COTTON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves the balance of his time—20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yielded to me the remainder of his time. I yield to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] is recognized.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I merely rise for the purpose of asking leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the cotton situation in the South.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the cotton situation in the South. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am glad even at this late day to obtain time in which to discuss for a little while the cotton situation in the South. For days and weeks I, with others on this side, have tried to get this question before the House, but some who represent interests that will speculate upon the cotton producer's misfortune and profit by his distress have repeatedly interposed their objections, and no other way for bringing the matter up has so far been devised.

The South in her distress deserves better treatment, and her people, confronted by destructive prices for their principal product, are entitled to more consideration at the hands of this House. I am convinced that there has been an understanding among some of those who oppose legislation looking to the relief of the South that objection would be made so as to prevent any discussion of the question here. For days and weeks, Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been suggesting plans and trying to devise ways and means for the relief of our people have been denied the opportunity to even discuss the question in the open before the Members of the House. I am tired of cloakroom opposition to suggestions of relief to the producers of cotton. I am weary of these whisperings about the Capitol that nothing can be done for the relief of 30,000,000 people in distress, suffering greatly from conditions created by war. [Applause.] I hail with delight the opportunity to discuss this question in the open. I want the people of the country to know of conditions as they are in the South, and I want the people of the stricken section to know who their friends are in this time of their distress. The President is in sympathy with us. The blame for no legislation, so far, is on this House and the Senate. When cotton fares well in the market, money flows freely in the South at this season of the year and every avenue of business is pulsing with prosperity. Cotton is our money crop. It represents the credit and working capital of the South. To-day cotton is selling below the cost of production and the debt-paying and purchasing power of the producer is paralyzed. It takes 12 months to make, gather, and dispose of the cotton crop. It costs more to produce cotton than any other staple product, and this particular crop cost more than any cotton crop ever produced in the United States.

The cotton farmer, as a rule, has an account with the merchant running from January to September, October, November, and December. He obtains advances in money and supplies of various kinds all along through the spring, summer, and fall, and pays for it all when he sells his cotton at this season of the year. The local banker generally borrows money from the big banks in New York City, and he lends it to the merchant and the merchant lends it to the farmer. Now, what is the situation in the South? The farmers' debts are due. The cotton-selling season is here, but war in Europe has closed the channels of the cotton trade against two-thirds of our crop, and this great product that has sold for more than 12 cents per pound, or $60 per bale, for the last five years is now going at a price far below the cost of production. Many of the producers are forced to sell at these destructive prices. They can not borrow sufficient money at the banks to relieve the situation. They are in distress, menaced by conditions that are dreadful, conditions created by the European war. Now, Mr. Speaker, the money expended by the producer in the making of the crop, that furnished by the merchant and advanced by the bank, is all tied up in this crop. Heretofore when cotton commanded a good price it sold freely and the farmer paid the merchant and the merchant paid the local banker; then the local banker paid the big banks in the East, and all was well with our people. How different now, Mr. Speaker. Indebtedness that would have been easily wiped out if cotton had brought a good price hangs heavy over the head of the farmer, the merchant, and the local banker. They are all gripped and held fast by the cruel hand of a foreign war. These conditions have not been produced by competition nor by any fault of the producer. They were not brought about by the operation of economic agencies, and they can not be regarded in the same category with business depression and low prices brought on in time of peace by overproduction. They are not such conditions as the producer would be expected to provide against. He had no way of knowing that such a calamitous state of things would confront him at this time, and he had no power at his command to prevent the condition born of a foreign war, and he ought not now in this land of liberty to be left in his distress to battle with conditions brought about by a war of kings. [Applause.]

If a foreign army should invade the South and take from the producers half of their cotton crop, the Federal Government would expend many times the value of the entire crop to repel the invader and reimburse the producers for the property thus taken. Then, why not come to the rescue of that same people now suffering on account of a war raging in Europe, the evil effects of which have come with devastating hands, destroying their peace of mind, demoralizing their business, depriving them of the necessaries of life, and literally robbing them of the fruits of their toil? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the producer is not asking Congress to fix a value upon his cotton or to guarantee to him a profit upon its production. He comes asking that the Government lend him assistance in this time of his distress—to help him prevent the sacrifice of his property and the suffering of his family through conditions created by the war. He is seeking no appropriation through Congress. He asks no gift at the hands of the Government. He is simply calling upon this great and good Government in this hour of his distress to do for him what it has done for the people of other sections to relieve their suffering when the unavoidable hand of affliction has been laid upon them. When fire swept the city of Salem, Mass., and homeless and hungry people cried for help, we did not say that the State of Massachusetts should care for them and bear the burden involved in relief for their distress. Congress appropriated money then and directed what should be done with it. When the earthquake came to San Francisco, destroying life and property, we did not say then that the State of California should provide funds for the distressed, but Congress appropriated money and directed how it should be used.

When the flood swept through Ohio, closing every avenue of business in large cities along its course, there was great distress among the people, and the banks closed their doors at Dayton; we did not say then that the State of Ohio should be compelled to provide the relief necessary. No, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the United States Treasury sent money to Dayton and directed what should be done with it. When the storm had swept through sections of the Northwest, leaving suffering and want in its wake, the Federal Government responded and the funds of the American people were used for their relief. In one instance the distress was caused by fire; in another instance it was caused by the earthquake; and in another by the flood; and in still another instance it was caused by the storm; and here is an instance where the distress is caused by war, and the people of the stricken section have come to the Federal Government asking that some measure of relief be granted to them. They do not ask that money be given to them, as was done in the instances that I have named. They only ask that the Government deposit public funds in the banks of the South, directing that those funds shall be used to relieve the distressed condition of the cotton producer—distressed conditions caused by war. [Applause.] They ask for the use of these public funds for a limited time. They are willing to put up any security at their command, to give their notes backed by their cotton warehouse receipts. The increased and multiplied uses of cotton, the price paid for the raw material for the last five years, and the money invested in the cotton-spinning industry and the cotton-goods trade the world over, all testify to the merit and value of cotton as security for a loan of this kind.

The bank could act as the fiscal agent of the Government, lending this money under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. My bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall fix the rate of interest to be charged and also fix the time for final payment of the loan made direct to the producer, and it recognizes as good and valid security cotton-warehouse receipts. I am not in favor of the Government going into the banking business, loaning money to citizens in the various walks of life, but I do think that in a time like this, when the banks are unable or have failed to meet the requirements of our people, the Government is justified in taking extraordinary steps to prevent the loss of millions of property and the distress and suffering of millions of people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the people of one section of the country are afflicted and oppressed with conditions produced by a foreign war, it is the duty of the Government to grant relief to the people of that section, even at the cost of laying a part of the burden upon the people of the other sections of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, here is a proposition that will grant the relief necessary without putting any burden at all upon the people of other sections and without cost to the Government of the United States.

I am not suggesting a plan to meet a situation born of normal conditions, but conditions created by war. I am asking for relief in extraordinary times to meet conditions that threaten the peace, prosperity, and happiness of thirty-odd millions of people. Something must be done by this Government, and done speedily, to relieve the suffering and distressed people of the South. Here is a remedy that the Government can administer without injury to itself or to any other interest, and one that will grant the relief necessary. Yes, I am asking the Government to lend us the use of a portion of the public funds, that we may be able to survive the ravages of the European war and prevent great distress and suffering among the people.

If we lend money regularly or deposit it with the national banks at a low rate of interest for the use of men engaged in the money-lending business, why should we not, in an extraordinary and distressing time like this, make an exception and lend to the man who is trying to pay his debts and prevent the sacrifice of his property? One gives to the Government security for the use of money that he may take it and lend it to others at a profit. The other, in his distress, calls upon the Government for help, and he is willing to pay the Government interest that he may prevent the suffering of his family and the sacrifice of his property. Now, then, if the Government can go into that kind of business to aid men to increase their fortunes by the use of the money of the people, why is it not right and just to take some of that money at a time like this and lend it through the banks to the man whose property is about to be sacrificed, and by so doing prevent distress and suffering among the people? If the Government lends money to or deposits money with the national bankers under normal conditions at a low rate of interest, and they in turn lend that money to the farmer at a higher rate of interest, why should not the Government, in the face of conditions that exist in the South to-day, loan through the banks direct to the cotton farmer at 4 or 5 per cent and help him when he is seriously embarrassed and greatly distressed on account of conditions created by war? If the Government in a time of business peace and under normal conditions lends money to the national banks to help carry on the commercial transactions of the country, why should it not under abnormal conditions like these do the extraordinary thing of lending to the producers direct and save the sacrifice and destruction of a half billion dollars' worth of property? [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, we have no rural credit system yet, and in the absence of a banking system that will give the farmer money for a longer time and at a cheaper rate of interest the Government should come to his aid and grant the emergency relief now requested. We appropriated money to bring from Europe American citizens who went abroad on a pleasure trip.

The Congress did a gracious and kindly act when it did that; but, Mr. Speaker, it is a curious governmental impulse that will spend money to return to their homes in safety Americans traveling for pleasure in Europe and then refuse to aid Americans already at home, gripped and cursed by war conditions that threaten the destruction of their property and forebode untold suffering and misery to their families. [Applause.] But you say that these Americans could not get home without this aid from the Government, and yet it was not in the line of the ordinary business of the Government to lend money to people traveling in Europe. It was an emergency situation. The exigencies of the occasion demanded extraordinary action, and this great Government responded. Now, Mr. Speaker, millions of people in the South, because of conditions created by the European war, are unable to cope with the situation here, and they are calling upon this great Government to meet the emergency that has arisen, and the exigencies of the occasion justify and demand governmental aid. Mr. Speaker, the same noble spirit and generous impulse that prompted this Government to aid people in building homes and making crops on the arid lands of the West ought now to direct the good offices of the Government in going to the relief of farmers in real distress in another section of the country—farmers whose products are being sacrificed at destructive prices. [Applause.] Surely the Government that will advance money by the millions to aid people in one section of the country in purchasing and improving farm property will not refuse to aid a people in another section of the same country struggling to prevent the loss of their homes and the sacrifice of their property. Surely this Government will not with one hand give aid to one class of producers in the West and at the same time with the other hand withhold aid from another class of producers in the South. [Applause.]

I appreciate what the Secretary of the Treasury has already done in depositing funds in the South to help with this crop, but more must be done, Mr. Speaker, or the producing class of our people will suffer greatly. I know that he is anxious to help us. He can not, under the authority of existing law, force the banks to lend money to the producer. He can deposit it with them and request, as he has done, that they use it to aid the producer, but he can not compel them to lend it to the producer. Here is where the trouble lies. The producer is the man who most needs relief. Reach him with these funds and all the interests that cluster about him and are dependent upon him will be relieved. But if he is forced to sell his cotton at the low price now obtaining, because the local banks can not or will not lend him money and enable him to meet his obligations and keep his cotton off the market, he is not going to be benefited by these funds already deposited in the banks of the South, and it may be that the very funds sent by the Government to aid him in holding his cotton for a reasonable price are being withheld from him as a loan, so that they may be used in purchasing his cotton when forced upon the market at a price below the cost of production. Then, and in that event, the Government is being innocently used to injure rather than aid the man most injuriously affected by the European war. Now, then, in order that the producer may be reached and directly benefited, saved from the financial distress that threatens him, I favor the enactment of a law that will authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit funds in the banks of the South, directing that they shall lend that money to the cotton producer upon his note, secured by cotton-warehouse receipts.

Cotton is as good collateral or security as there is in the world, and no other agricultural product is in its class. Corn and wheat in bulk may be injured by climatic conditions or destroyed by the weevil, but a bale of cotton stored in a bonded warehouse is as good security as silver bullion stored in the vaults of the United States Treasury. Climatic conditions do not affect it, no insect pest can harm it, and no tooth of time can destroy it. [Applause.] Two-thirds of our cotton crop goes abroad, and that cotton sends back to America every year more gold than the world's annual output. As the rulers of old went to Solomon for wisdom, the cotton-using countries of the earth must come to us for the wherewith to be clothed. In the light of these great truths, who can say that cotton baled and stored in a bonded warehouse is not as good security as municipal bonds or railroad bonds on which Secretary Cortelyou issued currency for the railroads? Why, Mr. Speaker, in the last days of the Confederacy, England made arrangements with the Confederate Government to float $15,000,000 of cotton bonds. That shows what the people of Great Britain thought of the cotton industry of the United States when the very home of that industry was involved in war.

Mr. Speaker, there were more spindles in operation last year and more cotton consumed than ever before. About four years ago, when cotton was selling for 15 cents per pound, the Department of Commerce and Labor in a statement said:

> The rise in the cost of the raw material (cotton) has been more the result of natural than of artificial causes. This advance has been furthered by a constantly broadening demand for this fiber in old as well as in new channels. Cotton is now relied upon in practically all the textile manufactures, either as a primary or secondary material, and it is utilized in an increasing number in all other manufacturing industries. The ease and rapidity with which the cotton fiber is transformed into yarn and its adaptability for all forms of woven fabrics accounts for its extensive and increasing use.

Mr. Speaker, the North American, of Philadelphia, says truly, "The big value of cotton comes through its manufacture. To illustrate, in 1912 Great Britain paid $401,000,000 for raw cotton and manufactured it. Four-fifths of it was purchased from us. She supplied the needs of all her people and exported the surplus cotton goods, for which she received $611,000,000." This is more money, Mr. Speaker, than the entire American cotton crop will bring at the present price. Why should the raw material, so much in demand under normal conditions, and so valuable to the spinner, and so serviceable to the world, be sacrificed at a time like this to the detriment and great injury of the cotton producers of the United States? [Applause.] The aid that we ask can be granted and the producer relieved of distress without injury to the consumer of cotton goods. The spinner has already made his sales for the manufactured product from this crop, and he calculated on paying more than 12 cents per pound for it. There is no doubt that the spinners expected to pay above 12 cents for cotton this year. They made all their calculations and sold their goods to be made from this crop upon a basis above that figure.

The spinner in our country will not suffer by this plan, for if he can get cotton at 12 cents per pound he can not complain, for he has paid more than that amount for the last five years; and if the mills in Europe are closed for any considerable length of time, the cotton mills of the United States will profit greatly, for they will gain markets for cotton goods that they have not had heretofore.

One hundred and forty-three million spindles in the world are looking to us for two-thirds of their cotton supply. Some of the foreign spindles may, on account of the war, be idle for a time, but this will make our spindles run double shifts and greatly increase the demand upon the American mills. The cotton mills of America consumed about 6,000,000 bales of cotton last year. Now, then, if they run double shifts they will easily consume nine or ten million bales within the next year, and this will be American cotton. Think of the cost of transportation to Europe of the raw cotton, then back to South America of the finished product. This comes out of the producer and the consumer of cotton goods in South America. Why will not the cotton mills of the United States go after this trade and sell directly to the South American people?

The buy-a-bale movement will help some. The suggested arrangement of raising a fund by the St. Louis bankers to be loaned to the producers will do good; but, Mr. Speaker, a 14,500,000-bale cotton crop has got to be cared for, and it is the duty of the Government to render what assistance it can to prevent wholesale losses in cotton property and great distress among the producers. [Applause.]

Now is the time for our people to patronize a home industry—to wear cotton goods. The South alone can consume annually 2,000,000 bales more in cotton goods. It is the cheapest and most comfortable wearing apparel for summer, and cotton underwear is the healthiest garment that can be worn next to the skin in all seasons. We ought to wear cotton suits winter and summer in the South, and you in the North would be better off if you wore cotton underwear winter and summer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in many localities the banks have done all that they can to aid the producer; they have advanced money all along through the year to help produce the cotton crop, and at this season of the year they expected money to be coming into the banks, and they were wholly unprepared for the conditions that this foreign war has brought upon us. Some have helped considerably already and want to help more, but they are unable to do so. Then there are those who will take advantage of the deplorable and distressing condition that afflicts the people of the South.

Mr. Speaker, since Jacob's cunning obtained the birthright of Esau it has been found necessary to place metes and bounds about human conduct and restraints around the improper activities of men, and I call upon this House to provide ways and means to protect the distressed producers of cotton from the pillage and plunder of a band of marauding speculators. These men are encouraged and aided by some of the spinners here and abroad. Some of the bankers are taking advantage of the situation, and they too, are obtaining what cotton they can at low prices. They know that cotton is going to bring a good price later on, and they are refusing to lend money on cotton in order to force the producer to sell, that they may profit by his unfortunate condition. If ever the Government of all the people was justified in carrying relief to a portion of its people in distress, this Government is justified now in relieving the distress of the cotton producers, shielding them from the oppression of those who are preying upon them in their helpless condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, with some of the banks unable to do any more for the producer and some refusing to lend him the money deposited with them by the Government, and with the markets closed temporarily to more than half of the cotton crop, the producer is helpless. He is like a ship without a rudder, drifting at sea, and when that occurs you know what happens—there are friendly vessels that would like to render aid and there are also pirate vessels that would like to plunder the ship, and if the pirate vessels are strong enough they always rob the ship and despoil its crew. So, Mr. Speaker, it is sadly true that there are men who delight to prey upon the unfortunate in time of their distress, and there are people who will take advantage of the deplorable and distressing condition that now afflicts the people of the South. There is a man who says, "The time to make money is when you catch your friends in trouble; when they are hard pressed and are almost down and out you can make them pay any rate of interest; then is the time to press them." That character of greed and avarice is still abroad in the land. The cruel disposition to rob the man who is in distress, to get rich upon the misfortune of others, is a mean and despicable thing, but it exists and must be reckoned with in a time like this, and something must be done to prevent the pillage and plunder of the people of the South. [Applause.]

The producers planted this year with the expectation of receiving around 13 cents per pound for cotton. They made all their calculations on that basis, and they had a right to expect that much or more, because they had received more than 12 cents per pound for the last five years, and last year more spindles were in operation and more cotton was consumed than ever before. The spinners expected to pay that much or more for cotton. The merchant and the banker and everybody connected in any way with the cotton business expected to see a good price for cotton this year. The cotton farmer expected $65 or $70 per bale, and when he bought the mule with which to make this cotton crop from your western mule dealer and agreed to pay $250, and in some instances $300, and when he hired his labor and purchased his supplies he based it all on a good and reasonable price for cotton. Now this cotton farmer who has expended more money and labor than ever before to produce this crop, for which he expected a good price, finds himself confronted with cotton prices below the cost of production. All of his plans are upset, none of his expectations are realized, and there he stands, helpless, in the clutches of war conditions that he did not even remotely help to create and against which he can not stand without help from some source. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, money flowing freely at this season of the year is the commercial lifeblood of the South. If the banks clog the arteries and prevent full and free circulation of this lifeblood, stagnation and paralysis will ensue. It is the duty of the Government to see to it that this blood furnished by the Government itself shall not be perverted from the ends of its institution, but that it shall be circulated through the arteries of this great productive industry upon which depends the peace and happiness of thirty-odd millions of people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the situation is so serious that the Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States have been in conference time after time to discuss means of relief for our people. The governors of the cotton-growing States have been here in conference with us, trying to devise some way to aid the cotton producers at this time. Several bills have been introduced looking to relief for the producers of cotton. I am the author of two bills, one to buy 4,000,000 bales out of this crop in the next six months following the passage of the bill—this would keep the price of cotton up, and it would not be necessary for the Government to buy it all at one time; the other to lend money through the banks on the farmer's note, secured by cotton-warehouse receipts—$45 on the bale. This would enable the farmer to obtain funds sufficient to pay something on his debts and carry on his business and keep his cotton away from the market.

Other Members of Congress from the cotton-growing States have introduced bills that would, in my judgment, accomplish the desired end.

I want legislation that will provide ways and means for the relief of the cotton producers of the South, and I stand ready to support any measure that will carry sound and substantial relief to them.

Mr. Speaker, if the producer could obtain relief in the ordinary channels of business, if the local banks would aid him at this time to prevent the sale of his cotton at destructive prices, he would not think of coming to the Government for aid; but the banks are not doing the thing necessary to meet the requirements of his business, to relieve his distressed condition. The Government issues money and lends it to or deposits it with the national banks. Now, then, if these national banks hold the bulk of the money supply of the country, and if they, under present conditions—conditions, I repeat, created by war—fail and refuse to lend the producer money, so that he can hold his cotton and prevent its sacrifice, where is the producer of cotton to go but to the Government, whose function it is to issue money and deposit it where it will supply the wants and carry on the transactions of men engaged in legitimate business in our country? [Applause.]

The producer can not issue money; that is the function of the Government. The Government does not deposit money with the producer, but it does deposit money with the national banks. The national banker can do what he pleases with that money. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this man, the only person intrusted with the money of the Government, should decide, when a calamity comes upon the people and in the time of their distress, that he will withhold any measure of relief, but will speculate upon their condition and profit by their misfortune; what, then, is the producer to do? Suppose the cotton spinners of the United States owned all the national banks, and they should decide that it was to their interest to refuse to lend any money at all to the cotton producers, would the Government leave the producers helpless in the grasp of conditions like that? Would the Government at a time like this permit men who ordinarily do everything in their power to buy cotton as cheaply as possible to use the Government's money to oppress and impoverish the producer by forcing him to sell his cotton to them at destructive prices? [Applause.]

No, Mr. Speaker, this great Government would say to these spinners in control of the banking business, "You shall not pervert these banking establishments from the ends of their institution; you shall not use the public funds to prey upon American citizens in distress; you shall not by the aid of this Government take advantage of conditions created by war to pillage and plunder the producers of the South." [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, now, when the producer is giving to this Government the sign of distress, when the unmistakable cry of his dire need is heard from one end of the cotton States to the other, in the name of justice and humanity I call upon this Congress to provide relief for the stricken section, to prevent the sacrifice of this cotton crop, and to save from suffering and bankruptcy the cotton producers of the South. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, all praise to the local bankers who have been helping the cotton producers in this trying time. Many of them have done all that they could, but the trouble is the burden is too great for them; they do not possess the means necessary to afford relief. The State banks are handicapped by the 10 per cent Federal tax. The national banks are not responding as freely as they should, and the business of the producer is demoralized. Conditions created by war are about to overwhelm him, and it is the duty of the Government to extend to him a helping hand. It can do so with great benefit to the producer and with profit to the Government itself. If this is true, why will the Congress hesitate? If these conditions were caused by anything other than fire, earthquake, or war, we would not and should not come to the Government for help. If the agencies instituted by the Government—the banks—would grant us the relief needed, we would not call upon the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are in distress; we must have relief. Other agencies have failed us, and we turn now to the Government of the United States and ask that it grant us the use of some of the public funds in order that we may hold our cotton and prevent panic and bankruptcy among the producing classes of the South. [Applause.] This Government owes more to its producing classes than to any other class of its people. Why, then, should special favors be shown by the Government to banks and to bankers? We can not all be bankers, and when the banking institutions refuse to aid the productive industries of our country and when they permit the producer to be greatly handicapped and seriously injured in his business, then it is the duty of the Government to do the thing necessary to relieve the distress of the industrial and producing classes, in order that they may not be deprived of the fruits of their labor and industry. If the Government will expend money in farm-demonstration work, teaching the farmers how to produce more cotton per acre, and then expend more money to prevent the boll weevil from destroying the crop in the formative period, I can not understand the logic or the philosophy of the Government that will do that and then refuse to lend to the producer a helping hand to prevent the sacrifice of that crop upon an altar erected by the European war. [Applause.] Surely the Government that will aid the farmer in preventing the destruction of his crop while it is being produced will not withhold aid from him after it is produced, when he is trying to prevent the entire loss of that product. I can not believe that this Government will go to his rescue to prevent the ravages of the boll weevil and then leave him naked and helpless to the ravages of war—the victim of conditions that he did not create and could not prevent if he would. [Applause.] The farmer does not want to sell his cotton at the present price, and it is not right to force him to sell it below the cost of production. He is entitled to a fair price and a living profit, and by the help of the Government he can hold his cotton and obtain a reasonable price for it, and the Government will not lose a dollar in the transaction.

The insurance companies will insure a bale of cotton for $45 on the bale, and the Government would be absolutely safe in lending to the producer on his note secured by cotton-warehouse receipts at $45 on the bale. Mr. Speaker, there will be but little cotton produced next year. You may look for the cotton acreage to be cut in half, and maybe more. The State legislatures will require reduction of acreage, if necessary. The producer can not afford to produce cotton at the present price, and if left alone he will reduce the cotton acreage next year as a matter of necessity. Cotton will be scarce before another full crop is produced, and some of this crop will, in my judgment, sell for 12 cents or more; and, Mr. Speaker, I want the man who has toiled to produce it to get the benefit of that price. I do not want to see him held in the grip of war conditions and robbed by a band of speculators who are trying to obtain this crop at a low price, so that they may hold it for the good price that is bound to come. If the Government will lend us a helping hand the producer will be enabled to hold his cotton and he will be permitted to enjoy the fruits of his labor. [Applause.]

It is unfair to force the producer to sell his cotton in a demoralized market, at prices fixed under conditions created by war, to meet obligations made in time of peace under normal conditions, when one bale of cotton would bring as much as two bales will bring now. It is unfair and wrong to force him to sell now, when $1 will pay on his debts just what 50 cents would pay a year ago. It is wrong to press him for the settlement of his debts—dollar for dollar—under present conditions, forcing him to sell his cotton when there is no demand for it, and then leave the greater part of his indebtedness hanging over him for another year. [Applause.] If this is permitted, the whole burden will fall upon the cotton producer. He will be forced to part with his cotton at prices unsatisfactory to him and at a time when he knows that it is sacrificing his property. The proceeds of such forced sales will be applied upon his debts. Then the unpaid balance will hang above his head to be paid some time in full, dollar for dollar, with interest. Some business concerns will fail, Mr. Speaker, if something is not done to relieve the situation in the cotton-growing States. Some of them will go into bankruptcy proceedings and settle their indebtedness for 15 or 20 cents on the dollar, but the producer, unless he is helped now, will have his property taken from him against his will and applied on his debts.

The balance, the wreck of war, will stand against him to be made good at another time. Mr. Speaker, if Congress can not or will not do something that will relieve the situation, I am in favor of the legislatures of every cotton-growing State passing a stay law, suspending the payment of all debts for a reasonable length of time. This would keep the speculators from taking this cotton crop at destructive prices and place all parties interested in the cotton industry upon the same footing. It would make somebody else share with the producer some of the hardships caused by present conditions. These debts grow out of and are dependent upon the cotton industry. Mr. Speaker, if those to whom the farmer is indebted would in this time of distress follow the example of the good man that the Bible tells us about, things would be different and the situation would be greatly relieved. In the old days the Scripture tells that a collector called upon one of his lord's debtors when times were hard and said unto him, "How much owest thou unto my lord?" And he said, "An hundred measures of oil." And the good man said, "Sit down quickly and write 50." He had compassion upon the man hard pressed and settled the debt for half the amount that was due. Mr. Speaker, if, under present conditions, the banker calls upon the merchant, and the merchant forces the producer to sell his cotton at the present price, some fellow may feel like Artemus Ward did when his friend said to him, "Artemus, you owe me a hundred dollars, and I am going to knock off half that amount"; whereupon Artemus said, "I never let anybody outdo me in generosity; you knock off half of it, and I will knock off the other half." [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the cotton industry of the United States is so interwoven with the industrial, commercial, and financial life of the Nation that whenever it is hampered and depressed nearly every other line of business is injuriously affected. Cotton knocks at the door of the great granaries of the West and millions of bushels of wheat, oats, and corn pour into the South. [Applause.] Your beef, your pork, and your mules find splendid markets in the South when cotton prices are good. So, my friends, when the cotton business of the South is good the prosperity that it enjoys is shared by the people in every other section. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that agriculture is the corner stone on which all other industries rest, and cotton is the only product in the field of agriculture every pound of which is converted into money and every dollar's worth of which contributes to the financial wealth of the United States. It is the master production, and under normal conditions is the most readily cashed and the most widely consumed among the great staples of the earth. [Applause.]

Wherever the flag flies its splendid fiber is seen. Wherever the American soldier goes, the cotton uniform goes with him, and tents made of cotton spread their white wings above him, hovering about him while he sleeps. [Applause.] It was behind cotton bales at New Orleans that Jackson won the victory over the British.

Cotton has done more to maintain America's credit abroad and to keep it on a sound financial basis than all other commodities combined. Upon the well-being of this great cotton industry depends the prosperity and happiness of one-third of the population of this Union, and I appeal to the Members from the East, the North, and the West to join hands with us from the sister section and grant relief to the people now suffering under conditions created by war. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I have read with considerable amazement some of the statements made in the Democratic campaign textbook issued by the Democratic congressional committee and the Democratic national committee recently.

One of the most remarkable statements is to the effect that the President has prevented war with Mexico. The fact is that the attitude of the present Democratic administration in interfering in the internal affairs of Mexico almost brought on a war with Mexico. What right has our Government to interfere in the internal affairs of any friendly nation? Have we grown to be the world's policeman? We have serious troubles of our own in the United States of America, the solution of which will challenge the ability of American statesmen. Let us sweep our own doorsteps clean before we try to clean house for any other nation.

But what are the facts about Mexico? Do the Democrats think that the American people have forgotten their blunders? Recall the demand for a salute of 21 guns after the Tampico incident had taken place. A petty officer in the Mexican army had arrested six American sailors and a subordinate officer near the water front of Tampico. As he was taking them to the jail he was met by a superior officer, who promptly ordered their discharge and made an apology to the American officials for the mistake that had been made. According to the statement of the President of the United States, even old Huerta made an apology for the incident. But that did not suit this Democratic administration. They must have a salute of 21 guns, and the admiral in command of our warships in Mexican waters was ordered to demand that salute. Have you heard the echo of that salute of 21 guns? No; and you never will hear that salute fired. Why? Because our commissioners to the A., B., C. mediation board that met at Niagara Falls signed a protocol under the terms of which we agreed to forego any further demand for that salute. This Democratic administration marched up the hill and marched down again. Both performances were unworthy of this Republic and entirely unnecessary.

But that is not all in regard to Mexico. The administration announced that the steamship Ypiranga and two other vessels were bringing a cargo of 30,000,000 rounds of ammunition to Vera Cruz for Huerta's army. This ammunition must be refused a landing at all hazards was the cry of the President and his advisers. In order to prevent that landing a force of marines and sailors was landed at Vera Cruz. They marched in solid phalanx up the main street of that old Mexican city and had not proceeded far before a volley rang out and 17 of our boys fell on the pavements of Vera Cruz. They were only boys; their ages ranged from 18 to 24 years. A large number of others were wounded; three of these have since died. About 100 Mexicans were killed or wounded to prevent the landing at Vera Cruz of these munitions of war for Huerta. Kindly hands lifted the poor dead boys from the blood-stained pavements of the Mexican port. The bodies were placed in caskets and sent to the United States in a man-of-war, which was heralded throughout the country as "the funeral ship." The bodies were received at the port of New York. The whole country wept tears of sympathy at the loss of these young heroes who fell because this administration demanded that that 30,000,000 rounds of ammunition for Huerta should not be landed in Mexico. And even while the remains of these heroes were being consigned to the bosom of mother earth, that very steamer, the Ypiranga, and the two other vessels were landing that very ammunition—30,000,000 rounds—a little farther down the coast of Mexico at the eastern terminal of the Tehuantepec Railroad, Puerto Mexico. Oh, what a waste of human life! Oh, what a slaughter of innocents! And all, all on account of the bungling and blundering of this Democratic administration.

But we have not heard the end of this Mexican business. Even now our newspapers tell us that Carranza, the quondam favorite of this administration, refuses point-blank to give assurances that the lives of those Mexicans who helped our Army and Navy officers to run the civil government at Vera Cruz during our occupancy shall be spared. He refuses to give assurances that other Mexicans who were friendly to the Huerta régime shall continue secure in their rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. He has seized the tramway system of the City of Mexico, which is said to be owned by foreign investors, and who will probably complain to our Government against the seizure of their property by this same Carranza. It is said that the followers of the latter, during recent depredations in the Mexican capital, have done an amount of looting that has run into millions of dollars. Even churches have been robbed of their valuables, and then have been given over to destroying flames. Private dwellings have not been spared by the Carranzistas. And these are the men who have had the tacit approval and support of this Democratic administration. When the history of this Mexican business shall have been written by dispassionate students of world affairs, it will present as black a page as can be found in the annals of the United States.

DISCHARGE OF CIVIL-WAR VETERANS FROM FEDERAL POSITIONS.

Mr. Speaker, on page 16 of the campaign book for 1914 that I have referred to item 46 reads as follows:

A million to old soldiers: The saving of at least a million dollars a year to the old soldiers and their widows through direct payment of pensions by check and the abolishment of the system requiring execution of vouchers is only one of a number of economies brought about by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The expenses of the Pension Bureau this year were half a million dollars less than in the previous year, although there was little less work done. A reduction of 145 employees in the Pension Bureau was effected without causing a single old soldier or soldier's widow to lose his or her position.

This is quite an extraordinary statement, in view of the facts in the case, and it is well calculated, as it was doubtless intended, to deceive many persons who are not thoroughly conversant with the facts, which are:

First, the act of Congress doing away with the pension agency system was approved August 17, 1912, nearly seven months before the present administration came into power, and went into effect from and after the 1st day of January, 1913, or more than two months prior to the inauguration of President Wilson, so that the present commissioner, who assumed office still later, only had to enforce the law as he found it. Had he done less than that he would have been derelict in his duty. Why should he have any special credit for simply performing his duty? Why should the administration have any credit for any reduction of expenses effected by the operation of this law, enacted during the Taft administration?

Second. While it is said that "a reduction of 145 employees in the Pension Bureau was effected without causing a single old soldier or soldier's widow to lose his or her position," the statement is not quite correct. If the word "place" instead of "position" had been used, the situation would have been more truthfully described, for while no old soldier or soldier's widow was dismissed, many old soldiers and several soldier's widows were demoted. In numerous cases more than the amount of pension they were receiving was taken from them, and thus they did lose their position on the pay roll. That is how a goodly portion of the million dollars, relatively, was saved—by taking it, as it were, from the lifeblood of the old soldier and soldier's widow.

The commissioner states that there was little less work done this year than in the previous year, which would indicate that the force of the bureau was still quite efficient. And yet under the present dispensation in the Pension Bureau the efficiency rating of the veteran soldier very suddenly, on account of age and physical disability, has become so low that it has been necessary to demote a large percentage of them.

Of course it will not be admitted by the officials that any soldier has been demoted because he is receiving a pension, but I have been told that pending these demotions of old soldiers they have been asked how much pension they were getting. Anyone with even a limited comprehension can read between the lines.

I think it proper in connection with the subject of demotions to again quote from the act of Congress approved August 23, 1912, a part of section 4, as follows:

In the event of reductions being made in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

I have been informed that the man who, while in the service during the Taft administration, it is stated, was largely instrumental in formulating and having adopted the system of paying pensioners direct by check from the Washington office, and who, after its adoption, was made the disbursing officer of the system, was promptly removed from that position by the present commissioner and reduced in rank to a clerkship.

WHAT CONGRESS HAS DONE AND HAS NOT DONE.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert an article from the Cincinnati Times-Star of recent date, which reviews the work of the present administration and points out its shortcomings. In the light of history the claims made for the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress in the Democratic textbook of 1914 are remarkable, to say the least.

The article by Mr. Gus. J. Karger reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, October 6.

If the attention of the public could be centered upon the record of the Congress whose second session, an overflow of the first, is now drawing to an expected close—Mr. Wilson predicted that it would adjourn last June—nothing would be more vain and futile than the arduous and ardent attempt of Democratic candidates and spellbinders to hide behind the skirts of the European war. For the war did not revolutionize economical conditions in the United States; it merely added speed and force to the influences already at work—influences that were liberated through congressional approval of economic fallacies and extravagances which the Republican Party from the day of its birth had organized to combat.

Congress has been in session 18 months—ever since April 7, 1913—the longest, and in a sense the most remarkable, session on record. During all this time the Democratic Party has been in supreme control of both branches of Congress and of the Executive department, and its responsibility for those acts about which differences of opinion exist can not be questioned. A brief review of the achievements of that period may serve to recall proceedings which those responsible for the campaign from a Democratic standpoint would fain have the public forget or ignore.

SINISTER TENDENCIES.

Perhaps the entire output can be summarized in a few sentences. To characterize as "sinister" the tendencies that have developed would probably be regarded as a conservative judgment. The experiments in the extension of Government ownership will certainly be viewed in that light by many of the best minds of the country. Thirty-five million dollars are to be expended in the construction of 1,000 miles of Government built, owned, and operated trunk line. The passage of the measure assuring execution of this project has given hope and encouragement to those who would go further. It has brought further demands, backed by the invincible dictum of President Wilson that $30,000,000 be invested in Government steamship lines; it has strengthened the proposal of Postmaster General Burleson that additional tens of millions be set aside for the purchase of telegraph and telephone lines; it has given impetus to the agitation fostered by Congressman CROSSER, of Ohio, looking to the Government acquisition of the traction lines of the District of Columbia.

Nor would this be regarded as the only "sinister" tendency developed by the passing Congress. One need only refer to the Jones bill, advancing the day of Philippine independence, and threatening to undo the painful work performed under American auspices during the last 15 years, threatening even the peace of the world, if the warning uttered by Congressman MANN should go for aught. One need not go beyond the provision of the Clayton bill to regulate the trusts, which, under the specious guise of relieving labor of the odious commodity classification, sets organized labor above and beyond the pale of compliance with law and court decree. One is naturally reminded of the Democratic volte-face in the matter of canal tolls and the subserviency to British rather than American interests demonstrated by President Wilson and the men who did his bidding in Congress.

THE EFFECT OF THE TARIFF LAW.

The first session of the Sixty-third Congress, which merged with the one that began on the first Monday of last December, was made notable by the passage of the new tariff law, with free-sugar and free-wool provisions, built on a foundation of "for revenue only," which soon turned out to be a foundation of "not revenue enough," in spite of the aid rendered by the imposition of the income tax—a law that brought on Mr Wilson's "psychological" business depression, now attributed to the European war. It became notable, moreover, for the passage of the sundry civil bill with its provision exempting labor from the operations of the Sherman law, for which President Wilson saw fit to apologize, but to which principle since he has made abject surrender by acceptance of sweeping provisions to the same effect in the Clayton bill, which has been "perfected" after a series of squabbles and delays, which it was hoped might serve to evolve some sort of a measure possessing teeth that could bite, but which never exceeded a slap on the wrist in the brutality of its defined functions. It was the first session, also, which evolved a measure taking deputy marshals and collectors of internal revenue out of the classified service, an act which President Wilson witnessed with some concern, and against the possible evils of which he promised to protect the American public—a promise faithfully kept in the following session by further additions to the ranks of the exempt, 2,400 postal employees and $100,000 worth of "commercial attachés" among them—further open violations of the spirit and the letter of merit-service law, and the further creation of offices which might be thrown into the longing and loving arms of faithful Democrats without subjecting them to the indignities of a civil-service examination. And the first session gave promise of what was to ensue in the second when the Democratic caucus rejected the proposed budget plan, which was to furnish a clear and succinct survey of appropriations with a view of keeping these appropriations on an economical and businesslike basis.

THEY CALL THEM "ACHIEVEMENTS."

Discussing the "achievements" of the second session, perhaps it would be well at once to refer to the result of the failure of the first session to lay a basis for economic appropriations. As but recently pointed out, the riotous extravagance of Congress, demonstrated by supply measures that exceed all previous records by a hundred million dollars or more, has terrified the men who endeavored in vain to check this further development of the sinister in the tendencies of a Democratic Congress, pledged as it was by the Baltimore platform to restore Jeffersonian simplicity in this particular regard. It was no Republican, but Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who denounced the spirit of Treasury looting and who spoke solemn but unheeded words of warning to his colleagues on the majority side. And it was no Republican, but a Democrat, Senator VARDAMAN, who declared, arguing on the canal-tolls bill, that this additional betrayal of sacred platform pledge "deserves the scorn of men" and writes "the death warrant of the Democratic Party." And it was no Republican, but Senator REED, of Missouri, who condemned the Clayton trust bill as "a betrayal of the people" and a "toothless and emasculated" measure.

Going further into the affairs of the second session, its claim to being a memorable one rests, in large measure, on the passage of the new currency act, consideration of which was to have been concluded in the first, signed by the President on December 23, 1913, and not yet in operation, a Republican law, the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, tiding the country over the emergency the currency act was supposed to meet. It passed the Trade Commission bill, widely advertised as a part of President Wilson's constructive program, but promulgating no principle not previously approved by Republicans and cordially supported by Members on both sides of the House, whose first prescribed duty will be an inquiry into Standard Oil methods. It passed a coal-land leasing bill for Alaska, likewise uncontested. It passed the toothless Clayton antitrust bill, previously mentioned, with its curtailment of the injunction powers of the courts, with its surrender to the demands of the leaders of organized labor. It passed a river and harbor bill of reasonable proportions, thanks to the Republican filibuster against the $55,000,000 atrocity and its proposed Treasury raid, prevented by the courage and fidelity of Senator BURTON and band of courageous comrades. It stood behind the President, not without the uttered protest of many Republicans and some Democrats, in his remarkable Mexican policy, which resulted in armed conflict, bloodshed, and military adventure, but which it is now hoped may have worked out, in spite of itself and in spite of the menace which yet it carries to the peace of the continent. Once, and once only, it repudiated Mr. Wilson, whose autocratic hold on Congress is probably emphasized by the exception to the rule, when it made it so clear that the appointment of Mr. Thomas D. Jones as a member of the Federal Reserve Board could not be confirmed because of his connection with the Harvester Trust that he was compelled to withdraw it.

"EMERGENCY" LEGISLATION.

It became a memorable session likewise because of the "emergency" legislation—of greater or less emergency—demanded by the outbreak of the war in Europe, the amendment to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, authorizing wider distribution of emergency currency; the $2,750,000 aid extended to Americans marooned in the war countries; the $5,000,000 war-insurance act; the ship-registry act; all of which were perfected with the aid of Republicans and passed through the House with their aid and approval. Included in the list is the $100,000,000 "war" tax measure demanded by Mr. Wilson to cover deficiencies created prior to the war by the failure of the economic policies of the Government, which deficiencies Mr. Wilson did not deem it advisable to meet by resort to the Government's rich deposits in the national banks of the country. It includes, likewise, the $30,000,000 ship-purchase bill, which, under pressure, Mr. Wilson has permitted to go over until the next session, lest Congress on reassembling be afflicted with ennui. There should be reference to the passage of the cotton-futures bill, regulating the cotton exchanges; to the ratification of some 18 or 20 of Bryan's arbitration treaties, whose workableness, in doubt, remains to be demonstrated; to the continued application of the gag to Republicans in the House and to the failure of the Senate to put the same methods into operation; to the Lever agricultural extension bill, which Republicans cordially supported; to the riot of absenteeism, compelling Democrats to resort to a procedure of deducting per diem from the salaries of Members, a method which has not been adopted since the last Democratic Cleveland Congress 20 years ago.

Likewise, it seems meet and proper to refer to the failure of much legislation which was heralded in advance as the rising sun of Democratic progressiveness and constructive ability. Although Mr. Wilson told Congress many months ago that there was "urgent necessity" for it, there has been no rural-credits legislation. The immigration bill, with its literacy test, passed the House moons ago, but sleeps in the Senate. The stocks and bonds bill has gone over. We have not yet apologized to Colombia nor paid her $25,000,000, nor, indeed, has Nicaragua received the $3,000,000 Mr. Bryan believes her entitled to. The woman-suffrage and the prohibition amendments remain under the influence of chloroform. Presidential primaries, recommended by President Wilson, and which he thought might be provided without considerable discussion or objection, are yet unborn; citizenship for the Porto Ricans is no nearer than it was. One presidential term and one only remains a beautiful dream. The safety-at-sea bill, demanded by labor, is stilled in conference. Much favoritism has been extended to the South, Confederates replacing Union veterans in the service wherever possible, appropriations giving constant comfort to southern rather than to national ventures and interests, but the Government has not yet embarked on the policy of taking over the cotton crop. The $25,000,000 designed to help the "good roads" movement and the gentlemen whose particular districts would get their hands into the new pork barrel, yet remain in the United States Treasury—or in the national banks. The cost of living has not yet been reduced.

MORE EXTRA SESSIONS.

And if there should be an adjournment, as proposed, before the next regular session begins on December 7—an adjournment rather than a recess being necessary to provide the Members with their share of the mileage, which they have missed, sadly missed, in the last year—there will be enough work ahead to keep Congress in session for another indeterminate period, and the country may as well resign itself to the probability of another extra session after March 4. For in the three months at the disposal of Congress for the short session all the large supply bills ought to be passed—and Congress has not displayed the capacity for disposing even of its routine work within the time at its disposal—not since Congress ceased to be a Republican institution. And then there is the ship-purchase bill, upon which Mr. Wilson says he will insist: the bill authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to supervise railroad stock and bond issues, to the end that there may be no more stock watering; the good-roads grab; the various pending conservation bills, including the general dam bill and the measure to regulate radium-bearing lands; the Philippine independence bill; the ever-present woman-suffrage and national-prohibition amendments to the Constitution; the seamen's bill; rural credits; child-labor legislation; and the usual collection of whatnots and odds and ends.

It is a beautiful, alluring retrospect and prospect—if you like it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have been wanting for some days to submit an observation or two concerning the cotton situation in the South. I believe that a great Government ought to be able to meet great emergencies, and that while, in the main, we must be guided by the experiences of the past, yet as new situations arise it requires a statesman to meet the actual situation before him without depending wholly upon what he or his forefathers may have done theretofore. The question of the situation in the South is not wholly the result of the European war, in my opinion, but undoubtedly the war situation has made it acute. I think the House made a mistake when it passed the bill designed to injure the cotton exchanges. I think gentlemen are mistaken who think that doing away with the cotton speculator is going to increase the value of cotton. I think gentlemen are mistaken who think that the present situation is in the interest of the speculator. If there were enough speculators in cotton right now, there would be no difficulty in selling the cotton; but the European war has created a situation where it seems to be certain that we really can not in a normal time consume the cotton now in existence. Ordinarily the cotton crop and the raisers of cotton must depend upon the market for cotton, upon the use of cotton for manufacture, but we have reached this situation where we know that the market will not absorb all of the cotton and will not use all the cotton. Even if cotton were to sell for a cent a pound, even if the raisers of cotton were to give it away, it could not and would not all be used within the normal time for its use—that is, this crop of cotton, or what is now in existence.

Now, there have been a great many remedies suggested and I do not propose to discuss them. I have not selected a remedy for the situation. I can see the objections to every proposition which has been advanced, and so can any of us. I doubt very much whether advancing money to the banks of the South or depositing money in the banks of the South would reach the situation to any appreciable extent. It is because there is no demand for the whole crop that the price is down and because no one knows to-day what cotton can be purchased for to-morrow that he does not invest to-day, and because they know there will be a surplus at the end of this season people are afraid to buy cotton. Gentlemen have said there are 15,000,000 bales of cotton on hand, and that 30,000,000 people are in distress. I suppose that is an exaggeration, but a large number of people of the United States, in a range covering a great extent of territory, are met with the situation where they not only can not sell cotton at a profit, they can not sell the cotton at the cost of production, they can not sell the cotton for enough to pay their bills, and in some cases can not sell it at all. You have had a system in the South which does not appeal very strongly to most of us from the North, because we are not so familiar with it. We do not raise farm products on the same basis that you raise cotton in the South. At the end of the year when the crop is gathered in the North the man who gathers it does not already owe all of its worth either to the merchant or to the bank, but largely in the South when a man gathers his cotton crop he owes the value of it to the merchant or to the man who has financed him, possibly to his landlord, to somebody, and I am not endeavoring to criticize or express any opinion about the system; that is the fact.

If a man who has raised cotton can not pay his little merchant who has advanced his groceries and other supplies, then the little merchant can not pay the merchant from whom he bought or can not pay the banker from whom he borrowed, and the little country banker can not pay the city banker from whom he has received supplies, and the jobber and the manufacturer in the end are affected. You can not bring bankruptcy over a great section of our country without tremendous injury to the whole country. [Applause.] We have discovered through some of your economic legislation, which to me seems unwise, that many of our mills and manufacturing establishments are closed or running on short time. That is bad enough. We believe it ought to be changed. While we are opposed to what you have done, I believe that the situation in the South demands remedy. If that can be done by the bankers of the country or the financiers of the country through their mutual cooperation, that is a desirable method of doing it. If it can be done by the Secretary of the Treasury, that would be a desirable method of doing it. If it can be done by the Federal Reserve Board, that might answer, but if no one of those agencies or other agency outside of Congress is able to meet the situation, then the statesmanship of this land ought to be wise enough, by mutual aid, discretion, consideration, and help, to find some method, legitimate, without creating a precedent which would injure our country in the end; as I say, we ought to find some way of preventing this tremendous injury to a great section of our country. If a flood was to move in on us we would try to stop it. If a great dam had broken and the water was rushing down to bring destruction, we would try to stop it. I think that Congress ought to have the ability, as I believe it has the patriotism, to find a way, and I hope that we can all cooperate until we do find a way. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for eight minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped before this discussion should end that I might get time enough to present my matured view of this particular subject in its various aspects. But in the limited time of eight minutes I shall only refer briefly to some statements that have just been made by my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Nobody, Mr. Speaker, has to impress me with the gravity of the situation in the South. I realize it as keenly as any Member of the House. I believe the House, regardless of party and without respect to sections, is impressed with the gravity of the situation there, and is patriotically resolved to do everything within its scope and power to remedy the distress. But some gentlemen ask us to do that which the Congress has no right to do, things which do not come within the proper function of government; and notable among those who have asked these things is my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY]. He stated a while ago that the Secretary of the Treasury had very recently deposited $40,000,000 of "the people's money" in New York City to relieve the banks there, alleging that incident as a precedent for some of the remarkable suggestions which he has made in connection with this subject. The Secretary of the Treasury did not in fact send $40,000,000 of "the people's money" to New York City. He did not send one dollar of "the people's money" there at the time to which the Comptroller of the Currency made reference in his speech at Indianapolis. What the Secretary of the Treasury actually did on the occasion referred to was to express $40,000,000 of emergency bank notes to New York City upon application of the banks; and subsequently the New York banks loaned an equal amount to the South. At the same time, in the same way, the Secretary of the Treasury sent $68,000,000 of the same sort of currency to the South, and notified the South that it is entitled to receive $150,000,000 more of the same sort of currency at any moment that the banks of that section will comply with the law and deposit the necessary security.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. NORTON. Why did he not send the $40,000,000 to the South instead of to New York, to be loaned to the South?

Mr. GLASS. He sent every dollar to southern banks that they asked for, and is prepared now to send $150,000,000 more to southern banks if they will ask for it. More than that the Secretary of the Treasury is not at liberty to do. He has no lawful right, as the gentleman from Texas broadly asserts, to "withdraw Government deposits from banks all over the country and place them in southern banks." He has already gone the limit in that direction. In some quarters it is thought he has gone beyond the limit of his legal discretion in making deposits with southern banks. Besides sending $68,000,000 of emergency notes there upon approved security he has deposited $26,000,000 of "the people's money" with southern banks out of an available supply of only $74,000,000. The statute expressly requires that, in making these deposits, the Secretary of the Treasury shall observe equity between the various States and sections. If he has been partial to any section, it is the South.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. HENRY. I read the letter of the comptroller into the RECORD in order that it might speak for itself, and I phoned to him to send me an exact copy of his speech, which he did. What I wanted to ask the gentleman is this question: What security did the Secretary of the Treasury take from the National Park Bank when that bank loaned the State of Tennessee $1,400,000? What security did the Government take from the National Park Bank?

Mr. GLASS. You mean the New York bank which negotiated the Tennessee loan?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, yes.

Mr. GLASS. He took the security required by law.

Mr. HENRY. What is that security?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know the exact nature of it. The Secretary, I know, took the sort of security required by law.

Mr. HENRY. I have asked the Secretary of the Treasury what security he took for that loan to the State of Tennessee through the National Park Bank, and I have not received an answer.

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary of the Treasury has made no loan to the State of Tennessee. He is not authorized by law to make any loan to any State. The Secretary of the Treasury, in due process of business, deposited $400,000 of the Government's current funds in the National Park Bank of New York, taking that security which the law exacts. It was not an extraordinary deposit; it was no unusual thing; it was not an unlawful procedure, such as are the things proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman declined to be interrupted when he had half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield, and can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HENRY. You say the Secretary of the Treasury deposited $400,000. I say he deposited $1,400,000, for Tennessee, in the National Park Bank.

Mr. GLASS. That is as misleading as many other things the gentleman from Texas has told the House. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the due process of business, long before the Tennessee certificates matured, made a deposit of $1,000,000 of public funds in the National Park Bank of New York at the usual rate of interest to the Government. He did this precisely as he had made deposits of hundreds of thousands of dollars in other banks of New York and elsewhere. The deposit of that $1,000,000 had no relation whatsoever to the bonded indebtedness of Tennessee. Subsequently the Secretary of the Treasury deposited $400,000 additional with the National Park Bank and has frankly stated to the public that he used the discretion and power which the law vests in him to make this last deposit of public funds in a bank which proposed to aid a great State to meet instantly its matured indebtedness. The deposit is subject to call, as all Government deposits are, and draws interest until it is called. That is all there is to it. The Secretary of the Treasury did nothing irregular, nothing unprecedented, nothing that was unlawful. He did not loan Tennessee a dollar of "the people's money." Tennessee does not owe the Government a penny. The Treasury simply deposited funds with the Park Bank at the accustomed rate of interest, and the Park Bank, not the State of Tennessee, is responsible for the return of every dollar of the deposit. It was the same process employed by the Treasury in depositing $26,000,000 of "the people's money" with banks of the South to move the crops and many millions more with banks of other sections for a like purpose These funds were not loaned to the growers of crops; they were deposited by the Government, at interest, with the expectation that the banks would loan the funds to move the crops. The Government will exact return of the funds from the banks and not from the producers of crops.

While the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in these matters was regular and in no sense dangerous or extraordinary, the gentleman from Texas, on the contrary, has not presented a proposition to the House in aid of the cotton industry that is not absolutely unprecedented and that would not, if ventured upon as a legislative expedient, wreck the fabric of public confidence and cause a constriction of credits which would not only injure the cotton planters of the South but would involve all the business activities of the country in ruin.

With respect to these propositions, what does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] really favor as a remedy for the distressing situation in the South? It is of record that he does not favor the same thing one consecutive week after another. He scarcely favors the same thing one consecutive day after another. My friend from Texas first presented a proposition to valorize cotton—to tax all the people of the United States in order to guarantee the price of a single commodity. Thus we of the South, who for years have been preaching and teaching the Jeffersonian principle of "Equal rights for all and special privileges to none" [applause on the Democratic side], now propose, through the gentleman from Texas, to tax all the American people in order to maintain the price of a single commodity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Is that agreeable to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss]? I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] may have 10 minutes more.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will couple with that a request that I may have 10 minutes——

Mr. MANN. We have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] shall have 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks to have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has 10 minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, as I recall, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] first proposed that $500,000,000 of United States notes be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury and distributed, indiscriminately and without any sort of restriction, to all of the banks of the United States, to be used in the practical purchase and storage of cotton at a specified price; that the Congress should in this wise tax all the people for the special advantage of some of the people; that the Government should make itself liable to the extent of $500,000,000 of immediate gold obligations in order to deposit this immense amount of funds with all the banks in the South under directions—the most absurd proposition that the wit of man ever conceived [laughter]—under directions to these banks to loan this money upon a single commodity at an abnormally low rate of interest. In other words, it was expected——

Mr. GORDON. And at a specified price, too?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; at a specified price for the commodity vastly above its prevailing market value. It was, in effect, the valorization of a single commercial product at the expense and certain risk of all the people of the country. It was, in all its details, the most inconceivably chimerical suggestion ever presented to the Congress of the United States for meeting a distressing emergency.

A little later the gentleman from Texas abandoned that proposition and presented another scheme. A few days thereafter he presented a composite bill, on October 9, I believe, and then, three days later, still a different remedy. Which one of the variegated lot of rapidly multiplying remedies does he actually stand for?

The gentleman from Texas has cited here alleged precedents for his general theory of benevolent Government aid, but, Mr. Speaker, there are no real precedents in existence. The gentleman can not point to one. Nothing has ever been done by Congress or by the Government that bears any resemblance to the gentleman's extraordinary schemes.

On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman really wanted to give practical relief to the cotton-growing sections of this country, he had ample opportunity to do it. He not only neglected to do it, but has obstructed the legitimate efforts of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House to afford that relief. That committee, with but a single dissenting vote, reported three bills to the House which would infinitely relieve the situation in the cotton-growing States. Last Monday the Speaker agreed to recognize me to call up those three bills under suspension of the rules. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] served personal notice on me that he would use every parliamentary endeavor in his power to prevent the consideration of those perfectly feasible bills of relief unless the House would at the same time give consideration to his ludicrous proposition. [Laughter.]

One of those bills relates to the reserve requirements of the Federal reserve act. It was unanimously recommended to the consideration of the House committee by the Federal Reserve Board and urged time and again by the Secretary of the Treasury; with but one dissenting vote it was by the Committee on Banking and Currency reported favorably to the House. That bill alone would afford increased credit facilities to the five regional reserve banks doing business with the cotton-growing States of approximately $296,000,000; and yet the gentleman from Texas, by his obstructive tactics, prevented consideration of that bill after the Speaker had agreed to recognize me.

Following this frustration of real relief to the cotton States, I asked the gentleman from Texas, by request of my committee, for a rule under which the committee bill might be considered; but he has never brought in the rule. Yet he ventures to tell us that immediate legislation, such as he desires enacted, can be had here if only the Secretary of the Treasury will suggest it. He thinks that a serious and repeated recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board of bills really designed to furnish credits to the cotton growers of the South in this emergency should be contemptuously defeated by filibustering tactics; and yet he assumes that a mere suggestion from the Secretary of the Treasury alone would drive Congress into the desperate expedient of empowering that official to sell $250,000,000 of Government bonds—not to replenish the Government's revenues, but to raise funds to be deposited in State and national banks for the benefit of a single class of citizens engaged in a single industry. He would thus commit the people's money to banking institutions over which the people's Government has no control; to many banks having not a dollar of reserve behind their deposits, some of them without examination requirements, and some banks that not a Member of this House would deposit his own private funds in, and against which the Government would have no legal recourse when the inevitable crash should come.

The gentleman from Texas assumes to say that the House only requires a hint from the Secretary of the Treasury to do this astounding thing. Mr. Speaker, if the thing proposed is constitutional; if it is, in truth, remedial; if it is as imperative as the gentleman from Texas suggests; if it can so readily be done, why wait for advice that the gentleman knows will never be given? Why does not the gentleman from Texas have the House do it without the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he will never get? If the Henry scheme is so comprehensive, so simple, so conclusive, so urgent, why does not the chairman of the great Committee on Rules impress himself upon this House and have it done? Aye, why does he not so impress his views upon his own committee as to bring out a rule for consideration of his amazing series of bills? He confidently asserts that it is easy to get the House to act, yet he has failed to get his own committee to indorse his wonderful scheme.

As to this talk of Government valorization of a staple product, we are not without light from the lamp of experience, Mr. Speaker. I said just now that the Henry suggestions are without precedent; but something akin to one of his schemes was attempted in the early stages of the Civil War, when the Confederacy was in the fullness of its strength and at the zenith of its expectations. Threatened by hostile forces on the north, with the greatest necessity of maintaining its own arms in its own territory, appreciating the vital value of cotton to the Government's credit abroad and its triumph at home, valorization was attempted by the Confederacy. I want to read to the House, if I may, in a moment, the result of the experiment in Mr. HENRY'S field of endeavor. This is a brief extract from Pollard's Secret History of the Southern Confederacy:

Commissioners were appointed to canvass every square mile of territory in the Confederacy. A separate bureau to manage the loan was organized in Richmond, the lamented J. D. B. De Bow being its head. The progress of subscriptions was watched with the greatest solicitude by the public; the reporters of the newspapers visited almost every day the office of the chief commissioner and published the list of subscriptions, to excite the competition of particular districts. On the 20th of July, 1861, it was announced by the Government with ill-restrained delight, and to the lively gratification of the public, that the produce loan, estimated by values, had already reached $50,000,000 and by the close of the year might be expected to touch the magnificent sum of $100,000,000.

When the year did close, the produce loan had disappeared. No one knew of it; no one inquired of it; no one cared for it. In reality it had ceased to exist; it had already passed into history as one of the most complete failures and notable absurdities of the Confederacy. The bureau which had been so ostentatiously constructed was discontinued; the office rooms which Mr. De Bow had so handsomely furnished, and which had been the rendezvous of politicians and reporters, were closed and "to let"; and actually all that remained of this magnificent loan were the dead leaves of paper on which its figures had been marshaled.

Mr. Speaker, that is what my colleague from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is inviting this Congress to do. He would impose upon this country a currency system the product of which would be as the dead leaves of paper upon which that valorization loan was printed; a currency system which, as once before I had occasion to point out, was tried by France prior to the period of the Revolution, when that Government engaged in the lamentable business of depreciating the nation's currency by resort to wild schemes of inflation and to projects which were repugnant to every tested principle of sound economics. These schemes brought not even temporary relief; but only misery and crime fast followed in their wake. The French Government, in its frantic but futile attempts to avert the terrible consequences of its financial saturnalia, enacted laws which provided the penalty of fine and imprisonment of persons who discriminated against the country's depreciated currency by refusing to accept it at par with specie. Failing to maintain parity by the penalty of fine and imprisonment, the Government finally passed a law to guillotine every person refusing to accept at face value its miserable, depreciated currency. History does not record that any person of the producing masses or tradespeople of France was guillotined for the offense; but pretty soon there was dreadful retribution for the lawmaking caste and reprisal for maladministration and deception. If this Congress were to respond to these wild propositions of the gentleman from Texas, the cotton growers of the South would not be helped. On the contrary, Congress would be discredited; public faith would be imperiled; our sanity would be suspected; real money would be hoarded; private credit would break down; and I venture to believe that the gentleman from Texas would be the first victim of the indignation which the farmers of that great State would visit upon those responsible for their calamity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 16, 1914.

COTTON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, for more than two months I have been seeking a discussion of this question on the floor of the House before the American people. I am proud of the privilege of standing here to-day for the purpose of discussing with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. GLASS] the merits of the proposition that I have had the honor to introduce. The gentleman has my respect, my regard, and my personal affection, because I have served with him in this House for many years, and I hope we are endeared to one another. But when he says I have proposed a wild and chimerical thing to this body I deny it. I might respond by saying that unfortunately every drop of his blood is tinctured with the bank mania, and that he is not willing to have the people's money go out in circulation amongst the masses until it has passed through a system of banks, in order that they may charge toll and take their "pound of flesh."

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt my friend a moment?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; just for one moment.

Mr. GLASS. Does not every one of your bills provide that every dollar to be issued under them shall go through the medium of the banks?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, but that is not all. I will get to that. The gentleman says he does not know what measure I stand for, and that I change from day to day. Let me say to him that on September 22 I introduced a bill, prepared after conference with those interested in the South, dealing with this question, and am ready to join issue with him in this House and before the American people in the arena of public opinion on the propositions contained in my bill. We went before his committee, commissioned by millions of farmers and people in the South, and urged him to report my bill. But the gentleman and some of his colleagues gleefully tabled the measure, so that it might not come to this body where a vote could be had upon it. I challenge him to-day, and challenge the members of his committee concurring with him, to come on the floor of this House and debate with us the merits of the bill introduced on the 22d day of September. It is numbered H. R. 18916.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GLASS. You are the chairman of the Committee on Rules, which controls such matters, and you can bring that bill here at any time. Why do you not do it?

Mr. HENRY. If you will ask those members who have not been in accord with me to bring it on this floor next Monday, it will come.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I shall not ask them to bring it here, because I do not favor your bill.

Mr. HENRY. More than that, I said, "If you will not give us the relief contained in this bill, we will go further. We will compromise this matter with you," and a committee of 16 was appointed by the representatives of the Southern States, and we met in the House caucus room, and there we agreed on a measure that practically every Democrat from the South acquiesced in, and asked the gentleman from Virginia [Mr GLASS] to report the same, and he refused even to call his committee together to consider it. I want to say to my colleague from the South that we have invoked his assistance to get that matter before this body, and he has failed us.

That conference bill prepared by the Democrats from the South is H. R. 19203, and reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19203) for the temporary relief of cotton and tobacco growers of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and under the terms and conditions of this act, to be advanced to the producers of cotton and tobacco, or owners of lands upon which the same was produced upon cotton or tobacco produced during 1914, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum. The deposits herein authorized shall be advanced upon the terms prescribed in this act and under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton and pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make and enforce rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith for carrying out the purposes of this act. Said Secretary of the Treasury may fix the compensation for the banks for their services in lending said sums of money.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as is herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000: Provided, That such United States notes, should the Secretary of the Treasury conclude to issue them, deposited under this act and not used as prescribed herein shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be destroyed.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force upon its passage.

SEC. 5. That this act shall expire by limitation on the 31st day of December, 1915.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. GLASS. Is it not fair to state that by letter I notified the gentleman that my committee had time and again met and adjourned at his request, and that I declined further to dance attendance upon him until he would ask his Committee on Rules to comply with the request of the Banking and Currency Committee to bring in a rule for consideration of the bill that had been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee for the relief of the cotton growers and tobacco planters of the South? This is the letter referred to:

OCTOBER 9, 1914.

HON. R. L. HENRY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HENRY: I have your letter of this date inclosing a typewritten copy of a proposed bill "for the temporary relief of cotton and tobacco growers in the United States," and note your request that I call a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee for its immediate consideration. In response I desire to say that no bill of the description indicated has reached the Banking and Currency Committee, and you must know that the committee can not formally take cognizance of a mere typewritten memorandum. Should such a bill come to the Banking and Currency Committee by reference, I shall take up with the committee the question of its consideration.

In this connection I draw your attention to the fact that I have promptly responded to every request you have made for meetings of the Banking and Currency Committee to consider bills introduced by you for the relief of the cotton situation, and have cheerfully given hearings to those interested in the subject. On the contrary, last Monday, in the House, you thwarted my effort to have considered three bills ordered reported by an almost unanimous vote of the Banking and Currency Committee, one of which alone would afford credit facilities of approximately $300,000,000 to the cotton-growing States. These bills are approved by the Federal Reserve Board, and the Speaker promised me recognition to call them up; but you have personally put me upon notice that you would object.

Since the receipt of your request for another meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee I have informally conferred with most of the members, and I find them averse to any further meetings of the committee at your request until you shall have first called a meeting of the Committee on Rules to consider the rule asked for by the Banking and Currency Committee involving the consideration of the bill to which I have herein referred as affording additional credit facilities of nearly $300,000,000 to the cotton-growing States.

Very truly, yours,

CARTER GLASS.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker; he had three bills that enlarged the powers of the national banks. They carried no relief to the stricken South. He did ask that. But I want to assure the gentleman that in so far as my feeble ability went I did not intend to allow him to "outgeneral" me and suppress the real legislation that would bring relief to the southern people. And I will say here now that if he is willing to have a vote on the bill introduced on the 22d day of September, H. R. 18916, or the other bill introduced by me for the committee and for the southern Representatives on October 9, H. R. 19203, we will bring them in from the Committee on Rules next Monday and debate the question face to face here before the people. I pause for a reply. Will the gentleman urge the Committee on Rules to bring those bills out of the committee? [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. I will give the gentleman a reply. He is at all times so amiable and so courteous and so appeals to my personal regard that it is a genuine pleasure to discuss with him.

Mr. HENRY. I want a reply.

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection now, and never had any, to voting on your bills. I shall vote against them, because I think they are absurd. But why does not the gentleman bring them in?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman is a very courageous man; but instead of asking me to bring them here, why did the gentleman lay them on the table and suppress them?

Mr. GLASS. I laid them on the table because I thought that is where they ought to be. If you think they ought to be here, why do you not bring them in?

Mr. HENRY. Then I ask you to join me in a request to take them from the table. Will you do it?

Permit me to repeat, join with me in requesting to take them from the table. Will you do it?

Mr. GLASS. Why, no; I will not do anything of the kind, because I think they ought to be on the table.

Mr. HENRY. No; you will not do it because you and those cooperating with you have not the courage to meet the issue.

Mr. GLASS. I had courage enough to lay your bill on the table, and I have courage enough to keep it there if I can. [Applause and laughter.] It was a record vote in the Banking and Currency Committee, and the gentleman and the country can see it any time.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman speaks of courage. I am going to undertake to assert a little courage, too, and, as far as I am concerned, we will not only lay your bill on the table, but will lay it under the daisies and turn its toes to the heavens forever. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. When the cotton growers of Texas find out what the gentleman has done to deprive them of real relief, they will lay him under the daisies and turn his toes to the heavens. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HENRY. You have not the courage to bring the matter before Congress. I challenge you now to meet us in the open at the bar of public opinion. We are ready to call on the battle.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, so much of the time of the gentleman has been taken by interruptions that I will ask the gentleman if he will accept 10 minutes more if he can get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. I do not care to trespass upon the time of the House. Is my time up, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY. Here are the bills in order—one introduced on the 22d of September and the other on October 9, when we tried to get you to agree, and you would not agree, to deposit five hundred millions in money in the South, and you would not help to issue the Panama Canal bonds, and you would not assent to the issue of United States notes; and then we went back, the southerners, and got together and tried to agree, and did agree, and said, "Deposit $250,000,000 in our banks and let us sell the Panama Canal bonds or issue United States notes as we did during the war," and you refused us even that request. That is all we ask. We ask nothing unusual, and I will say that my bill follows the precedents and well-marked lines that have been made for more than a century and we will put the people's money where the producer of cotton can secure it and require these fiscal agents to loan it to the producer of cotton or tobacco in those Southern States. Is there anything unusual about that? We provide that it shall not exceed 4 per cent interest. Is there anything wrong about that? We provide that those banks shall be fiscal agents of the Government, and is there anything wrong about that? We have done it more than a hundred times. And then, in section 2 of this last bill, we give the Secretary of the Treasury colossal power. We give him plenary authority to loan this money either through the banks or directly to the producers of cotton or tobacco, and I challenge you to the combat, and those who have always helped you to smother this legislation, to give us a vote; and with the aid of the patriotic gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] we will draft a bill and put it through the American Congress and save the southern people from this distress and rescue their billion-dollar crop already produced. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the subject of rural credits has received nation-wide discussion. This agitation grows out of the admitted need of better credit facilities and a lower interest rate for our agricultural population. In comparison with the leading nations of Europe, the American farmer pays a higher rate of interest and borrows under harder terms. This statement is true whether it be applied to personal or mortgage credit. The farmer is under like disadvantage if the comparison be with the American business man. I am aware that this latter statement has been challenged, but I refer those desiring absolute proof to Senate Document No. 214, part 3, which contains a report made to the United States commission on rural credits by special commissioners appointed by the governors of every State in the Union. This discrimination grows out of the fact that the bankers and business men are one and the same class of men, representing the same general financial interests. This important relation is emphasized by Mr. Henry B. Joy, president of the Packard Motor Car Co., in a letter to Mr. A. W. Shaw, publisher of System, at Chicago, under date of September 3, 1914. Mr. Joy said:

As a matter of fact, the bankers of the United States are the business men of the United States, and the banks of the United States are the bulwarks of the business of the United States, and their interests are the same and mutual. Both are run by the same people.

In this short statement by one of the leading business men of the Nation is contained an unanswerable argument for the creation of a new system of banking in the United States which shall be the bulwark of the agricultural interests and which shall be controlled by the farmers of the Nation. Our purpose must be to organize rural-credit banks which will be run by the same people who do the farming and who own the farms of the Nation.

This statement of Mr. Joy is in entire harmony with the definition of a commercial bank which a leading banker recently gave to the public press:

The real business of a bank is to gather together the current deposits of the people and amass them into a body of liquid capital that can be loaned out to people engaged in a commercial business.

These representative utterances on the part of business men and bankers furnish in part the explanation why rates are higher and terms harsher to farmers than to business men. Senator HOLLIS, who is chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, stated on the floor of the Senate recently that the annual interest rates on farm mortgages in the United States vary from 5 per cent to 25 per cent, including commissions and renewal fees. This statement, incredible as it may appear to those who have made no careful investigation, will be accepted as conservative by every student. The evidence now available from official sources and gathered by agents of the Government is conclusive that interest rates to farmers in many if not in all sections of the Union are usurious and prohibitive, so far as such loans yielding to the farmer profitable returns when applied to productive uses on the farm. Therefore a new banking system is imperatively demanded—a banking system which shall not be under control and domination by the commercial interests of our cities, but which will be dedicated to the exclusive service of agriculture, to the right development of rural communities and rural interests, to the rational promotion of better business on the farm and of better living among farmers.

This legislation has been promised by the representatives of all political parties. No man now in public life can honorably deny the pledges given to the people by his party, and woe be to that man or party who tries to repudiate such solemn obligations.

No plausible excuse can be offered for any delay beyond a reasonable time for consideration and study of the various proposals which may be submitted on this subject. Many bills have been introduced in Congress. In the main these several bills represent the individual views of their authors. There are two bills, however, each of which represents the conclusions of a group of men after careful study and wide consultation. I refer to the Moss-Fletcher bill, framed by the United States Commission on Rural Credits, and the Bulkley-Hollis bill, framed by the joint Subcommittee on Banking and Currency of the House and Senate. I shall confine my present remarks to a comparison of these two bills, referring to them as the commission and committee bills, respectively.

It is fair to say that the commission bill is the oldest in point of time; in fact, it is the first bill to be presented on mortgage credit which attempted to organize a distinctively American system of mortgage banks. The hope of the commission was not to draft a completed bill, perfect in all details. We were not so ambitious. Our purpose was rather to present in legislative form the fundamental principles which must underlie legislation on this most important subject. All data gathered and all conclusions formed by our commission after nearly a year of travel and study were placed before the subcommittee, and in so far as the individual members of the commission could be of service to them there was the fullest collaboration. The bill submitted by us was the first draft, with no benefit of revision which comes from wide publicity, discussion, and criticism. Speaking of the relation between the committee bill and the commission bill, Senator HOLLIS stated to the Senate that the two bills are in all respects similar, but that the framework of the commission bill had been changed and, in his opinion, numerous improvements had been added to it, but that the work of the United States commission was really the basis of the work of the subcommittee. This statement by Senator HOLLIS is a very generous acknowledgment to our commission, which will be sincerely appreciated by its membership and which largely compensates us for the pioneer work we did in this field. I wish to emphasize the fact that these two bills differ principally in administrative detail and not in principle or purpose; they are not, therefore, in any extreme sense antagonistic or in opposition. I have no doubt that further study and discussion would materially improve either of them, and I am equally confident that those who have worked to bring them to their present state of perfection would gladly welcome suggestions toward further improvement.

In the wide meaning of the term rural credits embraces two distinct classes of banking operations—short-time or personal credit, and long-time or mortgage credit. There are three distinct types of banks organized to carry on these several banking operations, viz, banks extending short-time credit based on personal or collateral security, banks which give long-time credit based on land values as security, and mixed mortgage banks, which extend both personal and long-time credit and accept both classes and kinds of security. Mortgage banks are further divided between those which loan on rural real estate only and those which extend loans on urban as well as rural real estate. The commission bill seeks to organize a system of pure mortgage banks, limited to loans on rural real estate for productive purposes and within certain limitation as to amounts which can be loaned to any one person. This principle was accepted by the committee practically as proposed. Their limitation as to purpose and amount is more severe, while their central bank is given the right to purchase mortgages on urban real estate. The proposal to exempt capital stock, mortgages, and bonds from all State and national taxation was also accepted and appears in the committee bill. This was the most radical feature of our bill, and the only one which contains a subvention from the public or a special privilege which in effect amounts to a subvention. In Indiana mortgages are now taxed at their face value; the average rate of taxation is around 3 per cent. It can readily be seen that an exemption from such taxation is the equivalent of large favor or indirect subsidy from the Government. On the other hand, our commission deemed this concession of vital consequence, and that without this exemption it would be impossible to organize such banks in many States of the Union. As some States tax mortgages at full value, some tax them only partially, while others exempt them entirely, uniformity of conditions can not be produced in any other manner. Again, the credit instrument created is a land bond. This bond is in the nature of a duplicate for the mortgage on which it is based and instead of which the bond is issued. To tax both bond and mortgage is to impose double taxation on debt. The commission frankly rested its bill on the acceptance of this feature, and, in my opinion, no bill can be drawn which will be successful in operation without the incorporation of this provision. The acceptance of a land bond as the credit instrument to be issued by the banks, based on their assets and credit capital under rigid governmental supervision and without express Government guarantee, is the basis of both bills. The features of the committee's bill which give direct governmental aid is the subscription by the Secretary of the Treasury of capital stock to the central bank in case private capital or subscriptions by States do not amount to $500,000 in each Federal reserve district, and the possible purchase of certain amounts annually of land bonds. Direct Government guaranty is not given to the bonds under the committee bill. The extent to which the Federal Government could be obligated for the ultimate payment of these land bonds is measured by the amount of capital stock which might be subscribed by the Government in the various central banks, and the liability is that of the owner of capital stock in the bank, and carries with it the alternative advantage to share in the profits of the bank. In no proper sense is it a Government guaranty and lends no security beyond that given by any other solvent owner of capital stock of equal amount.

The essential feature of mortgage credit as proposed by rural credits and as differentiated from other investment banking is a guaranty fund maintained by the bank issuing land bonds to insure the prompt payment when due of both principal and interest on the bonds. The principal security for the ultimate repayment of all liabilities is the land values pledged under mortgage; but to guard against temporary default in payment by the real borrower, the mortgagor, and thereby insure the prompt redemption of every promise to pay to the real lender, the bondholder, the banks issuing these land bonds are required to collect and to maintain a security fund pledged for this particular purpose, and which can not be diverted to any other purpose. This surety fund is required to bear a certain fixed proportion to the volume of bonds in circulation. Both bills seek to provide this insurance but devise different machinery and distribute the burden in different degrees between the borrower and the shareholder. Each bill requires certain cash and credit capital; broadly speaking, the commission bill requires the carrying of a larger cash capital and the committee bill pledges a larger credit capital. In addition to the capital and surplus of the bank, each bill authorizes the accumulation of a special redemption fund out of the interest charges. This reserve is mandatory on the part of the commission bill and is permissive in the committee bill. The commission bill requires the bank to maintain a 5 per cent special fund, which is accumulated out of the administrative charges or profits of the bank. The burden of this fund is thus laid exclusively on the stockholders of the bank. The shareholders receive the profits and are required to meet the losses.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an interruption there? I would like to ask him a question for information.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. What becomes of this redemption fund? Where is it invested, and how is it reserved?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I will discuss that matter in a moment.

The committee bill authorizes but does not require the central bank to create a special redemption fund, but secures it by imposing a higher interest rate than could be otherwise charged—that is, by charging a rate on mortgages in excess of the 1 per cent margin which is permitted to be charged as an administrative charge, thus imposing this fund directly and wholly on the borrowers. To state this feature more clearly, each bill limits the bank for its services to a charge not exceeding 1 per cent on the face of the bonds it may have in circulation; but the committee bill permits the bank to increase the interest rate higher than the 1 per cent and to hold the additional interest money as a special surety fund. At the close of a five-year period the bank may make application to the Federal Reserve Board for permission to prorate among the borrowers any balance which may remain in the special fund after paying all losses.

I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. BORLAND. Not quite. What is done with the fund in the meantime? Is it invested or loaned out, or is it held in cash?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It is held by the regional bank and, of course, invested as it invests any portion of its capital.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a balance held by the regional banks?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Yes; it is a special fund held for a special purpose. To go a little further—I do not wish to go into details, as I do not have the time—I may state that this special reserve fund must be segregated as to States, and is held as a special fund to secure the loans held in that particular State. For instance, if the regional bank were to accumulate such a fund to secure Indiana loans, the rate would be imposed only upon the borrowers in the State of Indiana. It would be held by the regional bank as a separate fund to be applied in liquidation of any losses which may arise out of loans made in the State of Indiana; and when this reserve is finally prorated it would go back to the borrowers in Indiana. I think that is a fair statement, is it not, Mr. BULKLEY, of the special reserve fund?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is a fair statement, as far as it goes. I want to make a statement of my own at the proper time.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The bill does not require this fund to be thus prorated; it only permits it.

It is thus possible under the terms of the bill for the bank to accumulate a reserve fund which in reality belongs to the borrowers, but which it is not compelled to pay over to the rightful owners. Under the commission bill the bank can in no instance charge a higher interest rate than the 1 per cent over its rate on the land bonds. It is fair to state that, under the committee bill, the borrowers are also shareholders in the local association; but under the most favorable working conditions of the system they can not hold more than 50 per cent of the stock in local and central banks. The net result of the committee method of raising this guaranty fund, even if the balance were to be faithfully prorated to its real owners, the borrowers, would, in my opinion, be to impose slightly higher interest rates during at least the first five-year period. This difference is one of administration and not of principle.

Both bills are identical in requiring all long-time loans to contain a compulsory amortization provision. This feature makes these banks to be saving institutions in the best sense of that term and prevents any person going in debt through their agency for long periods of time without a gradual saving, which is applied toward the reduction of the principal of his debt. Both bills fix the limit of mortgage indebtedness at 50 per cent of the actual value of the land mortgaged and require the banks to hold valid first mortgages equal in face value to the land bonds outstanding. The commission bill fixes the maximum rate of interest charged on farm mortgages by the rate paid on the land bonds; the committee bill gets the legal rate in control in the various States unless modified by the order of the Federal Reserve Board. Under the powers given to this board it can name the interest rate for any local association provided such rate does not exceed the legal rate in the State where such association is located and without undue discrimination between locals in such State.

Our commission, after a careful study of all European systems of mortgage banks, came to the unanimous conclusion that none of them could be introduced in its entirety, and that a new organization would have to be devised. It is our opinion that this new bank should be patterned after existing American banks as nearly as is practical. We recognized that our system of banking at the time of formulating our report was undergoing reorganization and would probably be radically changed. At the same time it was equally well known that European experience was being drawn upon to furnish the model for the new system. Throughout Europe all commercial banking is conducted through a central bank of issue, and this is equally true of rural credit banks which supply short-term or personal credit. There are more than 17,000 of these small personal-credit banks or associations in Germany, all united in one great system and having one central bank, to mobilize the assets of the federated banks. The Monetary Commission's original recommendation for a central bank was undoubtedly influenced by European banking history and experience. It is also true that mortgage-banking Europe is firmly organized with independent banks. So far as European experience gives guidance, it is as strongly for independent mortgage banks as it is for federated commercial banks. The Landschaften banks in Germany actually formed a federation with a central bank to issue and market the bonds for the entire federation, it being their purpose to secure a better price for their bonds because of this federation. It was an effort made by experienced bankers to apply the same method of organization to mortgage banking as to commercial banking.

This is an attractive theory, but it failed when applied to the sale of land bonds, and the association has the unique history of being the only mortgage association in Europe which has failed. There can be no gainsaying the fact that independent mortgage banks have a most successful history in Europe. These banks have two general types, that of joint stock and cooperative, and both have an enviable record for success and efficiency.

The commission bill presents an outline for a system of independent banks, each having the full functions of a mortgage bank, and in its organization, administration, and supervision closely modeled after the national-bank law. This law admirably adjusts itself to the machinery of the bank with independent functions, as that was the character of all American banking institutions until the adoption of the Federal reserve system. The committee bill agrees with the commission bill in seeking to organize a system of mortgage banks after American models, but chose the Federal reserve system as the guide. In order to accept this form of organization, a central bank with large capital was authorized to be chartered in each Federal reserve district, which has the sole power to issue land bonds. It is at this point that the two bills diverge so widely in their administrative organization that they can not be harmonized. If either bill is to be accepted without substantial modification, Congress will have to choose between a strongly centralized system and a decentralized one; between independent banks, each exercising the full functions of mortgage banking and a central bank with federated members and the functions of banking divided between the central organization and the federated members, but with the supreme control vested in the central.

It is in the latter power given to the central bank in the committee bill which centralizes power more strongly than in the Federal reserve system. In the latter scheme of banking, member banks are not deprived of their privilege to solicit business independently of the central bank or to contract a line of lawful business which is within their ability to handle. An independent national bank, in becoming a member bank, is permitted to act with all its former independence within the limits of its loanable funds. At its own peril it may discount paper which is not prime within the definition of the banking law and which will not be rediscounted by the regional bank. The penalty imposed by the new system on such action is the refusing of rediscount; but no member bank will apply for such rediscount as long as its own reserves are ample to meet its demands, and it is easily within the range of possibilities that many member banks will rarely apply to the regional bank for rediscounts. It is evident that State banks are not applying for admission to the federated system, though the door stands wide open and every special privilege granted by law to member banks is being jealously guarded for their exclusive benefit.

This liberty of independent action is not extended to mortgage associations in the committee bill, and we do not have under its terms that happy compromise between centralized and decentralized systems which secures the conservatism of centralization without destroying the utmost development of local business and the fullest utilization of local opportunities. The committee bill reduces all mortgage associations to the level of mere local societies without independent funds, power, opportunity, or prestige. The general character of the proposed mortgage associations is thus described by Senator HOLLIS, one of the joint authors of the bill:

> These local associations will approximate the size and functions of ordinary building and loan associations. The office may be in a country store or with a local insurance agent. They will never have a large amount of money on hand. A single officer will care for their simple routine. They will not receive deposits subject to check or loan money on anything but first mortgages.

If to the Senator's description is added the fact that these local associations can not sell or assign a mortgage to any purchaser except to a local association within the system or to the regional bank, their extreme dependence is very well depicted. The local associations can grant loans only as the regional bank will accept mortgages from the local on assignment, and under the terms of the bill the regional bank can exercise full liberty of action and can decline any or all mortgages tendered by any local association. As exclusive territory is allotted to each local association, it follows that only those farmers can be accommodated under the terms of this bill whose mortgages are accepted by the regional bank. The question of giving service to the patrons of the local association is decided, not by the officers of the bank where the farmers live but in the offices of the huge regional bank, located perhaps hundreds of miles away in some other State.

The general scheme of the Federal reserve system is not well suited to the functions of mortgage banking. As applied to commercial banking, the efficiency of the reserve system lies in its ample powers to rediscount prime securities held by member banks. The National Government under our Constitution is given the sole power to issue money, and in the new banking system this power is delegated to the regional banks under certain conditions. The regional banks can control the volume of money available for rediscount purposes, and in this way can accept all lawful business which any member bank may tender. It thus has ample power to insure the proper discharge of all its responsibility.

The regional bank in the rural-credit system of banks does not have such power, and it can not be delegated to it. The regional bank can not issue bonds except as it may find a purchaser for them; it can not sell its shares except on the same terms. The regional bank in the one system has the power to issue money and can thus increase the supply of currency; the regional bank in the other system does not have the power to secure money by issue, but is dependent upon negotiating the sale of its securities in the open markets of the world. This is a very important difference in fundamental powers. Because of this power of issue it is very proper that the first bank be given a monopoly of supplying credit. Under the limitations imposed on the second it is fatal to the largest usefulness of the system to clothe it with exclusive rights and jurisdiction.

Rural-credit mortgage banking—that is, mortgage banking which issues land bonds to lenders of money and requires mortgages on real estate from borrowers—comprises two distinct operations. The appraisement of land values and the examination of land titles is the first division; the selling of land bonds is the second. The draft of any law will be materially influenced by the view which its author holds as to the relative importance of these two necessary and coordinate operations. The successful lending of money on real estate necessitates the correct appraisement of land values. This, in my opinion, is the crucial test of mortgage banking; and whatever bank or system of banks, either independent or federated, which loans money on real estate, the stable market value of which has been correctly gauged by its agents or appraisers, will never meet financial disaster, but if the work of appraising be carelessly or faultily performed, the bank will ultimately fail, because the insurance fund will be absorbed by absolute losses and in the purchase of defaulted real estate. As a mortgage bank's outgo to its bondholders is always less than its income from its mortgagors, it is equally evident that an honestly managed bank can always meet its liabilities if it is able to collect its full revenues. In respect to its financial solvency, a bank doing a large volume of business is not in a stronger position than a smaller mortgage bank, because its assets and liabilities are always in proportion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent the gentleman may have time to conclude.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would desire about 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MANN. Well, fix some limit of time.

Mr. BULKLEY. Fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Thus the whole question of solvency pivots on the question of appraising of land values and the validity of land titles.

Unfortunately, most students of this banking problem approach it from the standpoint of a bond buyer—the question of securing money to loan is uppermost in their minds—so the whole machinery is staged from the one extreme of issuing bonds by the Government to an elaborate system of federated banks which depends upon the Federal Treasury for capital to secure a charter, and is then dependent upon further grants of public moneys to create a market for its securities, that it may transact business after its charter has been granted. This latter scheme is not unlike Pat's system of keeping a family cow. When asked how he fed his cow, he replied that she required no feed, as she sucked herself. As this question of independent or federated banks is a fundamental one to determine the administrative machinery, and, I also believe, to determine the ultimate success or failure of any system which may be organized, I wish to discuss it in some detail. As stated, the history of European mortgage banking is against the federated and in favor of the independent bank. The history of our own country is equally emphatic when rightfully studied. The building and loan societies are conducting a business in many respects similar to the proposed scheme of mortgage banking. In Indiana we have modified our State law to permit them to issue land bonds, and the State acts as fiscal agent in both appraising the lands and in holding physical custody of the mortgages to secure outstanding bonds.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. Before the gentleman gets too far into that, I want to see if I get the gentleman's main point. The gentleman does not object so much to the federated scheme of mortgage associations as to the fact that none of them will be allowed to sell bonds on their own hook. Is that the idea?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Precisely. I have no objection to the general administrative scheme of the committee bill if it were not exclusive. I am aiming my argument against that feature of the committee bill which does not give any liberty of independent action to the local bank to take advantage of local opportunity. It is my belief that in many sections of the United States where agriculture is well developed independent mortgage banks will be stronger than any system of federated banks.

These associations are moving gradually but surely in the direction of making farm loans on the amortization or fixed-payment plan, and granting unrecallable loans under certain agreed terms. No financial institutions in the United States can show a better record for achievement than can these associations, and this record has been made as independent societies which have been able to attract capital to their enterprises by reason of their solvency, their successful management, and to the most important fact that they are devoted to the permanent improvement of local interests. It is most significant in their history, as it is in the history of European mortgage associations, that national associations have been tried and have proven to be failures, while local associations have been almost uniformly successful. The successful experience of building and loan associations can not be overlooked by those who are to draft this new legislation. It is a history of independently managed financial institutions of moderate capital, controlled by local men of average ability and reputation, each association exercising full power and accepting full responsibility. It may be said that these associations have only been organized in well-settled communities, where industry is well organized and lands have acquired stable values. I admit it and confidently assert that no successful system of long-time rural credits, where unrecallable loans are granted for periods of 30 years or longer, has been operated in sections where farming represented an extrahazardous calling.

The advantage claimed for a large central bank is that such an institution will be able to place bonds more readily in the markets of the world, and thus will create a larger volume of business.

Before examining this contention critically I desire to mention that such a bank will be called upon to float immense volumes of bonds if it is to supply the needs of credit over such large areas as are comprised in our Federal reserve districts. Under the committee bill large favors are granted which amount, in effect, to very considerable governmental subventions. These institutions are given a monopoly of supplying credit under these conditions. No other institutions can have the same privileges under Federal law. The action of the President in vetoing a measure because it extended to State institutions certain privileges which under existing law are enjoyed exclusively by member banks of the Federal reserve system only shows the attitude which may be confidently expected to be assumed to protect these new banks in whatever special privileges may be granted them by Federal law.

Under the terms of the committee bill there can be but one bank in every Federal reserve district which has the power to issue land bonds. No member bank of the federated system—that is, no local mortgage association—has the right to dispose of its mortgages except to a bank within its own system. All mortgages must be assigned to the central bank or disposed of to some other local association. These associations must either be able to accept all applications for loans or else will have to exercise the right of selection among applicants. That will mean that certain citizens will be favored and others equally deserving will be denied service by a governmental agency, and one endowed in part at least with public moneys. It ought to be accepted as an axiom that where the Federal Government enters a field of legislation it should fully occupy that field. That is, the law should be broad enough in its terms that any citizen who can comply with its terms, and is willing to do so, may secure service or protection under the statute. But under the committee bill a monopoly of issuing credit instruments is given to one agency with the full knowledge that such institution can not serve all qualified citizens who apply for service, and which may, indeed, be able to serve but a very small portion of the public who are entitled under the law to share its benefits.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. While I would prefer to proceed a little further without interruption, I will, however, yield to the gentleman at this time.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to know if the gentleman can find in either of these plans anything that would favor the man who cultivates the land himself, who seeks to acquire an ownership of it, as against the man who owns the land and cultivates and exploits it by means of a tenant? In other words, if there is anything to encourage the owning of land by the actual cultivator of the soil rather than to encourage landlordism in the country?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that I did not deliver any introductory remarks to my address in order to save time. I am certain that the gentleman from Minnesota is fully aware that there are two distinct rural-credit plans of banking—one for those who do not own land and one for those who do own land; and inasmuch as there is no bill pending before the Congress to create personal-credit banks or banks distinctly for those who do not own land, I was discussing the two measures which relate to mortgage banking, one of which had been submitted by the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the other by the United States commission. It is manifest that mortgage banks can be useful only to those who hold title to land or who may by purchase acquire such title. Either bill permits the purchase of land partly on credit and the mortgaging of the title for part of the purchase price. However, that does not preclude anyone from framing a bill which will grant personal credit and which can open accounts with tenant farmers.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is aware that tenant farmers, of all interests, are protected, of course, as the agricultural land increases in value.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I am very well aware of that, but I do not desire at this time to discuss the general problem of rural credits. I was discussing propositions which have actually reached a legislative stage. We will undoubtedly enact legislation on this subject this winter. I take it that the work of the subcommittee will form the basis of that action, and I feel that any discussion in the House should be directed toward perfecting these measures.

For example, a local mortgage association is organized in my home county, which is one of the best agricultural counties in the Union. Under the terms of the committee bill any resident owner of farm lands within the territory assigned to the association is entitled to make application for a loan for certain specified purposes. The association, however, can grant loans only as the central bank will accept mortgages on assignment. The central bank can secure loanable funds only as it may be able to sell shares and land bonds. It is easily conceivable that the central bank will not be able to supply the money to accept all or even a considerable portion of the loans applied for. Under the terms of the bill it may refuse to accept any mortgages. The operations of the various central banks are under the direct supervision of the Federal Reserve Board; it is left to the discretion of this board to purchase all or any part of $50,000,000 of land bonds in any one year. Here are all the elements for undue favoritism if not for political pressure. If the result of the system is not to give lower rates and more favorable terms, it is a failure; if important advantages do follow and are given to only a portion of the applicants, we will have strong dissatisfaction if not political scandals and absolute political manipulation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the prevailing rate of interest in the various localities is to govern on these loans, where is the farmer to secure special benefits from the proposed legislation?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Under the bill framed by the commission, the bank could not charge the farmer borrower a rate more than 1 per cent higher than it paid to the bondholder. The bonds were freed from taxation, and are made absolutely a safe investment by safeguards which have been thoroughly proven. Naturally, under these conditions, the rate will fall to the lowest level which the prevailing financial conditions will permit. The farmer borrower benefits directly, because his rate will fall precisely in the same degree that the rate on the bond falls. I am positive that under open competition among banks this administrative charge will fall well below the maximum of 1 per cent. Whatever reduction is made in this charge means an equal reduction in the farmer's rate. In Europe well-established banks charge only thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent for their services. As land bonds are sold at as low a rate of interest as Government bonds, it follows that farmer borrowers get their money at an interest charge of only thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent higher than the Governments of Europe borrow for public purposes. When the system becomes well established in this country, under exemption from taxation, it is absolutely certain that interest rates on farm mortgages will closely approach the rates on money paid by municipalities, States, and Nation for money for public purposes. We are not asking for greater results.

There can be no justification for that provision in the committee bill which forbids a local association from assigning its mortgages to any purchaser except the central bank or a local association federated with the central bank. The central bank is not obligated to accept the mortgages when offered by the local association, but the local association is forbidden to dispose of its securities in any other manner. The result is that the activities of the association are limited to whatever business the central bank may allot to it. The requirements of different sections of our country for capital will vary widely. Generally speaking, that section where farming is most highly organized after intensive methods will absorb largest volumes of money. It is in such sections that local tax rates will be highest, and therefore the favors extended under the bill will be greatest. It is in such sections that a volume of capital can be attracted to local securities based on local real estate. If these transactions could be granted the exemptions from taxation, the aggregate volume of such capital would be immense. The rates in such communities would be lower than those generally prevailing over large areas of average farm territory in the United States, and the consequent advantages to agriculture would be transcendent. To illustrate this thought, I may say that we in Indiana are selling tax-free 4½ per cent bonds at a premium. These bonds are issued by the various townships in our State, and are sold by inserting advertisements in our State papers. There are many million dollars of these bonds now in circulation, and more are being sold every business day in the week.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. With pleasure.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a correction? They are county bonds instead of township bonds, but the property of the township in which the improvements are made and for which they are issued is alone taxed to pay the bonds so issued.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The gentleman's statement is technically correct. The county issues the bonds, though they are township bonds in every sense of the word, and are issued by the county in order to avoid the extremely low constitutional limit in our State of 2 per cent. By this legislative device it is often possible for a township to exceed its constitutional limitation of indebtedness. The county is in no sense responsible for any payment in case of default in payment.

Last April the great State of Tennessee offered an issue of State bonds bearing a rate of 4½ per cent at par, and not a single subscription from any source was received. At that very moment hundreds of lots of township bonds bearing 4½ per cent were being sold in Indiana at a premium. Indiana farmers were denied the benefit of this low rate on money because of our law taxing mortgages. In Ohio a change of law, whereby municipal bonds were made subject to taxation, stopped the sale of such bonds until the rate of interest be raised. Under date of September 26, the Brazil Trust Co., a local financial institution in my home county, purchased $12,000 of local bonds at par and accrued interest; on the same day Mr. Thomas Wirt, a citizen, took $2,000, paying a premium to secure them. In contrast to these modest transactions, which are truly representative of a very large volume of similar transactions, I may mention that the State of Tennessee has had serious trouble to place an issue of its State bonds. If press reports be true, a bankers' commission representing the State, and working in cooperation with the United States Senators for that State, failed to sell an issue of a million dollars in bonds at 6 per cent, and the Secretary of the United States Treasury only succeeded in negotiating the sale by making a special deposit of $400,000 of public funds in the bank which purchased the $1,000,000 of Tennessee State bonds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. The city of New York recently paid a syndicate of bankers 6 per cent for a hundred million dollar loan; at the same moment bonds bearing a rate of 4½ per cent and issued by our townships are actively selling among our own people at a premium. Yet the committee would have us believe that it will require an elaborate selling agency, under control and domination of the Federal Reserve Board, to sell bonds based on improved Indiana farms and underwritten by an association of Indiana farmers, for this is the committee plan.

The method of securing capital stock for the proposed regional banks does not insure that these banks will be able to discharge the full duties imposed upon them under the terms of this bill. Of course, a failure at this point is a failure of the whole system. The bank in each reserve district can be organized with a minimum capital of $500,000; this amount must be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury if the full amount is not taken by other subscribers within 90 days from date of offering. The power of the Secretary to subscribe to the capital stock in these banks is limited to the first issue. Thereafter all increases in capital must be secured from the federated associations, individuals, or the governments of States. The local associations are not required under the terms of the bill to take capital stock in the regional bank in excess of 10 per cent of their own capital, but under the ratios fixed in the bill the central bank is compelled to sell $9 in capital stock to individuals, firms, corporations, and States to every dollar which is required to be subscribed by the local association. The power of the central bank to issue land bonds is limited by its amount of capital stock. It therefore follows that if any central bank were to meet with difficulty in selling its capital stock it would be embarrassed in accepting mortgages from the local associations, and could not furnish these associations with loanable funds. This method of securing capital stock of the committee bill is evidently taken from Hungarian mortgage institutes which have a similar control and ownership of capital stock. The history of these two institutes has, therefore, great value and bearing on this provision of the bill. In speaking of this feature one of the directors made this statement to our commission:

> From the point of view of conservative management this system is an extremely practical one, but there is no denying the fact that it has its defects, too. The enthusiasm excited by the foundation of such institutes in time dies away, and then the further increase of the foundation capital becomes a matter of grave difficulty. In this respect the Hungarian National Land Mortgage Institute is remarkably fortunate. For five decades it has been in position to amass considerable reserves, and its sphere of activity has not widened as a result of economic progress to the same extent as that of the National Small Holders' Land Mortgage Institute. The latter, however, undoubtedly experiences grave difficulty in acquiring foundation capital to meet the requirements of such developments.

The stock of these two national institutes is permitted to pay 5 per cent dividends, which in Hungary is more than the equivalent of 6 per cent, which is the rate permitted under the committee bill. Hungary in area is not larger than a single American State and not nearly equal in area to some of the Federal reserve districts. These two institutes were each endowed with $200,000 capital by the State, as against the $500,000 provided in the committee bill for one central to supply a Federal reserve district. This sum has been supplemented by private subscription, after the method of the commission bill. After 50 years of operation these two State-endowed mortgage institutes hold less than 20 per cent of the real-estate mortgages in Hungary and confess their difficulty to obtain further capital. With this record, which was obtainable from the United States commission's report, the committee chose this model to supply mortgage credit for a nation of 100,000,000 people. The Government of Hungary extended to every other banking institution in the Kingdom exactly the same privileges which were given to these partly State-endowed institutes, except the stock subscriptions. Private capital and private initiative were permitted to compete for business on equal terms with public capital. Unless a similar modification be made in the committee bill and it were enacted into law, unless their banks make a more favorable growth in the United States than their models did in Hungary, only one farmer in every five will receive accommodations at their hands in the next 50 years.

In connection with Hungary's wise legislation, extending to all mortgage banks in the Kingdom the privilege of issuing land bonds under equal conditions of security, I can not overlook the fact that we have in the United States many well-established banking houses which do a large investment banking business. Many of these firms do an exclusive mortgage business. They have corps of trained men, established reputations, and large clientele. Many of these firms would gladly accept Federal charters, welcome the most rigid Federal inspection, and capitalize their banks more heavily than is now required under national law for commercial banks. These bankers would be able to sell large volumes of bonds and would greatly extend the activities and benefits of this legislation. The committee bill makes it impossible for these established banks to accept a national charter, and thus deprives rural credits of their assistance and support. Cheap credit on favorable terms is, or should be, the purpose of this legislation; and no national law should be enacted which by deliberate intention proscribes men from working under its terms by adopting regulations which have no other effect than to prevent any well-established banker from complying with them without destroying his established business.

Personally I am opposed to the placing of the system of rural-credit banks under the control of the Federal Reserve Board. This board is rightfully to become a powerful agency in the control and supervision over commercial banking. The removal of the Secretary of Agriculture as a member of this board, as suggested in the early drafts of the Federal reserve act, was an expression by Congress that this board was to devote its services exclusively to commercial banking. Surely no friend of rural credits would propose to remove the Secretary of Agriculture from a board which was to control and supervise rural banking. Under the committee bill this board is given the extreme power to control the interest rates, subject only to the State laws of usury.

The proponents of the bill evidently realized that as a complete monopoly of selling credit under the special privileges conferred by the bill was centered in the members of the system some check against extortion was necessary. The bill itself permits local associations to charge the full legal interest rates of the several States. The exemption from State and National taxation will make possible a reduction in rates of at least 2 per cent from the lowest of those now prevailing in mortgage loans. Free competition would insure that borrowers will receive the utmost of that reduction. Competition between chartered banks of equal power in Europe gradually reduced the administration charges from 1 per cent to an average of thirty-five hundredths of 1 per cent, which means a further reduction in the annual charges of sixty-five hundredths of 1 per cent. In purely mutual or cooperative mortgage banks this administration charge has been reduced as low as 0.15 per cent annually. Under the committee bill the banks are permitted to charge 1 per cent, and no means is provided to reduce this charge. The Federal Reserve Board can order the interest rate reduced, but is given no power over the administration charge, and no competition is permitted by other institutions enjoying any of the special privileges of those chartered under the bill. I shall regret to see the interest rate which the borrowers under any system of rural credits will be compelled to pay left to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board. This board is not given that power over commercial banks. It is given the power to fix the rate of rediscount by the Government, but the rate of interest charged by banks to their customers is governed by the laws of the State and the power of competition. It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury has recently called attention to interest rates which, under the circumstances, he considers exorbitant; but that is not the exercise of any legal authority. I personally visited an association of rural-credit banks in lower Austria—450 in number—which were loaning money for short-time periods to their members at 4½ per cent when the Government discount rate was fixed at 6 per cent. It is not conceivable that the Federal Reserve Board will ever order a lower rate in rural-credit banks than in commercial banks. It is the high rate of the commercial banks that this movement is projected against. Ultimately we propose to organize a system of personal-credit rural banks. The mortgage bank is but the first step in the campaign for a complete system of rural banking with short-time and long-time credit for the farmers of the United States. This campaign can never be successful if we place the absolute control over interest rates in the same board which supervises and virtually manages the commercial banks of the Nation. There will be competition between the two systems of banks. This is inevitable and it is desirable; but what chance will there be for successful competition if at the very beginning a monopolistic system of banks is created, with the supreme control—even to the extent of dictating absolutely the rates of interest to be charged—given over to the same body or board which will supervise the system of commercial banks of the Nation?

Whatever may be said of the defects of the commission bill—and, as has been said, the public copy was the first draft, which has never even received a revision at its author's hands—it is free from monopolistic control and is not guilty of seeking to appropriate public money for private uses. Its opportunities are open to all citizens on equal terms. The farms of the United States are now valued at nearly $40,000,000,000, agricultural products were never selling at a higher level of values, and no generation of farmers since the days of Adam have ever enjoyed so great advantages or had such splendid opportunities. The one crying need is better credit facilities that our farmers may go forward, feed and clothe the world, and enrich themselves by their industry. Here is the most inviting field for the investment banker in the wide world to-day. It is a field which will absorb vast sums of money. In looking about for sources to secure these funds we need not deceive ourselves—this money must come from the American people. The present world war will utterly destroy the so-called world's market for our securities. We will be called upon by impoverished Europe to buy back existing issues of American securities rather than to place new issues in their markets. This striking change in economic conditions has come about since the committee bill was written, but it should be apparent that we must finance our own enterprises. For this reason, among the others enumerated, it will be an act of folly to enact a monopolistic system of subsidized banks and deny to private capital and private initiative all opportunity to enter this vast field of investment and share a part of the great burden of improving American agriculture.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a minute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this day, I think, was private claims day. My understanding is that under some order which was made it was set aside in favor of District day. I ask that next Tuesday, not to interfere with the war-revenue or any other business, be assigned as private claims day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday be set aside for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, not to interfere with the war-revenue bill or anything else of a pressing nature.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. What will come up under that?

Mr. BORLAND. Well——

Mr. MANN. Would it be just as though it were to-day?

Mr. BORLAND. It would take the place of to-day.

Mr. MANN. Bills from the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. BORLAND. There are other private claims besides those from the Committee on War Claims which will be in order.

Mr. MANN. We will try to find out. If to-day had been used for the Private Calendar, the bills from the Committee on War Claims would have been up. I do not think they have much that is important, but some of them would take time, probably.

Mr. BORLAND. I would call the gentleman's attention to the rule——

Mr. MANN. You need not call my attention to that. I am perfectly familiar with it, and I have looked up the facts.

Mr. BORLAND. The preference is for war claims, but it is not conclusive.

Mr. MANN. We have one under unfinished business that will take the whole day.

Mr. HENRY. Did the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. I did not; but I am going to object.

Mr. HENRY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. What will come up Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Unanimous Consent Calendar, and suspension of rules, and the discharge of committees.

Mr. HENRY. There is no agreement that that will be District day?

The SPEAKER. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. I think that request excepted Mondays and Wednesdays. This was District day.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to accommodate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], but I feel constrained to object.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. HENRY. I will withhold it for a minute.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman what order of business it would interfere with?

Mr. HENRY. It is continuous——

Mr. BORLAND. I suggest to the gentleman that we will probably be waiting on the war-revenue bill next Tuesday, and we can use Monday to great advantage to the Members of this House on bills of a private nature that have been crowded out by this special order.

Mr. HENRY. I do not think you could use it to as good advantage that way as by taking up cotton legislation.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to discuss the cotton situation until we can agree upon something.

Mr. HENRY. Rather than to agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, I would ask unanimous consent that next Tuesday be set aside to discuss the cotton situation.

Mr. BORLAND. I could not consent to that to the exclusion of other business.

The SPEAKER. You can not have two things pending at once.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] objects, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, October 19, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 17, 1914.

(Legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 18891.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have two telegrams that I have received on the cotton proposition, and I ask that they be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TERRELL, TEX., October 14, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

The entire South will be bankrupt if we are compelled to sell half of our cotton at the prevailing prices. Appeal to the patriotism and sympathy of the Senators of the East, West, and North to help you prevent this crisis.

THE FIRST STATE BANK,
L. E. GRIFFITH, Jr., President.

TYLER, TEX., October 16, 1914.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Washington, D. C.:

Smith County people almost unanimously favor and urge the adoption of the Hoke Smith amendment to the war tax bill, which provides for bonds to purchase cotton at 10 cents. If you really understood the actual conditions surrounding your constituents of all classes, we think you could afford to support any reasonable measure which would bring relief and save the people from bankruptcy and ruin. Please show this to Senator CULBERSON.

TYLER COMMERCIAL CLUB,
By W. B. MARSH, President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] began his speech yesterday with the following sentences:

Mr. President, my object in offering this amendment is to strike out the tax features of this proposed cotton provision. My reasons I wish briefly to state to the Senate. I suppose the general lack of interest of the Senate this morning in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was owing to the fact that nobody expected it to pass, and for that reason Senators spoke to empty benches.

Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator from Mississippi did serious injustice to some of his colleagues when he made that statement. Those of us who favor this amendment not only expect it to pass, but we intend to use every legitimate means within our power to see that it does pass, so far as our votes are concerned. The Senator from Mississippi was never more in error in his life than when he said nobody expected this amendment to pass, and when he said later on that the speeches made on it were being made for home consumption.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Kern	Perkins	Swanson
Borah	Lane	Pomerene	Thomas
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Thompson
Camden	McCumber	Shafroth	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	McLean	Sheppard	Townsend
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Shields	Walsh
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Weeks
Gore	Nelson	Simmons	West
Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Ga.	White
Hughes	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.	Williams
James	Oliver	Smoot
Johnson	Overman	Sterling
Jones	Page	Stone

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in behalf of the Senate conferees on House bill 6282, I desire to submit a report, and I ask that it be printed and lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is probably in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will withhold it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the unanimous-consent agreement is to be kept——

Mr. THOMAS. I will not ask it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only thing to do is to proceed with the revenue bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I received a letter this morning from Mr. Robert W. Patterson, a citizen of my State, who was at one time president of the First National Bank of La Junta. It was written on board the steamship Metapan, one of the vessels of the United Fruit Co. The fleet belonging to this company has recently registered under the American flag. Mr. Patterson was a passenger upon that boat for a part of the voyage that it just concluded. He writes me concerning an incident that took place during that voyage which I think the country should be informed of without delay.

I am and have been well acquainted with Mr. Patterson for many years. I can therefore vouch for the credibility of the man, and I know that his statement must be correct. The letter is dated October 8, 1914. He says:

ON BOARD UNITED FRUIT CO.'S STEAMSHIP "METAPAN,"
October 8, 1914.

Senators THOMAS and SHAFROTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am within a couple hours of Colon on board the Metapan. Will be brief now to get this letter off on this ship. I will write more fully later.

This is an American vessel, flying the American flag. On Sunday, the 4th instant, between Cartagena and Puerto Colombia, at 10.30 a. m., this ship was boarded by two French officers and two armed soldiers from the French war vessel the Condé, who, through the captain, after having examined the ship's papers, ordered all the passengers into the dining room. After some 10 minutes all were permitted to leave the dining room except five young Germans, who were held imprisoned and compelled to each sign a parole in order to gain their liberty, binding them not to engage with Germany in this war against France, etc.

After these young Germans had each signed in triplicate this parole, the French officer and armed soldiers departed from the Metapan to the Condé, which had stood by during this search and seizure. The Metapan was held for 2½ hours or more.

This vessel has been recently transferred from a British ship to an American ship with the other vessels of the United Fruit Co. This is her first voyage as an American ship. The captain and all the officers, save the physician and third officer, are British subjects. The captain did not protest so far as I could see or hear. He admitted to the American consul of Barranquilla, Mr. Isaac Manning, that he did not protest. I witnessed the entire proceedings as herein recited.

I called the captain to account afterwards, and he claimed he did not know whether the Condé had a right to imprison and take off his ship these five Germans, said he could not find out until he arrived in New York. He said he would know his rights and duties if this were a British ship. I told him that there was but one international law for British ships and American ships. I said to him, "The next warship may be a German warship. If the Condé has a right to take Germans off an American ship upon the high seas sailing between neutral ports, the German warship has a right to take you and your English crew from the Metapan."

This American ship was sailing between two Colombian ports, neutral ports. Its entire voyage is between neutral ports, unless it should halt at Jamaica, an English or British port. Four of these Germans were sailing from New York to Puerto Colombia, Colombia, and one went on board at Cartagena (where I embarked for Colon) for Puerto Colombia. They were all going into the interior of Colombia, away from Germany. Two were born in Germany. One other was physically incapacitated to serve in the German Army and exhibited papers from the German Government to that effect.

Here was an outrage committed on American soil, under the American flag, by the Condé—the passengers were all practically imprisoned on an American ship by French officers of war.

I urged Mr. Manning to protest and to report upon this act of the Condé. He has made a report of this affair to the United States Government. I have this report in a sealed envelope in my possession, with instructions to mail it when I reach the United States. I expect to land in New Orleans about October 20. I can be reached there at the Hotel Monteleon; will be there but a day or two.

These are the facts as I know them. My sympathies are wholly with Great Britain and France in this uncivilized war. I am as much opposed to the Kaiser and the German military government as any Englishman or Frenchman. But this is not here nor there. I am, first of all, an American. I am, first of all, for justice and right. These Germans are entitled to the protection of the American flag.

A captain who submits without protest to such a violation of the neutral rights of an American ship under his command ought not to be permitted to command an American ship. He served the French officers with alacrity, a most cheerful willingness. Call upon the United Fruit Co. for his discharge, is my suggestion.

Yours,

ROBERT W. PATTERSON.

Mr. President, I have no suggestion to make concerning any course to be pursued about this affair, deeming that to be within the province of the State Department and perhaps within that of the Committee on Commerce of this body. I recall that that committee acted very summarily, and with great benefit to the country, at the time of the Titanic disaster, but if it be true that a ship which has recently registered under the American flag, taking advantage of the American law recently enacted for that purpose, and commanded by a crew of British officers, has been boarded on the high seas by the officers of a French cruiser, its passengers imprisoned and some of them outraged, and if it be also true that this affair occurred apparently with the acquiescence of the officers of the invaded vessel, the suggestion made by Mr. Patterson is entirely consistent, not only with the duty devolved upon the Government of the United States, but with the spirit of our American registry law, if properly interpreted, and with the dignity of the American flag.

We know in this great contest, and ought to know, none of these belligerents. We are partial to none of them. We are neutral. If this affair should go unnoticed, as I do not think it will, what would prevent, as Mr. Patterson suggests, the visitation of one of these vessels to-morrow by a German cruiser and the infliction of a similar outrage upon other American citizens? The five German passengers upon the Metapan should not have been subjected to the indignity of arrest nor required to submit to French demands as to military service. Their right to the protection of our neutral flag was as perfect as though they were on the streets of Washington. Let us hope that no such occurrence will be again repeated and that this one will be fully investigated and punished if the facts require it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], who has made a personal request to me to do so.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask leave to say a few words entirely of a personal nature on a matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate. I hold in my hand, and shall read from it, a journal published in New York City. The article has reference entirely to myself and expressions which I have used here on the floor of the Senate. It is headed "Senator MARTINE's profligate denunciation of tobacco," and is as follows:

Much as the consumption of tobacco has been reviled, as severely and outrageously as it has been attacked, its villification has never reached the malignity it did from the profligate mouth of Senator JAMES E. MARTINE, when the relief measure for the tobacco growers was under discussion the other day in the United States Senate.

"Personally," broke in that "peach of a Senator" from our neighboring State of New Jersey with such an ungrammatical and incoherent tirade as would disgrace the scholarship and intelligence of a school boy, "I think tobacco is a good deal of a nuisance. I see men chew it, and it is an abomination to me. I see them smoke it and fill God's pure air with stifling fumes, and to me it is most obnoxious. Almost every doctor in the land tells us to pass laws against its use. In fact, many of the States have barred the youth of our land from the use of cigarettes. Tobacco is the foundation of cigarettes, so that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and I presume my friend from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—and there is some of the stuff raised in Connecticut—when they safeguard and protect tobacco are really doing that which does not add to the welfare of man, but thus stifle him and make him dull and prosy."

Truly, no matter how much any man might be addicted to the use of tobacco he could not be as "dull and prosy," as ignorant and incoherent in grammar and speech as the New Jersey Senator in the above quotation from his inane railing against tobacco. When reading the above ribaldry one must wonder how it came about that such a Thersites—

Which name I have dug out, and I find in the Iliad that he was an insolent and abusive character—came to represent such a prosperous and cultivated Commonwealth as New Jersey in the highest legislative body in the country. And the wonder will find neither explanation nor excuse in the fact that the senatorial toga fell on a JAMES E. MARTINE as a result of our new-fangled primary method of senatorial elections. But it may find some explanation in the fact that the said JAMES E. MARTINE, of New Jersey, is one of the unregenerate disciples of the inflation and other heresies of the grape-juice "Commoner," and that the political hysteria which swept over the country during the last presidential election forgot and forgave all heresies except time-honored adherence to conservative principles. And on the wave of this hysteria such a misfit of man and legislator was carried into the august precincts of the Senate.

New Jersey is one of our great tobacco-products manufacturing States. Do, then, the great tobacco interests of New Jersey realize what a monster of enmity they have in such a representation—or, rather, misrepresentation—in one of their State seats in the Federal Senate? And what are they going to do about it if their Senator's despicable enmity to their welfare should tack an additional tobacco tax to the war-revenue measure when it is brought up in the Senate?

Mr. President, this is an effusion from the United States Tobacco Journal, the blatant mouthpiece and organ of the outlawed Tobacco Trust. They do not love me, and, God knows, there is no love lost between us.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I interrupt the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if that base and unmerited slander is directed to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is in plain type, if I can read, for the headline is "Senator MARTINE's profligate denunciation of tobacco." But, oh, do not let the Senator nor let the writer trouble his soul. I say, "Peace, let him compose his soul." I repeat, I know they do not love me, but they are not alone. I say to this journal and to every other one of kindred character in the United States: Spread your abuse and castigation to the wide ends of our Commonwealth of New Jersey. Go, I say, and tell it from the hills of Sussex to the sands of Cape May, in New Jersey; tell it to the gleaners of Hunterdon and Monmouth Counties; tell it to the miners in Morris and Sussex Counties; tell it to the stevedores on the docks of Hudson and of Middlesex Counties; tell it to patriotic Union County, my home, tell them all that JAMES E. MARTINE has the courage to stand here in his place and vote for that which he deems wise and best for the well-being of the people, without any reference to the millions of the Tobacco Trust; tell them that the Senator from New Jersey will continue to vote in that direction, with no fear or worry regarding their opinion; and tell them further, I say, that I have had the courage, and will continue to have, to vote to impose the burdens of taxation, so far as may be and so far as I can, on tobacco, whisky, beer, and the like, to save the bread and butter and the breakfast table of the American people. I wish I could put on wings and spread their denunciation, their defamation, and their miserable villification.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the circumstances, I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to say, Mr. President, in connection with the matter which has just been before the Senate, that, while the Senator from New Jersey may make mistakes, as we all make mistakes, no man upon this floor who has been associated with him ever questioned for a moment his fidelity to the right. Regardless of what others may say or what I or others may think, regardless of what the influences may be, "though every leaf were a tongue to cry, 'Thou must!'" he will not, according to his own judgment, say the unjust thing is just.

Anything written or anything said by anybody reflecting upon his integrity, reflecting upon his patriotism, reflecting upon his honesty, is an injustice to a patient, fearless, intelligent, honorable American Senator; and I want to take advantage of this occasion to pay him the tribute of my love and respect for the manhood which he has manifested in the performance of his official duties in this Chamber.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I sincerely thank the Senator for his kind words.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have had our war this morning on sea and on land. The cavalry has come to the support of the artillery, and the enemy has been repulsed all along the line. Now, Mr. President, let us give a few moment's attention to the war tax.

I have introduced an amendment to the cotton-purchasing amendment. This amendment would compel the Government of the United States to buy a sufficient amount of the southern cotton at a good profit to the producer to corner the market and force up the price of that commodity.

My amendment to that amendment provides for the purchase by the Government of cereal products of the northern farmer for the same purpose. If it is a proper thing for the South, it is equally proper for the North.

Standing alone, I could claim no virtue for this amendment. On the contrary, as an original proposition, I am free to say it would be a most evil proposition—populistic, paternalistic, and socialistic to a most vicious degree. It can only be justified as an amendment to an equally vicious and socialistic proposition. If we are to so violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution; if we are to violate the laws which we have just enacted against monopolies; if we are to tax every other industry in the United States for the purpose of cornering the market to increase the price of a particular commodity; if the Government itself is going into the monopoly business by law; if it is going to proceed to do that for which it will send its own citizens to the penitentiary; if it is to overthrow the whole idea of governmental duty and individual responsibility; if it is to cover, foster, and protect one industry and bring it under the paternalistic wing, then it can not leave other industries out in the cold to suffer the chill and the blast of a stagnation for which it alone is responsible.

Mr. President, every great step which overthrows the business and industrial policies and usages of centuries in one line of activity compels a readjustment of all other lines of activity. You can not maintain your equilibrium with one foot advanced into the realm of paternalism and the other still resting in the field of individualism. The dividing gulf is too wide. We must bring the whole body into one field or the other.

The moment the Government assumes control of the production and price of any commodity it must control and regulate the production and price of every other commodity, for all are dependent upon each other. Whenever the Government feels it must create a corner and thereby raise the price of cotton which I must purchase, that moment it is in duty bound to purchase and create a corner in my field products to give me a price which will enable me to exchange my labor for the labor of the cotton producer on equal terms, hour for hour.

To be fair I would also be compelled to vote for a further amendment to this amendment compelling the Government to buy the products of the copper and the coal mines. And the Senator from Connecticut would certainly have an equal right, if not a greater right, to insist that if the Government is to fix the price of cotton which must be purchased by the cotton mills of Connecticut, it also should purchase a sufficient quantity of cotton cloths produced by those mills to again create a corner on our clothing goods to maintain their prices.

But you say that the conditions show a special reason for being paternalistic so far as cotton production and cotton prices are concerned. I can demonstrate to you that the same reason exists to-day with relation to cereal products, and in the past has existed in a far more marked degree. The northern farmer and his representative in this Senate have always been more inclined to give assistance to southern industries than the representatives of the South have ever accorded to the industries of the North. We are to-day giving you a degree of protection on practically all of the things which you produce where such protection would benefit you in the least, with the possible exception of cane sugar, and we have shown our good will by giving you protection on that product whenever we have had the power to do so. On the other hand, you have placed practically everything that we produce upon the free list, compelling us to compete with the world. We stand ready, nevertheless, to assist you in any just and proper way. We are not complaining that the Treasury balance has practically all been deposited in the South to maintain and assist in your cotton crop, while nothing has gone to the North to help move the grain crop. We will go to any legitimate extent by our votes to render assistance.

But your proposition is a thousandfold worse than the disease you seek to cure. You would blot out individualism, individual responsibility, ambition, and energy. You would send this great Government of ours into paternalism for a brief benefit to the cotton industry. Once adopt a precedent of this kind, and every industry in the United States, whenever it falls below a paying basis, will demand—and, if the Government is just, will receive—the same protection that is to-day purposed to be given to cotton. No condition can ever justify such a step; and the very history of your cotton industry, like the history of our grain industry, shows that you have had worse conditions existing for long periods of time, so far as cotton prices are concerned, than you are suffering to-day.

I am informed that New England manufacturers are purchasing their upland middling cotton for about 6¾ cents. I assume that this is about the market price. Now, let us look at the prices you received from 1891 to 1899, inclusive. I quote a table from Cotton Facts, edition of October, 1913, published by W. B. Clarkson & Co., San Antonio, Tex. This table gives the prices of the cotton crops, highest and lowest, during these years, and is as follows:

	High.	Low.
1891-2	8 11/16	6 1/2
1892-3	10	7 1/16
1893-4	8 5/16	6 1/8
1894-5	8 3/16	5 3/16
1895-6	9	7 1/16
1896-7	8	7
1897-8	7 3/4	5 3/4
1898-9	6 3/4	5 5/16
1899-1900	10 1/4	6 1/4

It will be noted from this table that the lowest average was lower than the current prices of cotton. How did you get through all those long years with such low prices? Just the same as we got along when the drouth took all of our crops, when the grasshoppers would denude the whole State, when the blight of Democracy compelled us to burn our corn for fuel, when we received less than half the cost of production for our cereal products of the Northwest, and when cattle were not worth raising.

I am informed that it costs from 7 to 8 cents a pound to raise cotton where the help is all hired. You would have a pretty fair profit if the Government should buy it at 10 cents. I want to show now what it costs a bushel to raise wheat, barley, and oats where all the help is hired.

I have here a table showing the cost of producing wheat in North Dakota where all the work is done by hired help. In the table which I have made I have used a few of the figures furnished by the American Society of Equity and printed in Senate Document No. 699, Sixtieth Congress, second session. That was in 1909. The cost is considerably higher now. My own experience and observation lead me to believe that some of the items constituting expenses in that document are too low, and I have, therefore, revised the statement according to my own views.

The destructive elements of nature—hail, hot and wet weather, causing blight and rust; drought and hot winds—take the equivalent of one full crop every 10 years. In other words, they amount in the total to the destruction of one complete crop every 10 years. After making allowance for these failures and partial failures, the normal average yield would be about 12½ bushels per acre.

I have here a table showing the cost of production of wheat on a farm of 640 acres in the Red River Valley of North Dakota. I ask leave to insert this table as a whole, with all its details, and I will speak only of the totals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Cost of production of wheat on a farm of 640 acres, Red River Valley, N. Dak.

COST OF FARM.
640 acres, at $40 per acre		$25,600.00

		1,040.00
TAXES.
Tax on land	100.00
Tax on personal property	40.00
		140.00
INTEREST.
Interest on cost of—
Farm, $25,600, at 8 per cent	2,048.00
Implements, $1,615, at 8 per cent	129.20
Animals, $2,400, at 8 per cent	192.00
		2,369.20
ALLOWANCE FOR DEPRECIATION AND REPAIRS.
Depreciation on $1,616, at 15 per cent	242.40
Repairs on $1,616, at 5 per cent	80.80
		323.20
Loss of 2 horses each year, at $175		350.00
Total expenses		9,482.40

The average life of all kinds of farm machinery is about seven years. The depreciation therefore will be about 15 per cent yearly, and the repairs will average about 5 per cent. Where traction engines are used the repairs will be much higher.

The working life of farm horses, barring epidemics, and after making proper allowance for accidental deaths and disease, will be about eight years. The average loss, therefore, would be equivalent to 2 horses each year out of 16.

Average yield of farm, 8,000 bushels.
Average cost, $9,482.40
Cost of raising 1 bushel, $1.19.

Mr. McCUMBER. The cost of the farm implements, which I have carried out in detail in the table, is $1,616. The cost of farm animals is $2,800. The total cost of farm implements and animals and the farm itself is $30,016. The cost of seed and labor for one year, including feeding, and so forth, is $5,260. The cost of harvesting is $1,040; that is, of thrashing and binding twine. The tax on the land is $100 and the tax on personal property at the lowest would be $40, or a total of $140. The interest on the cost of the investment at the average rate in the State, which would be 8 per cent—it runs all the way from 7 to 12 per cent—would be $2,369. The average life of all kinds of farm machinery is about 7 years, and the depreciation, therefore, would be about 15 per cent yearly, while the repairs will average about 5 per cent. Where traction engines are used the repairs will be much higher. Then, making allowance for the depreciation and repairs, we have for each year $323.20. The depreciation in farm horses would be $350 a year. So the total expenses of operating the 640 acres for one year would be $9,482.40. Now, the average yield of wheat, at 12½ bushels to the acre, would be 8,000 bushels, while the average cost of raising that 8,000 bushels would be $9,482.40. Therefore the cost of raising wheat on the farm where all help is hired would be $1.19 a bushel.

Taking the State as a whole, the farmer does not receive, on the average, more than 75 cents per bushel for his wheat. If, therefore, he borrows all of the money invested and hires all the help necessary to raise his crops, including this fair compensation to himself and wife, paying himself the same as he would pay hired labor, paying his wife the same as he would pay a hired girl, he would be losing on every bushel of wheat 44 cents.

Sowing this 640 acres to oats, and on the same basis of computation of expense, and estimating the average yield of oats, after allowing for all these destructive elements of nature, at 35 bushels per acre, we would raise, in bushels, 22,400.

As the work and expense of raising the oats would be practically the same as that of raising wheat, the cost of a bushel of oats would be about 42 cents. The average price of oats is about 32 cents, or a loss, where all work is hired, of about 10 cents a bushel.

If this 640 acres were sowed to barley, on the same basis of computation, estimating the average yield of barley, after allowing for these destructive agencies, the yield of barley would be about 25 bushels per acre, or a total yield, in bushels, of 16,000.

As the cost of raising barley would be about the same as that of raising wheat, the price per bushel of barley would be 49 cents. The average price is about 39 cents, or a loss, where all work is hired, of 10 cents a bushel. We are receiving to-day—thanks to the new tariff bill—about 32 cents for our barley, which would entail a loss, if all work were hired, of 17 cents a bushel.

In order, therefore, that the farmer should receive fair wages for himself and family he should receive per bushel for his wheat $1.19. That is the lowest amount he is entitled to receive. He should receive, in addition to that, a sufficient dividend upon the investment to cover his risks. That is what the business man would secure.

Now, how is he able to get along? He is able to produce this grain for less than about $1.20 a bushel, in the case of wheat, only because he deducts nothing for his own wages, nothing for the wages of his wife, nothing for the wages of his girls and his boys, and because his girls and his boys during the winter season go out to find work elsewhere—the girls in teaching school, the boys doing whatever kind of work they can do during the wintertime. In that way he has been able simply to make both ends meet.

Because the southern cotton planter this year can not secure a price for his cotton that will give him a profit a bill is introduced demanding that the Government shall buy his cotton at a price that will give him a good profit. If the Government is going into the business of buying cotton products, so as to corner the market, then it is equally its duty to buy all of the cereal products—wheat, oats, barley, rye, flax, and corn—and corner those, until the northern farmer shall receive a reasonable profit for his labors. And when it has done that, its next proper move and its next necessary move would be to pull down the Stars and Stripes, the banner which signifies equality of rights and duties and responsibilities of all our citizens, and hoist in its stead the banner of the I. W. W.

Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the New York Tribune of yesterday, bearing directly upon this subject, which is an argument in itself, and in closing I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NO COTTON VALORIZATION.

Why should the United States Government valorize cotton, as is projected in the proposed amendment to the war-revenue bill, any more than stocks and bonds? As a reason for the purchase of cotton by the Government it is urged that a war crisis in a great industry, affecting a large section, exists, and that the suffering, if the price of cotton is not maintained, will be enormous. The cotton crop has been raised with the usual European demand in view. That demand has been largely cut off by the war. Therefore, it is argued, the Government should lend its credit in aid of the cotton producer. In the same way the European market for American stocks and bonds has been destroyed. Millions of dollars in shares wait on the other side to be dumped here as soon as the opportunity to sell them exists. The interests affected are even vaster than those of the cotton growers. A panic might spring from the mishandling of this situation. If the Government should buy the cotton which Europe won't absorb, why should it not also buy the stocks which Europe won't hold?

The South is, of course, deserving of the fullest sympathy in this emergency, and the utmost that may safely be done for its relief should be done. It could not foresee the war, and its prosperity is wrapped up in the marketing of its cotton at a paying price. Its loss will be the Nation's loss, for the prosperity of all sections of the country is inextricably related, and one section can not suffer without the rest in some degree feeling the consequences of its misfortune. And in the present critical situation it will be to the advantage of the whole country that the shocks and dislocations of industry existing anywhere and everywhere as a result of the war shall be reduced as much as possible.

But when we have said all this we are very far from conceding that the Government should enter upon dangerous experiments in the use of its credit or its currency for the benefit of any industry or all industries suffering from the war. This proposed Government purchase of cotton is essentially nothing but the valorization scheme that Brazil tried with unfortunate results in the case of coffee. We can see no prospect in it but loss for the Government and a weakening of its position in regard to similar paternalistic devices that will bring on severer losses in the future. We have no faith that the Government, if it should lose by holding Europe's supply of cotton until Europe was ready to take it, would ever be able to throw its losses back on the Southern States by taxation. A popular government does not work that way. Nor have we any confidence in the proposed Government limitation of planting next year, by which production could be kept down, so that next year's crop and this year's surplus would be readily absorbed. The limitation would be hard to enforce. And if the Government in one instance stood ready to finance the cotton crop, the natural pressure upon the planter to reduce the acreage next year would be removed. The South would look to the Nation to help it again if production was not curtailed sufficiently and if the European war lasted longer than was calculated or if the prostration of the European market surpassed expectations.

There will be a real gain to the South if it learns not to depend to the extent it now does upon cotton. It will not learn this lesson if the National Government stands ready to guarantee it against loss while it continues to plunge upon this single staple. It will be best that the relief of the South should be left to her banks and to individual enterprise. These are already making progress in meeting the situation. Any Government assumption of the task will mean a dangerous misuse of the Nation's credit or impairment of its currency. And the abuse will not end with the present emergency. The pressure for Government aid to producers disappointed about prices will not end with the war.

Mr. OLIVER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. OLIVER. I only intended to have a telegram read and to talk not more than a minute upon the subject, if the Senator from South Carolina will permit me.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I received this morning a telegram from the president of the Cigar and Stogy Manufacturers' Association of Western Pennsylvania, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., October 16, 191.

Senator GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the Cigar and Stogy Manufacturers' Association of Western Pennsylvania, in session assembled, hereby enter our earnest, honest, solemn, and we believe just protest against the proposed amendment to the new revenue bill in reference to the proposed tax on cigar and stogy manufacturers, for the following reasons:

1. The tax of $3 per thousand selling price, which we are now paying, is more than 25 per cent of the selling price of stogies and low-priced cigars, which is about 95 per cent of the entire output of western Pennsylvania, there being very few high-priced cigars made in this district.

2. The products of this district are consumed almost entirely by the working class, thus placing upon the thousands and tens of thousands of workingmen burdens they are least able to bear.

3. Should this amendment become a law, it will cause hundreds and hundreds of the smaller stogy and cigar factories to close, thus throwing out of employment thousands of persons employed therein.

4. The stogy and low-priced cigar industries are now paying a higher rate of tax than is now paid by any other industry covered by the proposed amendment.

5. We again earnestly ask you to vote and work against the proposed amendment, thereby giving the "little fellow" and the great army of the working class that protection they are entitled to under the laws now in force.

M. W. DE WATERS, President.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, this telegram states more forcibly and more succinctly than I can the hardships which this industry is suffering. The manufacturer of low-priced cigars, stogies as they are usually called, already, as stated in the telegram, pays the Government for every dollar of revenue that he takes in more than 25 cents in tax. The additional tax imposed by this new law may not be large, but it is very large when you come to consider that the industry is in the hands of small men and that their market consists entirely of poor men.

It is only another evidence, Mr. President, of the many items of injustice and inequality contained in this bill, and a further evidence that it would have been much better to have postponed this legislation, if it is necessary at all, until more time and more care could have been given to its consideration.

Mr. STONE. With the indulgence of the Senator from South Carolina, I wish to take a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, this morning when the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] read a letter giving what purported to be a true account of a recent occurrence when a French warship hailed an American merchant ship on the high seas, or possibly in neutral waters along the coast of Central America, and sent officers and armed seamen aboard the American vessel to make search for contraband and arrest passengers aboard ship, I rose to add a word to what the Senator from Colorado said by way of comment upon the letter he read, but the Chair recognized another Senator and I did not have the opportunity I sought. I now ask the indulgence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] for a few moments only, that I may say a few words on the subject to which the remarks of the Senator from Colorado referred.

Mr. President, in this time of war, when so many nations are engaged in conflict, I think it well to admonish all concerned, belligerents and neutrals alike, that both those engaged in war and those who are at peace with the world have well-defined rights and privileges under international law. These respective rights and privileges are not only well defined in the law of nations, but they are universally recognized by all responsible Governments. In recent weeks much has been written and said about the rights of belligerent powers and of the people subject to those powers. The rights of nations at war have been quite fully exploited, drawn forth, and made plain, whether those rights concern the relations of belligerent nations to each other or the relations of a belligerent to a neutral nation. On the other hand, much less has been said about the rights and privileges neutral nations possess under international law, although their rights and privileges are just as well understood by those who constitute the responsible Governments of the world and administer their affairs. It is not my purpose now to state the law defining the rights of a neutral people. I wish merely once more to impress upon everyone, here and elsewhere, that the Government of the United States and the people of the United States have assumed and are maintaining an attitude of strict neutrality with respect to the Governments and people now engaged in the present European war. That attitude of neutrality was taken deliberately, and is being maintained in good faith by everyone connected with the administration of this Government, without regard to party affiliation. Neutrality is the American policy. We recognize all the rights the belligerent powers have under international law, and we have no wish to abridge or interfere with them. All this we concede to the belligerent powers.

But, Mr. President, while we recognize the rights of those at war, I think we should admonish them that they must be careful not to offend this great neutral power by violating any of its rights or unduly intruding upon its dignity. It is in a spirit of kindness that I take this occasion to warn all belligerents who care for the regard and friendship of this Republic to be careful not to commit actual aggression against this Government or people or to commit any wanton assault on their rights as a friendly neutral power. They expect us to keep faith with them—every one of them expects that of us—and we intend to keep the faith, but the nations involved in this war must on their part recognize our rights and keep faith with us. If any of them fail so to do, the responsibility will rest upon their heads. The United States will maintain this position of strict and impartial neutrality, but this Government will protect its own sovereignty and dignity, and will protect the rights of its own people, and all the nations of the world should understand that the American people will not look with favor, nor even indifference, upon the violation of their rights as a neutral people. While we respect the rights of others, our rights must also be respected. The spirit that pervades the relations and directs the intercourse between nations must be mutual.

These observations are not intended to apply especially to the incident recounted in the letter read by the Senator from Colorado, for I would not pass judgment upon an incident of that kind until fully advised of the exact facts. What I have said is intended for general application, and it seems to me that this is an opportune time to sound this friendly warning.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the war-revenue bill, providing for relief to the cotton growers of the South, is one that can not be treated as it should be treated without serious thought and patient, patriotic study. When the threatened danger first appeared, having devoted a great part of my life to the study of this question, knowing, as I have known by actual experience, that in the South the great income was from cotton, that the solution of the method by which it should be marketed was of prime importance, coming from a State that has a record of State rights, it was a problem as to the source from which relief should come—whether it could come from the States or from our banking and currency law as revised. With each recurring day the condition has become more and more acute, and I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate to set forth what I believe to be the duty of this body, not as Democrats, not as southerners, but as American citizens facing a problem. It is a matter of great gratification to me to know that some days ago, in the other end of this building, one of the leaders from a noncotton-growing State, and belonging to a different party from the predominant party of the South, uttered words of patriotism which ought to thrill the heart of every man regardless of the party to which he belongs.

Those living outside of the cotton-growing States can not have any adequate conception of the relation of cotton to every phase of the life of the people living in that section, nor have they any idea of the stupendous amount of actual currency it represents, nor the volume of business it supports.

They can not understand how every phase of life, every activity of business in these States, is not indirectly but directly dependent upon cotton as its currency. It is to all intents and purposes the bank, the great central bank, of each of the principal cotton-growing States, into which from spring until harvest is deposited the resources of that State, and upon which checks are drawn in the forms of dividends if there are any. It is the clearing house of each State—the cotton field. It is the standard of comparison, the measure of wealth, and scope of enterprise. It determines the terms of the schools, the development of enterprises, the payment of taxes, the support of the Government. It determines the rating and stability of the banks, railroads, and manufacturing enterprises; each and all are dependent upon this great clearing house—the cotton field. Some idea of why this is so may be gathered from the following figures:

Population of cotton-growing States, as returned at the census of 1910.

State.	Population.	Value of crop.
Principal cotton-growing States:
Alabama	2,138,093	$110,000,000
Arkansas	1,574,449	77,000,000
Georgia	2,609,121	173,000,000
Mississippi	1,797,114	96,000,000
North Carolina	2,206,287	60,000,000
Oklahoma	1,657,155	61,000,000
South Carolina	1,515,400	103,000,000
Tennessee	2,184,789	27,000,000
Texas	3,896,542	287,000,000
Louisiana	1,656,388	32,000,000
Total	21,235,338	1,026,000,000

From this table it will be seen that in the State of Alabama there is a population of 2,138,000 and an annual income from the cotton fields of $110,000,000.

Arkansas, with a population of 1,574,000, has an annual income of $77,000,000.

Georgia, with a population of two and a half millions, has an annual income from this source alone of $173,000,000.

Mississippi, with a population of one million and a half, has an annual income of $96,000,000.

North Carolina, with only a part of her territory planted in cotton, with a population of two and a half millions, has an annual income of $60,000,000.

South Carolina, with a population of one and a half millions, has an annual income of $103,000,000.

Tennessee, with only a small portion of her territory planted in cotton, has an annual income of $27,000,000; a population of 2,184,000.

The State of Texas, with 3,800,000 people, has an annual income of $287,000,000, and a like pro rata in the different States, making a total of $1,043,000,000 annual income.

The very nature of the business differentiates it from every other vocation and forbids the concentration in the hands of a few of this wealth-producing article. It forbids it in that the poorest and most ignorant can and do produce cotton. The most ignorant can produce as good grade of cotton as the most skilled and technically trained agriculturist. He may not produce as much to the acre, or at as little cost per pound in actual dollars and cents, but he can produce just as good grade and put it on the markets in just as good shape as the best trained and skilled agriculturist.

The merchants and bankers who finance this crop do not extend credit to the individual who is making the crop—they extend credit to King Cotton. The processes of gathering and preparing it for the market are the same to the rich and poor. A bale of cotton made and picked by a poor, ignorant negro, hauled to the gin in an oxcart, comes out as well prepared for the market as that raised upon a plantation of the wealthy and hauled to the gin in an autotruck. Hence it is a commodity, one of the world's necessities, that defies cornering in production, and lends its splendid credit impartially to rich and poor.

As I said before, it is the central bank of each principal cotton-growing State. Those who produce it, a majority of them, look upon cotton soil and each year's cotton crop, each year's production, as the banker looks upon his invested capital upon the interest of which he lives. The capitalist takes his actual money and invests it, and from the interest thereon he lives. By the peculiar nature of the soil, climate, dew point, nature made her great investment in the South, and this is to the ordinary tenants and farmers what the capitalist's invested capital is to him. Since the invention of the Whitney cotton gin, step by step, the world has come to realize the splendid supply of clothing and textiles which every year were to come from this peculiar staple. According to the law of the survival of the fittest, cotton, on account of its peculiar and wonderful adaptability, gradually began to usurp other textiles and to supplant them in the markets of the world. There is perhaps no other textile known to mankind that can be used in such a wonderful variety of forms. It has but three competitors, if they can be called competitors—flax, wool, and silk. Neither of these can be used in any other form than that which its peculiar nature determines. Or, to put it more clearly, wool on account of the character of its fiber is restricted to practically one field alone; silk and flax likewise; but cotton, under manipulation, lends itself rapidly as a substitute for each of these. Under the manipulation of the loose weave and analine dyes it is a substitute for wool: the tight weave and the modern laundry have placed it the equal of flax; under the mercerized process it is the competitor of silk. So that were the wool of the world destroyed, as well as the silk and flax, the world would still have flax, wool, and silk.

In modern times, comparatively recently, the value of cotton seed has become world-wide in its commercial importance. It is a competitor in the markets of the world with olive oil, lard, butter, paint, lubricating oil, and in every field where fats and oils are needed. The hulls, or the coverings of the seed, that hard substance which immediately incases the fats, are among the best substitutes for hay in the world; in fact, they are superior in a great many instances to the finest hay. No richer fat-producing element is known than the meal. Aside from nitrate of soda this meal is the richest in nitrogen; in fact, the nitrogen in this is superior in its fertilizing properties for the reason that as fertilizer nitrogen derived from the vegetable is superior to that derived from the mineral. The value of the seed has risen from $84,000,000 in 1903 to $143,000,000 in 1910.

From this we can begin to understand how the gold of the nations irresistibly flows into America to avail itself of the products of this wonderful plant. In attestation of the esteem in which the world holds it, in 1880 the total number of acres planted in cotton in America were 17,000,000, and the largest crop ever produced up to that time was 5,000,000 bales, with a value of $275,000,000. In 1913, 34 years afterwards, the acreage had increased to 37,000,000 acres and the production to 14,000,000 bales, with a value of $1,043,000,000. The modern loom and the modern spindles made the conversion of this article into commercial fabrics easy, cheap, and rapid.

For 30 years there was not a day that cotton was not a salable article, that each and every bale had not a value. Those engaged in the production of it are of all classes, as said before, and one can readily understand what it means to have the doors of the bank closed. It would not be so bad, nor would the necessity for Federal action be so great, if this stupendous product was owned and controlled by a few great rich corporations with other resources at their command. But it is the currency of the South; it is the bank of the laborers of the cotton-growing States; it is the basis of credit, and not the man who produces it.

I heard here this morning in the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] a comparison made with the condition in which cotton finds itself and the condition of stocks and bonds that are falling off in value. He does not stop to reason that cotton is the sole dependence, the only resource of practically 21,000,000 American people, while stocks and bonds are the representatives of the wealth that lies back of them, and which is an additional resource.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator from South Carolina is mistaken as to the argument which I made in reference to stocks and bonds. I did have read, however, an editorial, which was the argument of some one else, in which that illustration was used. My sole argument was on a comparison between the condition of wheat, oat, and barley raising with cotton raising.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to state to the Senator from North Dakota, right here, that I sympathize with him in his fight for better marketing facilities.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I did not quite understand the statement of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I said I sympathized with the Senator from North Dakota and cooperated with him here in his fight for better marketing facilities; but the Senator must recognize the difference between the condition in which we find ourselves and the condition in which the grain growers of the West find themselves. I was told by the Senator from Minnesota several days ago that the western grain growers were receiving the best prices for their wheat because foodstuffs were in great demand. Were it now to come to the last analysis, were cotton production destroyed in the South, we could grow oats and wheat and rye and barley; but you can not grow cotton. We have heretofore been content to grow cotton to clothe you and to buy your wheat and rye and other grains, and we are content to do so to-day, and would be willing to come to your assistance and to vote you Federal aid if a calamity paralleling this which now confronts us should strike your wheat fields; but you have a market for your products; the world is clamoring for foodstuffs, while the market for the commodity out of which we must not only get our clothing but our foodstuffs is dead, paralyzed, and we are face to face with ruin and bankruptcy.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the Senator from South Carolina is in error in the statement that the world is clamoring for our food products. In my State we are receiving for wheat about 77 cents per bushel, while our barley is down in price to 30 and 32 cents a bushel. We can not produce either of those at a profit for less than almost a third more than that. We are not receiving good prices for our grain.

I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that I for one have known all of the hardships of agricultural or farming life, and am in deep sympathy with any legitimate effort to help out the South in its cotton trouble. The Senator from South Carolina says that he is willing to help the North. There is just one way in which he could have helped us, and that was by continuing the little protection which we had upon our products, the same as we continued the protection on your few products of the South. You took that protection all away and have driven our prices down enormously by reason of that until we can not make a profit.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before the Senator from South Carolina proceeds, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that the wheat raisers of North Dakota are being robbed by somebody, if his statement is entirely correct about their only receiving 77 cents a bushel for wheat. Immediately upon that statement being made, I opened a newspaper lying upon the desk of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and I find that on yesterday No. 1 spring wheat was quoted at $1.21¾ per bushel; No. 2 red wheat, at $1.20¾. It is inconceivable that so intelligent and progressive a people as those of North Dakota would sell their product to speculators so as to make that difference when they come to deliver it to the consumers.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Now, get the quotation for No. 3 northern, which is what our wheat is.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This market report does not have that quotation in it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. First, there is a spread at Minneapolis to-day of 18 cents between No. 1 northern and No. 3 northern. Then there is all of the freightage, which, on an average, from the middle of the State, takes from 14 to 16 cents a bushel. So, if you take that into consideration, you have got down to about what I said—77 cents a bushel for wheat.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In other words, the Senator is complaining not of the lack of a market for his product, but of manipulation by some unprincipled ones of that market. We are complaining of the fact that we have no market at all. I want to emphasize this fact: The credit of the rank and file of the cotton producers is cotton, and not the producers, and when they have lost this credit they are hopeless.

Who can grasp the stupendous effect of the loss of a billion dollars of actual currency—the purchasing and trading power involved in a billion dollars, distributed impartially among 21,000,000 of people? Who can calculate the billions of credit based upon this vast volume of exchange, the far-reaching effect, not in America alone but throughout the civilized world? Nine hundred million people use cotton, and America produces 68 per cent of the world's supply. It is one of the prime necessities of the human family. It is one of two indispensable necessities for the individual—food and clothing. Every habitable spot on the globe can and does produce its full pro rata of foodstuffs, while the nine cotton-growing States furnish the larger per cent of the material for the clothing of the world. Therefore it is idle, absurd, and ridiculous to attempt to compare cotton and its relation to the world's commerce with copper and peanuts, as some Senators from the North and West have attempted to do. It is not a sectional question; it is not a national question alone; it is international and world-wide. The condition that confronts the South to-day is that this vast army of cotton raisers finds its security suddenly worthless—worthless because the markets for the raw material and the finished product are paralyzed by a world war. With a crop of 15,000,000 bales made, costing 10 cents per pound, with a surplus of from five to seven millions of bales out of which there must be immediate currency, it is idle to speak of anything short of national aid to relieve the situation. This surplus of from six to seven millions of bales must be capitalized until the law of supply and demand shall call for it.

There is not a cotton-growing State that can capitalize its crop or its surplus. It has not accumulated from year to year the vast amount of money that the crop has poured into it. It has exchanged this currency for commodities of other States from California to Maine and from Florida to Alaska. Therefore every industry of the South is dependent upon the yearly income from the cotton fields. There is no volume of accumulated actual gold or of currency in the South; and it is idle, it is mockery, for Senators to stand here and say that the South should capitalize and finance this wealth-producing commodity.

By virtue of the impoverishing effects of the Civil War, every dollar that had come into the South has been converted into the development of some of her resources or to supply some necessity. Her growth and development have been marvelous, but at the expense of every dollar of her income. The South is dependent upon her annual check on the bank of King Cotton.

For 40 years not only has cotton contributed its millions upon millions to the development of enterprises in every State of the Union as well as to the development of the resources of the South, but it has poured in an unceasing stream across the ocean, converting itself into gold and maintaining the balance of trade in favor of America. For 40 years the cotton of the South has sustained the credit of America against the world, and now in this the hour of her travail, when the sources of cotton consumption and the laboratories of commerce where it was transformed into gold and currency have been temporarily closed, the South comes to the Nation to which she has contributed so royally and readily, and, pleading her inability to capitalize her cotton, in this hour of her temporary humiliation, she asks that the Nation do for her for 12 months that which she has done for the Nation for 40 years.

It is disgusting to hear Senators on this floor ridiculing this measure, which does not ask for any gift, but which asks the Government to sustain the credit of this great article of commerce for a stated period, and which pledges that the cotton to which credit is extended will guarantee the Government against any possible loss, assuming the burden of loan and expense upon itself. It is a sad commentary upon the Congress of the United States to say that its limitations are such that the Nation may not relieve itself in the hour of distress because of constitutional limitations. I am reminded of that incident in the life of the Christ when the Jews rebuked the disciples for plucking and eating wheat on the Sabbath Day. His reply was that the constitutional Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. This, it seems to me, should be a lesson to some of the great constitutional lawyers on this floor. Just as sure as we, the lawmakers, and the Congress of the United States convince the people of America that they were made for the Constitution and not the Constitution for them, that, no matter what disaster might come for which relief could be given, in order to preserve the letter of the Constitution the people must suffer, there will either be a different Constitution or a different Congress to interpret it.

Now, it is idle to talk about securing the relief that is needed other than by an act of Congress. I have heard expression here during the discussion of this question that this is a matter of a private nature, or, at least, local; that the States should take care of it. I would grant this and gladly assume the solution of the burden from the standpoint of each State if the Federal lawmakers had left each State the power under its own banking laws to capitalize its own resources, but this Congress of the United States has taken away that power. How can it be expected for a State, or a number of States, to meet a situation that calls for extraordinary capitalization when the power to capitalize is denied those States and assumed by the Congress of the United States? Therefore, having assumed that power, you should meet your obligations now when one of the greatest sources of wealth in this country finds itself unable to do so without the exercise of the power that you have arrogated to yourselves. You have left the States the right to produce a commodity out of which is to be realized currency and have forbidden the States the right to capitalize that production. Repeal the 10 per cent State bank tax and not a Southern State would come in here and ask for relief during this calamity.

Fellow Senators, knowing as I do the circumstances in which the people of the South are now placed, the gloom and disappointment that shrouds every home, I have the right to stand here and plead for relief. You did not balk at sending your millions to suffering San Francisco, and yet we scorn to ask relief as a gift. We ask it as a temporary relief that we propose to pay back with interest. You did not balk at sending a man-of-war laden with gold to bring back the American citizens marooned in Europe when this present war broke out. You did not balk at voting millions to build a railroad on the ice of Alaska in order to furnish fuel to the people. You did not balk in 1907 to send your Secretary of the Treasury with millions of dollars to relieve the speculators and financiers of New York. Yet you stand here now and plead constitutional limitations and rights in the face of a calamity in comparison with which those others sink into insignificance! The loss of trade and of commerce, the bankruptcies and failures that must come, are bad enough; but it is for these suffering women and children that I make my plea.

There is not a farm home in the cotton-growing States that has not around it and stretching away from it this hope of the little comforts and conveniences that make life worth living. There will come this winter a condition that every Senator here could bear himself, but which the suffering innocents of the South and those engaged in the production of this world commodity can not understand and into whose faces and hearts will come the disappointment of a Christmas without Santa Claus. I had rather stand here to-day and see the Constitution of the United States infringed upon, if indeed such it be, than that we in our allegiance to the letter thereof shall see the homes and lives of millions of earnest and industrious men, women, and children of the South from whose toiling hands has poured this commodity that has enriched the Nation and clothed the world than to leave them, on account of our indifference or stupidity, helpless when the means of relief are easily within our reach.

How any man, not a southerner alone, but how any man realizing what must be the condition in the South; how any southerner who has seen the bloom smitten from his mother's cheek and her hands distorted in a hand-to-hand conflict with poverty through all these years of our Gethsemane since the Civil War, can stand here, face to face with a repetition of conditions that go beyond those, in that they came without warning and were not gradual—how he can stand here and balk at anything that would bring relief to the long-suffering people of the South passes my comprehension.

In view of the fact that there is a doubt as to its constitutionality, any Senator who will not give his State the benefit of this doubt will be looked upon by his people as a traitor to them in the hour of their suffering and distress.

When I go home now and step from the cars in my little country village and have the fathers of families gather about me and ask if any relief is in sight, no man can measure the feeling that goes out from my heart for relief for them. Let me tell the Senators on this floor to-day, I do thank God that the love of a mother and father for their children is not measured by the number of dollars that mother and father may own. In spite of the calico dress, in spite of the work-distorted hands and the seamed face, the mother whom disaster or misfortune or poverty has chained dreams dreams for the bright eyes of the darlings about her feet, as bright as ever passed through the heart of a queen; and they are the hope and salvation of America.

Voting to relieve the conditions in the stock market, voting to relieve the congestion that comes in the great marts of trade, may be the proper exercise of the functions of statesmanship; but voting to relieve the homes of 21,000,000 pure American citizens, working for their good and the Nation's welfare, goes beyond the domain of statesmanship and enters the realm of patriotism. To stand here, with the world convulsed in war and the credit of the South dead, and quibble about constitutional limitations, is a disgrace to a southern Senator.

Mr. President, in closing I want to say that as far as I am concerned I am not asking for any gift. We do not come here as mendicants. Turn to the tables of statistics and you will find that we, from the tiny hands to the gray heads of the South, have supported the balance of credit of this Nation, in spite of our poverty, and have worked out a degree of prosperity and success. We have been loyal. Now that we are an integral part of the Union, what kind of patriotism do you suppose can be inspired in the hearts of the millions who in the hour of their necessity, in the hour of this their suffering, are taught that the letter of the Constitution must be observed at all costs; the wave of whose flag flaunts indifference into their suffering faces?

I pay my debt of obligation to Congressman MANN, of Illinois, for the patriotic and statesmanlike utterances that fell from his lips yesterday. I will join with any section of this country in its struggle if there should occur to it that which has occurred to us. I sincerely hope that every patriot on this floor will give the South the benefit of the doubt and relieve the condition by the loan, if you choose to call it that, or by the temporary investment, if you choose to call it that, in enough of the surplus cotton to guarantee a fair price on the balance to the producer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am deeply moved by the eloquent and patriotic sentiments expressed by the Senator who has just preceded me; and in rising to oppose this amendment I want it distinctly understood that in no sense do I lack sympathy for the condition that seems to exist in some parts of our country.

I do not believe this amendment is unconstitutional. I have no sympathy with the man who ridicules the idea. I concede the honesty of purpose of those Senators who are behind the amendment; and could I find it within what I believe to be my conscientious duty, I would go with them in voting for this kind of a proposition.

But, Mr. President, in the first place, I doubt whether, in the long run, this would bring the needed relief, and whether it would not merely postpone to a future time the suffering now existing. I have no doubt but that the passage of this amendment would establish a precedent that would come home many times to trouble us, and in the end would bring damage and disaster to the country.

When a mere lad I took all the savings I had been able to gather together and went out into what was then the wild and woolly West to try to build up a home for myself and my posterity. The first winter that I spent on the frontier I saw hardship among the people that I do not believe was any less, so far as the agony of the suffering was concerned, than that which exists now in the South. I saw there, in the fall and winter of that year, corn, corn, corn everywhere, piled up on the streets of the villages, piled up in the fields, piled up along the railroads, selling for 8 cents a bushel, with no market and no one to buy it.

I remember that I established my law office in a shack 14 by 22 feet, divided up into two rooms, and I had the luxury of the only private office there was in that county-seat town. I went out and took a farmer's team and wagon into his cornfield and husked corn and hauled it to the back of that little shack and piled it upon the ground. I burned corn in my office all that winter. I did only what everybody else did. Out in the sod house in the country, in the store, in the bank, everywhere, we were burning corn, because there was no market for it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It would seem that the memories of that scene should have made such an impression upon the mind of the Senator from Nebraska that he would not care to see it repeated anywhere else on this continent during his lifetime or any subsequent period.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not; but it never occurred to us, Mr. President; it never occurred to any man then in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, that the United States Government should buy our corn That idea never entered anyone's mind, and it was never suggested. It was never proposed. I remember that no man could pay his debts. We not only burned corn, but we ate corn, we lived on corn, we kept the stock on corn. It was the only thing we had; but we could not sell it. There was no money with which to buy it.

Why, Mr. President, for a lawyer there a $5 fee was a luxury—not only a luxury, but a curiosity. I remember that during that winter I was employed to defend a homesteader whose homestead was contested. After spending several days talking the matter over with witnesses and posting myself on the case, we then spent two days, from early morning until 10 o'clock at night, taking the evidence, which was taken before the county judge in the shape of depositions, the land office being about 100 miles away. In the case of one witness, I remember, who on account of infirmity was unable to come, who lived about 12 miles out in the country, we took the county judge and the lawyers and drove that 12 miles with the thermometer 15° below zero and took the evidence of the witness.

When the evidence was all in, before the case was decided, I settled with my client and got a fee of $10. It was the largest attorney's fee that I had ever seen. The evidence was sent in to the land office, and in a few days the decision was made, and in about a week's time the decision was returned, and we all knew then what it was and that it was against my client. We lost our case.

I think now, looking back, as I remember it, that the decision was just, and that we ought to have lost it; but I shall never forget that when the word came that we were beaten my client came into the office and objected to the fee that he had paid. If I had had the fee then I know I would have given it back to him, but unfortunately I had paid my board bill in the meantime that had been running for several weeks, although it cost only $2 each week—not each week, but it cost $2 per week whenever it was paid. I had spent the money; I could not return the fee; and we finally compromised by an agreement that I should take the case on appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in Washington and should charge no fee for that.

Mr. President, just a few years after that—I think it was in 1894—in that same country, in that same vicinity, we had no corn. The wind and the hot weather dried up all the fountains of the earth and nothing green except some of the inhabitants, like myself, was left. Then we had hogs. In the meantime we had begun raising hogs. We had no corn, we had no wheat, we had no barley, we had nothing in the world to keep the stock through the winter; and we had no corn to eat. What we thought was a calamity when we had corn to burn, like you have cotton now, was not a drop in the bucket to the suffering that came when the earth had refused to give forth any crop. I remember distinctly a friend of mine who had about a thousand acres of land, without anything to live through the winter. The banks were closed; money could not be borrowed at any rate; and he went out with his gun and to keep them from starving killed more than 100 head of his hogs, ranging in weight from 25 to 75 pounds each.

But, Mr. President, nobody said that the Government should buy our hogs. No one suggested it. There is no doubt but what we had sympathy from all good people, and in the latter instance, when the earth had refused to raise anything, hundreds of our people were kept through the winter by clothing and by food that was sent in by the carload from patriotic citizens living farther east.

Mr. President, I said this would establish a precedent. It may be that it is right. I am not so sure about it. I know my head tells me that I ought to vote against it, although my heart demands that I hesitate. But I can not now, at least, bring myself to believe that it is proper or that in the end good will come if the Federal Government takes hold of the proposition and loans money on even the product.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I know so well the promptings of the Senator's heart, I understand so fully all his sympathies, that I am not going to ask him a question on that line, but I wish to suggest to him that if the Federal Government, in the exercise of its great power, with immeasurable wealth, or rather the immeasurable wealth of its constituents—the Government itself has nothing except that which its citizens bring it, either in mind, money, or morals—if the Government had gone to the rescue of the good people of the community my friend has just described, and with an outlay of money to be returned to the Government, without incurring any obligations itself, without imposing any burden by a tax upon the people except those who were to be relieved, but had gone to their assistance as we are asking the Government to come to the assistance of the southern people, without violating any fundamental principle, without doing violence to the genius of our Government—if it had gone to their relief, the great suffering which the Senator has just portrayed so eloquently and vividly, does not the Senator think it would have been a very benign and proper use of the governmental function?

I wish to add in this connection, that the Senator may understand it, that the people of the South are not asking the Government to donate them anything. They are not asking the Government to give anything. We are simply invoking the great strong arm of the Federal Government to help us across this financial Sahara; we are asking that we may lean upon it during these extraordinary times, not at the expense of the people of the other parts of the Republic, because we propose to levy a tax upon ourselves to cover every single cent that is going to be expended by the Federal Government in our behalf.

I want to say to the Senator that conditions there are not the result of economic errors committed by the people; they are not the result of any mistakes in the management of their private affairs, but it comes as one of the horrible incidents of the war across the ocean.

Now, if the Government will come and lend this aid—it is not buying the cotton, it is simply lending us the money to hold the cotton; and if it can be done without costing anybody a penny except those who are asking the assistance, then, in the name of humanity, I can not understand why anybody should object.

Mr. NORRIS. What the Senator from Mississippi says appeals to me very strongly, and I have not reached my conclusion on the vote that I am about to cast in any hurried way. I have given it as much candid thought as I possibly could. I have thought of it sincerely, with a desire to help if I could. But to answer the Senator's direct question, I must say that I have reached the conclusion. I do not believe it is proper for the Government to take the step. I think what the Senator said bears out the claim that I made at the beginning, that this precedent once established would be never ending, and the Government of the United States would in the end find itself practically bankrupt.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this condition will probably never occur again. Such a condition has never occurred before in the history of the Republic. Of course, the Senator can not understand it, because he is not brought face to face with it as we who live in the section from which I come, but the commodity to be carried by the Government is in no way similar to the corn and the wheat and the products of the soil in the West. A bale of cotton, the Senator will understand, stored, shielded from the weather, will be just as valuable when his grandchildren are as old as he as that cotton is to-day. It is an article of world-wide, increasing consumption. It is as durable as gold and more valuable than gold. You can store it in a warehouse and it is much better security than any railroad bonds. The railroad might be mismanaged and the bonds become valueless, but the cotton under normal conditions will be just as good 50 years from to-day as it is the day it is put in the warehouse.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not doubt the security.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is absolutely indestructible in its intrinsic qualities.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that statement. I have not contradicted it, and I do not intend to do so, because I believe it is absolutely true. Cotton is just as valuable when it is 20 years old as the day it is picked, I presume. You could have said of our corn, "There is no doubt but that you could hold this corn without deterioration, so far as its intrinsic value is concerned." As a matter of fact, if the Government had come into my part of the country at that time and bought a million bushels of corn it would have made an immense amount of money. The year before that—or at least two years before the failure I was telling you about, when nothing was produced—we had more corn than we knew what to do with. I have seen corn sell at 8 cents and 10 cents a bushel, delivered by the farmer in town. Many and many hundreds of bushels were sold at that price under my own observation, and within a year corn was selling in the same town for from 50 to 60 cents a bushel. I would have had no fear of the Government losing money if it had bought corn, but I think it must be conceded that if the Government goes into something of that kind it must be in a general way; it must not be confined to one man or to one product or to one locality.

If I thought this would never occur again anywhere in the United States, I would not hesitate to vote for this amendment, but it is occurring every day, somewhere, in a smaller way. If we must help out a State in this kind of a dilemma, then we must help out a county. If we should go to the relief of a county, we should go to the relief of a township, and if we give relief to a township, then we ought to give relief to a fractional part of a township.

Mr. President, I have in my pocket now a check for $53.70 which I have just received through the mail. It is my share of a crop raised on some land I own. It is my share of over 200 acres of wheat in a State and a community where they raised one of the biggest wheat crops that ever grew out of the ground. But it happened that that particular locality was afflicted with a hail storm which practically destroyed the crop. Perhaps if you followed that hail storm you would find that it was 5 miles wide and 10 or 15 miles long in the country that was destroyed or partially destroyed. Why have not those men the same claim to the Government's aid? They made no mistake. In what the Senator from Mississippi said about the cotton planter I agree with him. He was guilty of no wrong. He planted his crop; he could not foresee the difficulty that was before him in the future. But the man who sowed the wheat was equally honest. He could not foresee that it was going to be destroyed. The man who planted corn when corn was a failure could not see ahead and know that no corn could grow.

Mr. President, if we do this thing and follow it out logically, we must go into every State, into every county, into every community and help the man directly by Government aid who has met with misfortunes which are beyond his control. I can not see it in any other light. We all know that to do that the Government must fail. No Government can exist and continue to do it. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to follow out where that would lead. It seems to me that it ought to be apparent to all.

Mr. President, if I had my way I would rather loan the money directly than to buy this cotton and issue bonds on it. It may be that in the wisdom of the future some means may be devised by which Government aid can be properly controlled, so that all those who are unfortunate and fall without their fault may be given succor and may be given support.

To me, Mr. President, we have not reached that stage of wisdom yet. I can not help but believe from my own experience that the people of the South themselves will in the end come forth and come out of the dilemma, much as we did in the West, where we either raised nothing or, like you, raised something that could not be sold. Times changed, nature smiled again, prosperity returned, and although the hardships of failure had left many scars in its wake the time came again when those same people were prosperous and happy. It was not only one year that we went through, but a series of years. No man need tell me that it did not leave a scar. No man need tell me that the hardships that followed in the wake of those times killed some people and drove others from their homes and bankrupted others who were well to do and left a great deal of destruction in its path.

Mr. President, in that new country, on that frontier, most of the people were young. A great many young men had left the East and gone there to make their fortunes. All they had on earth was staked on their venture. They saw one year after another come and go and failure follow. Some left in discouragement; some remained and regained it all. It will come that way to the South. The men who owe money will not be able to pay it, and it will be generally understood, as it was with us, that no man could collect any money, that it was an impossibility. Debts were simply extended, sometimes compromised, sometimes lost, but the condition was beyond the help of any man, and people will accustom themselves to the difficulty.

I have a great deal of faith in the movement mentioned the other day by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], known as the buy-a-bale-of-cotton movement. I believe that you could go into my State and sell thousands and thousands of bales of cotton to individual buyers, if the plan were well mapped out and well understood and it was known that responsible and reliable men were behind the movement.

I read in the papers of a movement by the bankers to make a loan of $150,000,000 to the South. That will help. Relief will come in a hundred ways. But if the Government buys the cotton this year and levies a tax on cotton in the future years to pay the expense and any possible loss, it means, and it is intended to mean by those who propose this amendment that the future production of cotton will be curtailed.

Mr. President, I believe it is economically wrong to pass a law against the curtailment of the production of one of the necessities of life. I do not believe we ought to try to tax anything out of existence, unless it is something obnoxious and we ought to get rid of it. I do not believe it is economically right for the Government to go into the valorization scheme. If we have a large overproduction of wheat, those who are engaged in the production of wheat will necessarily curtail their operations for the next year. They will plant and produce something else. They will diversify their industries. The South will do the same, and when she learns the diversification of industries she will have learned the lesson that will come to bless her and her posterity for centuries to come. So, even this blow, severe though it may be, will have some blessings that will follow in its wake. If we do not tax the future production of cotton, but we establish the precedent that we will buy the surplus of cotton, then we only induce every cotton planter to redouble his efforts to raise increased amounts of cotton in order that he may dispose of it to the Government. In either case in the end there will be bad results from such legislation.

So I may say, Mr. President, that, although the situation for those who are raising and owning cotton may look dark at the present time, I do not believe a temporary measure of this kind will bring permanent relief, but in the end, in the years to come, will do more harm than good.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my first impressions in regard to this bill were against the constitutionality of the measure, and I so intimated in a colloquy upon the floor; but I have been led, by reason of the conditions which have been presented, to reinvestigate the question of the constitutional authority to do what we are about to do and to review my first impression. I have imposed upon myself the rereading of practically all the important decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States bearing upon this question of the power to tax, and I have arrived at a conclusion different from that of my first impression. As briefly as I may I shall state it and the reasons for the views I have come to entertain.

I am frank to say that I had no idea, in the first instance, of the conditions that prevail in the South, and did not at first entertain the view that there was any great calamity to be dealt with upon the part of the National Congress, but I am of the opinion now that the only real emergency growing out of the war found in this bill is contained in the proposed amendment. In so far as the other portion of the measure is concerned, it can in no just sense, in my judgment, be attributed to conditions brought on by the war but to conditions which were subject to our control here at home. But this is a condition which was superinduced by the unfortunate conflict now raging in Europe, and I deal with the subject, and I have been led to deal with it, from that standpoint alone. Whatever may be our constitutional power, there could be no justification in exercising the power except upon a great and impending crisis, involving the actual needs of great masses of people.

Mr. President, I confess, also, that I felt a tinge of inconsistency in the position which I was disposed to take against this measure in the first instance by reason of the measures which I have heretofore advocated upon the floor of the Senate.

The West came to the Congress a few years ago and asked for a loan, as it were, from the National Government for the purpose of purchasing rights of way, for building canals for the benefit of the western home builder. The principle which was involved in that measure was not to any great extent different from the principle which is involved here. Both called for a loan of the credit of the Government and both involved the relieving of that loan of credit by repaying by the citizen.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am exceedingly anxious that the Senate should hear the argument to be made by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit the Members to come in as they choose? I would rather——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I want to supplement the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi by stating that I have heard of a number of Senators who desire to hear what the Senator from Idaho has to say, but they rested under the impression that he would take the floor at a later hour. I believe it would be an accommodation to the absent Members to give them an opportunity of attending.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I was remarking, I felt a tinge of inconsistency in the position I was about to take in regard to this amendment by reason of the fact that, as I view it, so far as the principle is concerned, it is no different from that upon which we have been reclaiming the desert lands of the West for the last 10 or 15 years. I urged before Congress some year and a half or two years ago a loan of $20,000,000, to be used for the reclamation of the public lands of the West and also for the putting of water upon private lands in those arid regions. In the final operation and working of this law it so transpires that the effect of it all is that the Government advances its credit and, as it were, loans to the settler an amount of money sufficient to build his canal and laterals and to place water upon his land, and takes as the Government security a contract, which is no more and no less than a mortgage to secure the Government. These contracts cover not only the public lands of the Government, but they cover the private lands of thousands of individuals throughout the West. It can not be said that the principle involved in this amendment is, so far as the Government's function is concerned, materially different from that which the West has invoked and which the West must continue to invoke if she is to reclaim her great desert and waste places and reduce them to habitations and happy homes.

These matters, Mr. President, led me, therefore, to a reconsideration of both the law and the precedents, and, with the permission of the Senate, I want to discuss both propositions involved in the amendment—the constitutional question and the policy.

Before discussing the legal proposition I shall read a general statement from a late opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States with reference to the general power of the National Government to tax and as to what rule the court will invoke in testing the validity or constitutionality of a tax. This opinion was written long after the Income Tax decision, and the principle which is announced here is so much in contravention of the technical rule which was adopted in the Income Tax case that it can not be reconciled to the principle which was there announced. I read it not for its applicability in a specific way to the question which is before the Senate, but rather to the general principle under which the court now moves and proceeds to act in testing the validity of a tax. The court says:

> The whole power to tax is the one great power upon which the whole national fabric is based. It is as necessary to the existence and prosperity of a nation as is the air he breathes to the natural man. It is not only the power to destroy, but it is also the power to keep alive. * * * The commands of the Constitution in this, as in all other respects, must be obeyed; direct taxes must be apportioned, while indirect taxes must be uniform throughout the United States. But while yielding obedience to these constitutional requirements, it is no part of the duty of this court to lessen, impede, or obstruct the exercise of the taxing power by merely abstruse and subtle distinctions as to the particular nature of a specific tax, where such distinction rests more upon the differing theories of political economists than upon the practical nature of a specific tax, where such distinctions rest more upon the differing theories of political economists than upon the practical nature of the tax itself. In deciding on a tax with reference to these requirements no microscopic examination as to the purely economic or theoretical nature of the tax should be indulged for the purpose of placing it in a category which would invalidate the tax. As a mere abstract, scientific, or economic problem a particular tax might possibly be regarded as a direct tax, when as a practical tax it might quite plainly appear to be indirect. Under such circumstances, and while following a disputable theory might be indulged as to the real nature of the tax a court would not be justified, for the purpose of invalidating the tax, in placing it in a class different from that to which its practical results would consign it. Taxation is eminently practical, and is, in fact, brought to every man's door; and for the purpose of deciding upon its validity a tax should be regarded in its actual, practical results rather than with reference to those theoretical or abstract ideas whose correctness is the subject of dispute and contradiction among those who are experts in the science of political economy.

The first question raised with reference to the validity of this tax is as to its uniformity, the contention being that, by reason of the fact that this product upon which it is laid is a product confined to a limited portion of the United States, therefore it could not be uniform throughout the United States, because the product is not there upon which the law shall operate.

I confess, in the first instance, that the matter appealed to me with some degree of force and effect, but I am clear in the proposition that the Supreme Court of the United States has put that question at rest. It has said in late decisions that the question of whether or not the law operates upon all the different parts of the Union is not a question which the court will inquire into in determining the validity of the tax, but is the tax in itself uniform in its operation wherever the subject of taxation may be found. I ask the attention of the Senate briefly, first, to the case in One hundred and seventy-eighth United States Reports, at page 107. This was the case of Knowlton against Moore, in which an inheritance tax was involved. The court, in discussing the subject of uniformity, said:

> It is yet further asserted that the tax does not fulfill the requirements of geographical uniformity for the following reason: As the primary rate of taxation depends upon the degree of relationship or want of relationship to a deceased person, it is argued that it can not operate with geographical uniformity, inasmuch as testamentary and intestacy laws may differ in every State. It is certain that the same degree of relationship or want of relationship to the deceased, wherever existing, is levied on at the same rate throughout the United States. The tax is hence uniform throughout the United States, despite the fact that different conditions among the States may obtain as to the objects upon which the tax is levied. The proposition in substance assumes that the objects taxed by duties, imposts, and excises must be found in uniform quantities and conditions in the respective States, otherwise the tax levied on them will not be uniform throughout the United States. But what the Constitution commands is the imposition of a tax by the rule of geographical uniformity, not that in order to levy such a tax objects must be selected which exist uniformly in the several States. Indeed, the contention was substantially disposed of in the License Tax cases (5 Wall., 472), previously referred to. It was there urged that, as the several States had the right to forbid the carrying on of the liquor traffic, therefore Congress had no power to license such traffic, because it would interfere with the authority of the State. It was held that the license was validly imposed; that it did not interfere with the power of the States to prevent the liquor traffic, because in a State where such traffic was forbidden the license would be inoperative, but in the States where such traffic was allowed the license would be effective. The argument, however, is additionally fully answered by the review which we have made of the origin and meaning of the expression "uniform throughout the United States." From that review it appears that the very objection upon which the proposition now advanced must rest was urged in the Continental Congress as the reason why the levy of uniform duties, imposts, and excises throughout the United States should not be authorized. This is shown by the objection of Mr. Rutledge and the suggestion of Mr. Lee. It is further shown by the protest of Rhode Island and the reasons advanced why a duty on salt should not be levied. But it was seen that if it were required, not only that the duties, imposts, and excises should be uniform throughout the United States, but that in imposing them objects should be selected existing in equal quantity in the several States, the grant of power to levy duties, imposts, and excises would be a failure. In that convention which framed the Constitution the same argument was used without success, and, as we have seen, the only ground upon which the striking out of the words "and equal" after the word "uniform" in the adoption of the clause as now found in the Constitution can be reasonably explained is that it was done to prevent the implication that the duties, imposts, and excises which were to be uniform throughout the United States were to be placed upon rights equally existing in the several States. To now adopt the proposition relied on would be virtually, then, to nullify the action of the convention, and would relegate the taxing power of Congress to the impotent condition in which it was during the confederation.

From One hundred and eighty-fourth United States Reports I quote a single paragraph which the court quotes from the Head Money cases. In discussing the question of uniformity in this case, the court says:

The tax is uniform when it operates with the same force and effect in every place where the subject of it is found. The tax in this case, which, as far as it can be called a tax, is an excise duty on the business of bringing passengers from foreign countries into this by ocean navigation, is uniform and operates precisely alike in every port of the United States where such passengers can be landed.

Of course there were a number of States where it could not operate at all, where it could have no effect, and from which nothing at all could be collected under the law.

Perfect uniformity and perfect equality of taxation, in all the aspects in which the human mind can view it, is a baseless dream, as this court has said more than once.

The last announcement of the court upon this subject is much more specific than all which has preceded, and that is found in the case of Flint against Stone Tracy Co., which case involved the validity of the corporation tax, passed several sessions ago. I shall read but a single paragraph; but I invite the attention of the Senate to the specific declaration of the court, which seems to cover precisely the question which has disturbed some of us here:

The argument that different corporations are so differently circumstanced in different States, and the operation of the law so unequal as to destroy it, is so fully met in the opinion in Knowlton v. Moore that it is only necessary to make reference thereto. For this purpose the law operates uniformly, geographically considered, throughout the United States, and in the same way wherever the subject matter is found. A liquor tax is not rendered unlawful as a revenue measure because it may yield nothing in those States which have prohibited the liquor traffic. No more is the present law unconstitutional because of inequality of operation owing to different local conditions.

I think, Mr. President, that we can with confidence rely upon the proposition announced by the Supreme Court in the several opinions that if the law operates uniformly upon the subject matter of taxation wherever that subject matter of taxation may be found throughout the United States, it conforms to the constitutional provision that the tax must be uniform throughout the United States, and that the fact that in some States of the Union the subject of taxation is not to be found at all does not invalidate the law by reason of its nonuniformity; that it simply has the effect of relieving that State from taxation because of the physical condition that the subject of taxation is absent.

Mr. President, just a few words with reference to the other proposition, for I speak under pressure of time, and that is, whether or not this is a direct tax. For nearly a hundred years the Supreme Court of the United States held that a direct tax related alone to land and to a capitation tax. The first decision which dealt with the subject dealt with a tax which was laid upon carriages and vehicles for transportation. I am aware that in later years it was attempted to distinguish this decision by saying that this was a tax upon the right to use the vehicle, but that was not the reasoning upon which the court proceeded to announce its opinion when the case was before the court. The court did not rest its decision on the question of whether or not it was a tax upon personal property direct or whether it was a mere excise tax upon the right to use it. No such logic or argument is found in the opinion of the court; but it held that a tax upon property was a valid tax, notwithstanding the fact that it was not apportioned, unless it was a property tax upon real estate or a capitation tax. That was the basis upon which the court rested its opinion and which obtained in this country down until the decision which is known as the income-tax decision. Briefly, I think I may be permitted to refer to some discussion of the Hilton case. Mr. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, says:

Direct taxes when laid by Congress must be apportioned among the several States according to the representative population. The term "direct taxes" as employed in the Constitution has a technical meaning and embraces capitation and land taxes only.

Justice Miller, long an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and considered among its ablest members, said:

Under the provisions already quoted the question came up as to what is a direct tax and also upon what property it is to be levied as distinguished from any other tax. In regard to this it is sufficient to say that it is believed that no other than a capitation tax of so much per head and a land tax is a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. All other taxes except imposts are properly called excise taxes. Direct taxes within the meaning of the Constitution are only capitation taxes as expressed in that instrument and taxes on real estate.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his valuable work on Constitutional Law, says:

The court decided that this tax was not direct.

Speaking of the Hilton case—

The reasons given for the decisions are unanswerable and would seem to cover all the provisions of the internal-revenue law.

Other constitutional writers, such as Black, Burroughs, and Hare, sustain the proposition that for nearly a hundred years, or until the income-tax decision, there was no doubt as to the power of Congress to levy without apportionment a tax upon property if that property was not land or the tax was not a capitation tax; but when the income-tax decision was rendered, a different rule was invoked.

In the first rendition of that opinion the court held that a tax upon income, and so forth, coming from real estate was in effect a tax upon real estate; but in the second opinion that was rendered the court went the full distance, and said that a tax upon income, whether coming from real estate or from personal property, was a direct tax and had to be apportioned.

I have never believed, Mr. President, that that decision represented the sound, final, and conclusive view of the Supreme Court of the United States; the dissenting opinion stated the soundest view and the view which, in my judgment, should ultimately obtain. I have never believed that it represented the best judgment and the soundest view of the American bar. To say that a tax upon the income from real estate is a tax upon the real estate is to establish and invoke a technicality unsound, unreasonable, and incongruous and such as is found nowhere else in the law. There is not, from the beginning of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence to this hour, a well-recognized precedent to be found which has ever treated either in the civil or criminal courts rent as real estate. You might just as well say that a man who steals the rent which one may have collected from my real estate is guilty of trespassing upon real estate as to say that a tax upon income is a tax upon real estate; I would nevertheless concede that, if that opinion stood without having been trimmed or narrowed or modified, it would be perhaps an insuperable objection to this tax, because it would be regarded by legislative bodies as conclusive and binding upon us; but since the rendition of that opinion the court has proceeded to deal with the subject of taxation in such a way as to leave no doubt in my mind that the tax here is a valid tax.

In the case of Patton against Brady the Supreme Court, in One hundred and eighty-fourth United States, held:

The tax on manufactured tobacco is a tax on an article manufactured for consumption, and imposed at a period intermediate the commencement of manufacture and the final consumption of the article.

That was treated as an excise tax. It was treated as an excise tax, it would seem, in order that it might get by the opinion in the Income Tax case, because there is no difference, Mr. President, so far as practical taxation is concerned, and the Supreme Court says now that it will test these taxes by the practical rule and not by theory. There is no difference between laying the tax at one period of manufacture and laying it at another. It is a property tax—a tax upon property wherever you lay it in the course or in the process of manufacture.

But if we should concede the reasoning and the distinction, the time at which this tax is laid upon cotton in this amendment comes clearly within the rule which is laid down here in One hundred and eighty-fourth United States Reports, which marks a period between its condition in its original state and its condition in its final manufactured state, and can be properly treated and is treated in the law itself as an excise tax.

But the court has whittled its opinion in more ways than one, until the only effect of that opinion among the judicial decisions of the United States is to record an error and not a principle of law. For instance, a citizen of the State of New York, having died, left a part of his property to the Government of the United States. The question was raised that it was not within the power of the State to tax property belonging to the Government, as they undertook to tax it under the State inheritance tax law passed in 1898, and also that it was not within the power of the State to tax the right of the Government to take property, which is true.

Therefore the Supreme Court was confronted with the proposition of meeting that which had been settled so long, that you could not tax the property of one sovereignty by the action of another, and that the instrumentality of one government can not be embarrassed and taxed by another. This property which had been left to the Government was to be subjected to the tax, or at most the right to take the property was to be subjected to the tax. Under the former decision of the court the State could neither lay a tax upon the property of the National Government nor could it lay a tax upon the right of the National Government to inherit. What must you do? The Supreme Court said it was not a tax upon a legacy itself after it had become the property of the United States, and therefore was not a tax upon the National Government's property, but that it was a tax upon the property before it was distributed to the United States; that is, the property came to the Government diminished of the tax.

The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the tax, and in doing so necessarily and logically held that it was not a tax upon the right to inherit, because a State could not tax the right of the National Government, and it was not a tax upon the property of the National Government because that it could not tax. So the court held that it was a tax upon the property while it was yet the estate of the party transmitting it, and the tax was sustained on that basis. It was under any practical test and reasonable rule, a tax upon the property.

That opinion and the principle announced in that decision can not be reconciled or brought into harmony with the decision in the Income Tax case; and the opinion announced in this case is in harmony with the contention of those who contend that this tax is constitutional. If you can levy a tax upon the property belonging to an estate, there is no reason why you can not levy a tax upon the property of an individual still living. One is a tax upon property and the other is a tax upon property.

I might quote other opinions, but I shall not take the time of the Senate to do so, to show that the Supreme Court of the United States, in distinguishing and modifying the Income-Tax case opinion, has treated this process of taxation and called it an excise tax, but has in fact sustained the proposition according to the holdings of the Supreme Court in its logical effect, at least, that the only time when the tax must be apportioned is when you levy it upon land or as a capitation tax.

So I entertain no doubt that this tax can be sustained under the decision of the Supreme Court. If there is any doubt at all it is not in regard to the question of uniformity, but it is in regard to the question of whether or not it is a direct tax. When you take what is known as the oil decision in regard to taxation, the sugar-refining decision with regard to taxation, and the Flint case, you will find, in my judgment, ample authority for levying this tax under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Granting that this tax is not objectionable on the ground that it violates the law of uniformity, I should like to ask the Senator if he is quite satisfied that it is a tax which Congress has the power to levy at all, under the general power given Congress in regard to the levying of taxes, duties, imposts, and so forth, for the purpose of paying the public debt, for the common defense, and for the general welfare of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I was going to discuss that question in a few moments, and perhaps I may as well do it now.

I can imagine no wider scope of the power of taxation than that which the Supreme Court of the United States has established. It has said that whatever conserves the general welfare, whatever seems essential to take care of the citizen, to encourage and nourish the spirit of patriotism, or in any way to defend those fundamental principles of society which seem essential to a republican form of government, may be sustained and protected by taxation. I call the Senator's attention to a case in One hundred and sixtieth United States. Let us see how far the court has gone upon this matter, and I think properly so. That does not add any strength to the court's decision, but simply expresses my view. I am not unmindful, of course, that the court always links the power to tax with some one of the great delegated powers, such as the right to carry on war, regulate commerce, or provide a sound system of finance, or a power derived and springing from a combination of these powers. But the wide scope allowed to the tax-levying power seems sufficient to enable the Congress to tax for almost any reasonable public interest, and what is a public interest must differ both as to time and, to some extent, conditions, for new problems of society enlarge and augment the duties and obligations of government.

This was the case of the United States against Gettysburg Electric Railway Co., in which the Congress of the United States made an appropriation providing for a method and means of marking the great battle field of Gettysburg and preserving the monuments, and also passed a provision saying that there should be, if necessary, a condemnation of any private property that was necessary in order to round out and make complete the portion of the earth over which that great battle was fought.

Now, I must say that there seems to be very little limit to the power of taxation under the rule which was announced here. Let us see what it is. It says:

> Congress has power to declare war and to create and equip armies and navies. It has the great power of taxation to be exercised for the common defense and general welfare. Having such powers, it has such other and implied ones as are necessary and appropriate for the purpose of carrying the powers expressly given into effect. Any act of Congress which plainly and directly tends to enhance the respect and love of the citizen for the institutions of his country and to quicken and strengthen his motives to defend them, and which is germane to and intimately connected with and appropriate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted by Congress, must be valid. This proposed use comes within such description.

But the court uses other language still more expansive in its privilege than this. It reaches still further in the purport of its decision. It leads us into another domain and invites us to consider those subtle and refined influences which keep alive aspirations and arouse the energies of the citizen:

> Such a use seems necessarily not only a public use but one so closely connected with the welfare of the Republic itself as to be within the powers granted Congress by the Constitution for the purpose of protecting and preserving the whole country.

Mr. President, "peace hath her victories no less renowned than those of war"; and it is just as essential that the Government of the United States protect her citizenship against famine, against impending catastrophies, against poverty superinduced by uncontrollable causes, and against those things which inevitably flow from that condition of affairs—crime and the disintegration and demoralization of society—as it is to mark the graves of those who have preserved its institutions. There must be soldiers with the capacity and the courage to fight before there are soldiers to bury; there must be a Government strong enough and just enough to arouse the love and fealty of the citizen before he will make a good soldier.

A few years ago, when a foreign country was about to engage in war, and she began to call in her young men to submit to the test of soldiership to find out whether or not they could meet the responsibilities of the field, that great nation was astonished to find that her social system had undermined the physical stamina and the moral and physical energies of her youth until a startling proportion of them were unable to go upon the field and defend the flag.

Now we have entered upon a period in the development of this great Republic when we can no longer give our sole attention to the question whether a man has disclosed his patriotism upon the field of battle, when we can no longer give our attention solely to the question whether or not a man has a right to trial by jury, or whether or not he has a right to apply for the writ of habeas corpus; but we must look also to our social development, to the conditions of the citizen in the industrial world as they now confront him. We have come to the time when we must meet the problem of how we shall build up and protect such citizenship as will grow to the full stature of responsibility of the Republic.

If these great people of the South, by no fault of theirs and by reason of a calamity brought on by war, are now facing, as I believe they are, a condition where their homes are menaced, where thousands, if not millions, of poor in this coming winter season will have to depend upon society when society will not be prepared to take care of them, if civil institutions are thus imperiled, it is entitled to be considered as among the duties of Government to bridge the crisis.

Let us read further:

> By this use the Government manifests for the benefit of all its citizens the value put upon the services and exertions of the citizen soldiers of that period. Their successful effort to preserve the integrity and solidarity of the great Republic of modern times is forcibly impressed upon everyone who looks over the field. The value of the sacrifices then freely made is rendered plainer and more durable by the fact that the Government of the United States, through its Representatives in Congress assembled, appreciates and endeavors to perpetuate it by this most suitable recognition. Such action on the part of Congress touches the heart and comes home to the imagination of every citizen, and greatly tends to enhance his love and respect for those institutions for which these heroic sacrifices were made.

Mr. President, after it is all analyzed and stripped of its verbiage, what is the real kernel of the contention of the Supreme Court of the United States? It is that the great object of government is the common good, and that the Constitution as to the tax-levying power has left a wide discretion to the wisdom of Congress, not wholly indeed without limit, but not circumscribed by limitations which shall prevent a government from dealing with all the vicissitudes of a great aggressive and dominant people.

> The greater the love of the citizen for the institutions of his country the greater is the dependence properly to be placed upon him for their defense in time of necessity, and it is to such men that the country must look for its safety. The institutions of our country, which were saved at this enormous expenditure of life and property, ought to and will be regarded with proportionate affection. Here upon this battle field is one of the proofs of that expenditure, and the sacrifices are rendered more obvious and more easily appreciated when such a battle field is preserved by the Government at the public expense.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a few moments ago painted a scene with which all western men are familiar—one of those experiences which visited us at a time when the earth had refused to yield and drought and famine had practically swept over our land—and the Senator was of the opinion that the fact that under those conditions no appeal was made might well serve as a precedent against a recurring condition in another part of the country. But, Mr. President, that is not the history of the Anglo-Saxon race. We are a progressive people, and we meet emergencies as they arise, provided our experience and our wisdom have been sufficiently exercised and fed to enable us to conceive of a remedy. The people of the United States believe that this Government which they formed is sufficient and efficient, both in its general powers and in its reserved powers, to take care of the citizenship of those upon whom it must rest. Because in times past we have not exercised the full powers of government and have not protected our people from suffering and want I do not believe that condition of affairs should be permitted to continue. If we have the power, if the Constitution gives us the right, then it is simply a question of the wisdom of Congress when the necessity of exercising that power shall arise. Modern government must meet modern conditions, and, in my judgment, it can do so by doing no more than applying sound principles of constitutional law to these modern conditions.

Now, Mr. President, we have the power, but should we exercise it? Is this a situation sufficiently momentous and far-reaching and of such a nature as to call into exercise this power? Is it a condition that can be dealt with by private efforts, or should it be taken in hand by the combined power of society as represented in the Government? Not as a permanent proposition, but to meet an emergency. All would concede that if it were not an emergency, a crisis affecting millions of people, no such thing as this should be contemplated or considered. All would concede further that the subject should be dealt with in terms as an emergency, as a crisis, and anything we do should be upon the theory that with the going of the emergency would go the legislation.

The cry of paternalism should not deter us from the discharge of a plain duty of government in case of great emergencies. It is not paternalism to protect the people against the scourges of yellow fever, against the calamities and sufferings of earthquakes and great fires. It is not paternalism to provide, in so far as possible, against the baneful fruits of war, and this is one of the effects of the fiendish conflict now disturbing and distressing the whole world. Paternalism is fostered often by the failure of government to exercise with wisdom and discretion just and sane powers of government. Paternalism grows apace among a feeble, impoverished, and discouraged people. I do not consider it paternalism to aid a citizen in these stupendous, unforeseen, and unavoidable calamities, against which it is impossible for the individual citizens to guard or protect themselves and with which no less than organized society can deal. Now, does this condition appeal to us from that standpoint? It does to me; and I will never hesitate to invoke and use the great power in an emergency any more than I would refuse to use such power to infringe upon the ordinary duties and responsibilities of private endeavor in the ordinary affairs of life.

There is no way by which you can bring the love of these people back to this old Republic—and it sometimes seems essential enough in these days—there is no way by which you can bring the confidence of our people back to these institutions of ours so quickly as to demonstrate to the people of this country that when a great calamity arises the flexibility and adaptability of our Government is such that we may meet that calamity, and one portion of this Nation may share its riches and its comforts with those who have been visited with misfortune. A proud and self-governing people will not be misled or seduced into paternalism by the fact that their Government discloses both the capacity and the willingness to deal with unexpected and unavoidable catastrophes.

I would not support this measure if in my judgment the Constitution of the United States did not justify it; but I am one of those who believe that as from year to year we unravel the powers of this great instrument we shall find that there is very little which inures to the happiness and prosperity and contentment of the whole people which we may not do under this marvelous charter which was given to us a little over 100 years ago. It is not by reason of the unwisdom of our Constitution and the Government under which we live, it is by reason of our failure to exercise those powers in a wise and efficient way, that our people suffer, if they suffer at all.

We are at this time building a railroad in Alaska, loaning the Government in an indirect way to the development of that region of country. We do this because of the peculiar situation and circumstances and extraordinary conditions which surround private citizens in that country. We have spent millions of dollars to take care of the situation after great fires in some of our cities; after the earthquake at San Francisco; and we have sent large sums of money to sufferers in foreign lands by reason of earthquakes and other disasters. Shall we hesitate, or shall we find our Government incapacitated to deal with extraordinary conditions in our own country when we have dealt with them when they have developed in other countries? We spend millions of dollars year after year to protect the farms and homes along the Mississippi River. We loan the credit of the Government yearly and constantly to our private banks, organized for private gain and purely personal interests. Originally the banks did not ask for any more than the extraordinary power to issue their notes, which should serve as currency—a most extraordinary thing, indeed—but now they not only have the privilege to issue the notes which shall circulate as currency, but the Government of the United States guarantees these notes, which are nothing more than the notes of private corporations organized for gain. We loaned the credit of the Government, in addition to donating millions of acres of land, to the building of railroads, and took mortgages for our security and went into copartnership with great railroad corporations. We have, as I have said, loaned the credit of the Government to the western settler to aid him in the building of his home and the conquering of the desert, which he, alone, could not do. I do not think the western settler has lost any of his initiative, his self-reliance, and his good citizenship. He knows the Government is but aiding him to do that which private enterprise will not or can not do, and that as soon as the desert is conquered the citizen is expected, and is perfectly willing, to pay the Government and relieve himself of all obligations to or dependence upon the Government.

There is no difficulty about the powers of our Government. It is sufficient and efficient to do justice to all men and to permit the most extended development and progress of the human family. It is simply a question of exercising those powers with wisdom and judgment, and this whole question depends upon the proposition of whether the disaster and the unfortunate condition in the South has reached the proportions of a national catastrophe. No part of this great body politic of ours can suffer to any considerable degree without affecting every other part of the body politic, and owing to our complex and closely interwoven, involved, and intricate social life, our means of transportation and interchange, communities are no longer isolated as they were once. We are all one—a united people—and bound together by common interests.

Something has been said about going into partnership with private institutions. My able friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] yesterday said that the Republicans had been in partnership with the corporations in this country so long that it has affected the whole people in their way of thinking upon public questions. Mr. President, the Federal reserve banking act is based upon the proposition of loaning the credit of the Government to purely private corporations. I read this morning in the paper that in a few days notes are to be prepared for these Federal reserve banks and issued to purely private corporations, organized for private gain. The Government of the United States is to guarantee those notes and take care of them under all circumstances. These are notes which will circulate as currency from a purely private corporation. The Government of the United States is their guarantor, and it is back of them. But instead of issuing them, as it might do, through its own Government-owned and Government-controlled bank, it cooperates with and puts them out through and greatly to the advantage of purely private corporations. This is copartnership to a very marked extent, wise or unwise I do not now stop to discuss.

Take the situation in which we are placed with reference to this bill. We have $75,000,000 collected from the people of the United States. Where is it? Is it in the Public Treasury? What has become of the $75,000,000 which has already been taken up in the way of taxation? It is in the vaults of purely private institutions, organized for private gain, conducted solely in private interest, and we do not take it out of those banks for the reason that it would imperil the public welfare. Shall we hesitate to take whatever amount is necessary to relieve other private interests upon the theory that the Government of the United States should not go into copartnership with private institutions?

I think, as I said a moment ago, that I am not in a position to oppose this amendment. I propose to come to this Congress at the next session and ask Congress to loan the western settler $50,000,000 for the purpose of protecting his home, for the purpose of building up a habitation where he may rear his children. I will say to the Government of the United States: "You shall have a mortgage, as you have now, upon thousands of acres as a security for your loan"; and I shall expect, under the precedents of the past, to see that loan granted.

Mr. President, is there anything that a government can do more calculated to serve its public interests than to find homes for its homeless, to reduce the waste places to habitations, to keep our citizens here instead of sending them to Canada? Must not the Government look beyond the mere question of whether or not a citizen is abiding by the law? And if we may construct homes, if we may reduce waste places, may we not, exercising the same power and invoking the same principle, under extraordinary circumstances prevent thousands and thousands of acres from being reduced to waste and homelessness?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he is not mistaken in the two alleged parallels which he has pointed out?

First, he likens the reserve bank system, which is to supply the people with currency and to act as the fiscal agent of the United States, to the raiser of cotton. The one is performing a public function and acting for the Government. The other one, in raising his cotton, is performing a purely private and individual act like any other man in private business.

He then points out another parallel in which he indicates that the United States loaned a large amount of money and gave a large amount of public domain to the Pacific railroads. Is he not forgetting the fact that railroads are public highways; that public highways were formerly constructed entirely at public expense and controlled by the public, and that that particular highway was constructed as a war measure for the purpose of connecting the eastern part of the United States with the Pacific coast?

Is there not a vast difference between the case of a railroad performing a public function and serving a public purpose, carrying Government freight at a reduced rate, and a banking institution also performing a public function, and this other case which the Senator illustrates of the cotton raiser or the corn raiser or any other purely private enterprise?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course there is a difference; but cotton occupies a peculiar place in our industrial world, and a disaster so great would be as much a matter of public concern as commerce itself. Suppose the entire cotton crop were absolutely destroyed, what effect would it have upon the general prosperity and welfare of the people throughout a very large proportion of the United States other than that where it is raised? Do we not recall, when the Civil War precluded the shipping of cotton to England, the condition of suffering which it imposed and brought upon the part of the people who were dependent upon cotton-manufacturing establishments for a livelihood, when they walked the streets and begged for something to eat, and when that condition of affairs went on until they had riot and bloodshed in the streets of London because of the misery and suffering of the poor?

As has been said here, I think the loss of the cotton crop or a failure to utilize it would have just as much effect upon the industries of certain portions of this country outside of the South as it would have on the South.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion in this connection, the manufactures of cotton goods in America are valued at almost as much as the entire raw cotton crop. There are more than half a million people engaged in the manufacture of cotton, and the people who manufacture cotton in the United States make a larger profit out of its manufacture than the people who produce the entire cotton crop of America, and that is made out of the South.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I venture to say that the Senator from Mississippi will be utterly unable to verify that statement by any statistics. There is no evidence anywhere in existence that the people who manufacture cotton cloth make as much money out of it as all the people in the South make out of raising cotton.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not say that the profit was that amount. I said that the value of the product was pretty nearly a billion dollars.

Mr. LIPPITT. I misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is what I said. I do not know what profits you make.

Mr. LIPPITT. I understood the Senator's statement to be that the people engaged in manufacturing cotton made as much out of it as all the people engaged in raising cotton make out of that occupation.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator from Rhode Island what would be the effect upon his town, his State, if the cotton crop was entirely destroyed?

Mr. LIPPITT. Do you mean the cotton crop of the world? What do you mean?

Mr. BORAH. I mean the cotton crop of the United States, for practical illustration.

Mr. LIPPITT. And no other cotton was grown anywhere?

Mr. BORAH. What would be the effect if the cotton crop of the United States itself was destroyed?

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, Mr. President, I think if the cotton crop of the United States was destroyed it would be a great calamity to the country. I can not agree at all with the Senator in the statement which he was making when he was interrupted by the Senator from Mississippi, in which he said that the production of cotton and this calamity that has arisen in connection with it is different from other industries of the United States. The same thing might happen to the cereal crops. It might happen to the manufacture of iron and steel. It might happen to the manufacture of textiles. It might happen to any large industry of similar importance as the cotton manufacture in the South, and the calamity would be the same to the people of this country whether it happened to one or the other. They stand on all fours with each other, and I am utterly unable to see any difference in the fact that this calamity has happened to the South than though it had happened to some of the other great industries.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose it did happen to some of the other industries, from which a great calamity would necessarily flow, if you felt the Government of the United States had the power to arrest the suffering would you not be in favor of doing it?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I have thought very seriously over the proposition which is now being discussed before the Senate. I am thinking seriously over it. It is a great novelty in our industrial existence, an unusual and almost unprecedented thing. I think it is very wise for us to consider and discuss it here to see if any remedy can be thought out to meet the situation. I have not been able to satisfy myself that the remedy proposed in this amendment is a wise remedy.

The Senator asked me what I would do if some similar thing happened to some other great industry, one that was particularly connected with my section of the country. Of course, to a degree, this very calamity which has happened to the South very seriously affects the part of the country in which I am located. We are suffering to a very great extent from the reduction in the price of cotton. The mills of New England are obliged to carry some three months' supply of cotton ahead of their date of manufacture. When this situation occurred they were loaded up with cotton for which they had paid the South 12, 13, and 14 cents a pound. Immediately the purchasers of goods recognized that the reduction of cotton was going to make a reduction in the price of cloth, and New England is to-day selling its product on the basis of cotton at some 8 cents a pound. They have themselves lost, or are in process of losing, the difference between what they paid for cotton and what they would be able to replace it for at present prices.

They have not come to Congress asking to be included in the remedy which is proposed for the people of the South, although they very justly might if the argument of the Senator who is now addressing the Senate is a valid one. Of course, these things are one of the incidents of trade. It is the rub of the green, as they say in golf. In all business there comes a time when the conditions are not prosperous. It has not been the custom of the Government to intervene in every situation of that kind. That situation was very well expressed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] yesterday when he talked about the copper industry. Exactly the same conditions exist in the copper industry as exist in the case of the cotton of the South. If the Government of the United States is going to intervene under such circumstances to protect its citizens, I for one say that it ought to protect all its citizens, and not simply protect those who on account of their number are represented here by numerous Representatives or by those who choose to bring their particular situation before the Senate.

It seems to me the mere fact that one calamity is a calamity to a great many people is no reason why the United States should intervene to protect that particular class of its citizens as compared with those who, although less numerous and therefore of less importance, are suffering an equal degree of hardship. The cotton growers are not the only sufferers from this calamitous contest because they are the most vociferous.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am within 25 minutes of the time when the general discussion is to close, and I know there are other Senators who desire to speak. I have spoken longer than I intended.

I want to say, in conclusion, that I think wherever a calamity arises to the dignity of being a national misfortune, affecting, you may say, the whole people, some directly, others indirectly, then there is a question which appeals to the wisdom and justice of Congress, and there are two questions for Congress to determine. First, has it the power, and, second, is the calamity of such moment and the suffering calculated to be of such an extent that they may exercise their wisdom in providing relief? We never hesitate to provide relief here whenever sufficiently appealed to and it is a question that has the approval of our judgment. We have granted millions of dollars of relief in different situations, and the simple proposition is whether or not the calamity has risen to an extent to move our judgment in favor of some plan of amelioration. The South is in great distress. This may not be the wisest way, but I express hope to see and willingness to assist in some scheme or plan of relief. There can be no politics on this side of the Chamber in any movement of this kind. The South has not yet yielded us her confidence in a political way. But some of us feel that the emergency is such as to call upon us for sympathy and support and that we are to act in this matter from a sense of duty to our whole people.

Mr. BRYAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Florida, before he begins, permit me to interrupt him for a moment? I desire unanimous consent to present a report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is one of the usual reports for the payment of six months' salary to the widow of a deceased employee. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it would be absolutely out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is for the Senate to determine whether it will keep the unanimous-consent agreement or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is going to lead to any discussion or any trouble, I will wait; but this is a case of a very poor woman. Of course, anything that any body can do by unanimous consent it can temporarily undo by another unanimous consent. But I shall not discuss that. I ask unanimous consent, however, for the present consideration of the resolution, if there is no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Because we are working under a unanimous-consent agreement, and for no other reason, I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the Senator from Utah to object to the resolution being presented and placed on the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. That is business, and I object even to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, in closing his able address the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stated that there were two propositions involved in this amendment—first, whether an emergency exists, and, second, whether Congress has the power to meet it.

Mr. President, I take it that no one at all familiar with conditions in the South at this time doubts for a moment that the people there are confronted with a great crisis, perhaps more severe than any of us imagine. Senators from the cotton States have been in consultation from time to time since the war in Europe broke out. The governors of the States affected have met in convention in some one of the States, and have also come to Washington to consult with the delegations in Congress, and for two months or over there has been diligent, persistent effort made by the representatives of those people to find some solution of this question.

Inasmuch, Mr. President, as I can not support this amendment, I feel it incumbent upon me to state very briefly the reasons that shall control my vote. I desire it to be distinctly understood that I do not oppose the amendment except with feelings of regret. I realize the seriousness of the situation, but, Mr. President, as I view it the States never conferred upon the Federal Government the power we are attempting to exercise, and the people of many of the States to-day withhold from their legislatures the exercise of any such power. That is the reason why the governors of the States, instead of calling their legislatures together, came to Washington to consult with the delegations in Congress. If under the State constitutions the States could have given the relief they would not have been here. Of course the legislatures of the States could have been called together and granted the relief but for the fact that the people have withheld from them the power. They never granted it in the Federal Constitution, and many of the State constitutions have withheld it.

That was very frankly stated by the governor of Georgia to be the reason for not calling the legislature of that State together. It has no power to issue bonds or to lend the credit of the State to individuals. Similar inhibitions exist in the constitution of my State. The State is forbidden to lend its credit to any individual, association, or corporation, and the legislature is forbidden to grant the power to counties, cities, or municipalities.

They have not the power; and as they have not the power, they come to Congress. Where will we find the power here? The Senator from Idaho argues that this tax is an excise tax. I will not stop to debate that. I think it is a very close question whether it is or not; but conceding, for the purpose of the argument, that it is an excise tax, and therefore could be levied under the rule of uniformity as distinguished from the rule of apportionment, in voting for such a levy we are limited in the purposes for which we raise revenue; and although the Supreme Court may not say that our purpose was not to raise revenue, yet it is our purpose to prohibit production instead of providing for the revenue of the Government, and we under our oaths have no power to levy the tax.

The appropriations are to be for what purposes? For any of the purposes authorized, unless by the term "public welfare" the Constitution has left it to Congress to make an appropriation for anything it may call the public welfare. That is an argument which has been made in support of this amendment. Let us see. But before I come to that clause of the Constitution there is one prohibiting the levying of a tax upon exports. That was put in at the instance of the cotton-producing States of the South, because they feared, according to the history of the framing of the Constitution, that the Northern States would undertake to levy an export duty upon cotton and other staples. Therefore it was never within the view of those people who drew the Constitution that it would ever be resorted to to levy a tax upon that staple crop of the South.

Several Senators have said that we are authorized to do anything we consider to be for the general welfare. Alexander Hamilton never went as far as that. It has remained to this day for Senators, under great pressure and under a determination to do almost anything they can to save the situation, to invent that doctrine, and especially for Democratic Senators to invent it. In the case of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], from the State of Pinckney—who undertook by the insertion of the provision against duties upon exports to protect cotton from taxation—the State of Calhoun, it has remained for a successor of one of those men in the Senate of the United States to announce the doctrine that a man who would vote against this amendment because of its unconstitutionality is a disgrace not only to the Democratic Party but to the South. I suppose under that line of reasoning——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BRYAN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I hope the Senator from Florida will quote correctly, as he intends to do, what I said.

Mr. BRYAN. I will let the Senator state it again.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I said there is a question as to whether it is constitutional or not, and that being the case, the man from the South who would not give the State the benefit of that doubt and to relieve his people was a traitor to his people, and I repeat it.

Mr. BRYAN. That does not change it much. The substance of what the Senator said was that a man who would allow scruples as to constitutional provisions, who would quibble over whether the Constitution permitted it or not, would be a traitor to the South.

Under that line of reasoning of the Senator from South Carolina, I suppose a man who would violate his oath in order to give relief would be a statesman and a patriot.

Mr. President, Alexander Hamilton, as I said, never contended for as broad a construction of the Constitution as is attempted to be placed upon it here to-day. He acknowledged the power that you had to lay and collect taxes in order to provide for the general welfare, but he contended that it was left to the Congress to determine what it is. Even he never took the extreme ground taken here to-day.

When the Constitution was up for consideration it was contended by those opposed to it that the people were granting to the Federal Government the power to do anything they thought was for the general welfare, and in an article in the Federalist Mr. Madison undertook to meet that view. Here is what he said in No. 40 of the Federalist:

> Some, who have not denied the necessity of the power of taxation, have grounded a very fierce attack against the Constitution on the language in which it is defined. It has been urged and echoed that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare. No stronger proof could be given of the distress under which these writers labor for objections than their stooping to such a misconstruction.
> Had no other enumeration or definition of the powers of the Congress been found in the Constitution than the general expressions just cited, the authors of the objections might have had some color for it, though it would have been difficult to find a reason for so awkward a form of describing an authority to legislate in all possible cases. A power to destroy the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, or even to regulate the course of descents, or the forms of conveyances, must be very singularly expressed by the terms "to raise money for the general welfare."
> But what color can the objection have when a specification of the object alluded to by these general terms immediately follows, and is not even separated by a longer pause than a semicolon? If the different parts of the same instrument ought to be so expounded as to give meaning to every part that will bear it, shall one part of the same sentence be excluded altogether from a share in the meaning, and shall the more doubtful and indefinite terms be retained in their full extent, and the clear and precise expressions be denied any signification whatsoever? For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural and common than first to use a general phrase, and then to explain and qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning, and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead, is an absurdity which, as we are reduced to dilemma of charging either on the authors of the objection or on the authors of the Constitution, we must take the liberty of supposing had not its origin with the latter.
> The objection here is the more extraordinary, as it appears that the language used by the convention is a copy from the articles of confederation. The objects of the Union among the States, as described in Article III, are "their common defense, security of their liberties, and mutual and general welfare." The terms of Article VIII are still more identical: "All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury," etc. A similar language again occurs in Article IX. Construe either of these articles by the rules which would justify the construction put on the new Constitution and they vest in the existing Congress a power to legislate in all cases whatsoever. But what would have been thought of that assembly if, attaching themselves to these general expressions and disregarding the specifications which ascertain and limit their import, they had exercised an unlimited power of providing for the common defense and general welfare? I appeal to the objectors themselves whether they would in that case have employed the same reasoning in justification of Congress as they now make use of against the convention. How difficult it is for error to escape its own condemnation.

Mr. President, it is not attempted to be concealed here that this tax is not levied to be collected. It is to be levied to prevent the production of cotton. The Government is to issue bonds to go into the private business of buying and selling cotton. A tax of 2 cents a pound is to be levied upon the production of cotton, upon the farmer who produces it, if he produces more than 50 per cent of what he produced the year before, with a most unique provision that if a man did not plant cotton the year before he should be allowed to produce only 50 per cent of what was produced on the same farm or plantation. But suppose a man had got him a new piece of ground, it is left to the mathematicians who got up this amendment to figure out how much he would be allowed to produce then.

Mr. President, this Congress has been in session for almost two years. We passed a tariff act upon the theory that it was not the business of the Government to foster private enterprise of any character. In carrying out that purpose, sir, Congress did not hesitate to ruin an industry in Louisiana. I can very easily understand how a Senator who announces that it is his purpose a few months hence to ask a gift from the Treasury of the United States of $50,000,000 to aid private enterprise would be tempted to agree that this act may be constitutional.

Then, sir, after the tariff act was out of the way Congress stayed in session for 11 hours a day in order to pass an act to provide for a better banking system, and it is the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board that through its instrumentality we will be able to control this situation much more satisfactorily than will be the case if the United States Government shall undertake to swap bonds for cotton, with an agreement to hold a surplus for three years, and have it stand there as a menacing shadow over the production of cotton.

Suppose, Mr. President, three years from now cotton should be selling at 12 cents a pound, the Government has the right under this amendment to dump its cotton on the market. Do you suppose the price of 12 cents would remain very long, with the 5,000,000 bales owned by the Government put upon the market?

But, sir, conceding that it would solve the problem and conceding that more people are to be affected by it than perhaps will ever be the case again, yet I can not draw the distinction between the cases submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], or some of them, and this case.

There is some cotton produced in the State which I have the honor to represent—50,000 bales. But, Mr. President, this European war has closed down absolutely the exportation of naval stores, worth $30,000,000, 55 per cent of which is exported, which does not deteriorate by keeping. Why should not those people come and ask the Government to help them? Florida produces 80 per cent of the phosphate rock produced in the United States and exports it. Those mines are closed because of the European war. Have they a right to come to the Treasury of the United States and ask to be helped? In the lumber industry the market has been very much deteriorated by the war in Europe. What about them? The product mounts into the millions.

Mr. President, there swept over the State of Florida in 1895 a freeze that in a night wiped out one hundred millions of property. It never occurred, I dare say, to a single citizen of that State that he had the right to come to the Government of the United States and ask for relief, because, sir, the people in that section of the country have been trained to believe that this is a Government of limited powers, that it is not a paternalistic Government; but I know perfectly well if this amendment is adopted we will be besieged continually by people engaged in private enterprise to be supported at the expense of the Government under which they live.

I believe it is better, Mr. President, to let our people stand conditions as best they can, and let them use the instrumentalities of the Federal reserve banks, and let the States help them where they can rather than to undertake to pass this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock has arrived and in accordance with the unanimous consent the discussion now proceeds under the 15-minute rule. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. BRYAN. In undertaking to render what assistance I could in working out this problem it occurred to me that the difficulty is this: Debts were coming due, people would be bound to sell their crop for their debts, and we might resort within the States to stay laws.

I made an investigation of the stay laws passed both before and during the Civil War. I supposed that to postpone the date upon which an obligation could be collected or to postpone the date of the execution of a judgment would be constitutional; and the authorities say that it can be done, provided it does not unreasonably impair the obligation of a contract; but it is a remarkable thing that every stay law passed by the Confederate States was held by their own courts to be unconstitutional, without even having to come to the Supreme Court of the United States, upon the ground that it was an impairment of the obligation of a contract.

Now, sir, when under circumstances more severe than those existing at present the Supreme Court of South Carolina held such a law unconstitutional in one of the ablest opinions to be found in the books, do you mean to say that the people of those States intended that either their State legislatures or that the Federal Legislature should be given a free hand to spend their tax money as they pleased? No, Mr. President. The power to appropriate money was very carefully limited to the purposes for which the two respective governments were established.

Mr. President, this will be a severe trial to the people of the South, but they have come through severe trials before without appealing to their Representatives to pass an unconstitutional law to help them.

One of the peculiar things about this proposition, and the one which is to follow it, is this: The Smith amendment proposes to buy cotton under an agreement not to sell for three years, then to sell at 10 cents a pound, and to levy the tax, not for the purpose of returning any money, but for the purpose of limiting the production. If that is voted down, then we shall be confronted with another amendment, offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], to return $68,000,000 of the cotton taxes levied from 1862 to 1866. The only ground upon which the return can be asked is that the Federal Government never had a right to levy the tax. I do not believe the Federal Government did have a right to levy the tax, and if a vote comes upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, I shall vote to return the tax; but, Mr. President, I can not understand the attitude of Senators who will vote to levy a similar tax and at the same time vote to return the tax already illegally collected, which for 50 years the Representatives from the Southern States have been demanding, and justly demanding, that Congress shall return.

Mr. President, about 1893, during the hard times in the West, at the time Senators say corn was being burned instead of coal, and when bills were pending here to appropriate money for the relief of those people, it never occurred either to the Republican Party or to the Democratic Party that they had either the right or the power to pass such bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Florida that large appropriations were made to help those people seed their crops.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, Mr. President, that is not what I remarked. Bills were introduced here, and reported adversely, for the appropriation of $10,000,000 and $50,000,000 to warehouse the crops and to lend money on them, but they were voted down. It will not do to point to a wrongful appropriation of money, and because such an appropriation has once been made to ask that an illegal action be repeated. Sir, those precedents would none of them have been so powerful as will this one be in case this amendment is adopted.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to argue this question merely in a disconnected way. I have stated the main grounds which will control my vote on the amendment.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, a few moments ago, when I was speaking in reply to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] about the cotton situation, I said that I had been giving this matter very careful consideration. There is one view of this amendment which I should like to suggest to the Senate for a moment. I do not intend to thoroughly discuss the amendment. I want merely to consider one phase of it. The provisions of the amendment are, in the first place, that bonds amounting to $250,000,000 shall be issued for the purpose of buying cotton by the Government at 10 cents a pound. It also provides that the Government shall hold that cotton until the beginning of January, 1916, or for a year and a half, so as to take it out of the market, the idea being that the cotton thus left would be about equal to the consumption under the present conditions. As a corollary of that proposition, it is proposed that the South shall be forbidden during the year 1915 to raise more than one-half of her normal crop of cotton by imposing a tax in that year of 2 cents per pound on the cotton of any plantation which is in excess of one-half the amount raised in 1914.

It has occurred to me that it is a matter for very serious consideration whether the remedy which is here proposed may not be worse than the disease, whether the injury that is going to come from the penalty that the South will suffer from having this loan made according to the terms of this amendment will not be greater than the injury she is suffering at the present time from any reduction in the price of cotton.

To put the matter in the form of figures, assuming that the present crop of cotton will be, for instance, 14,000,000 bales, and that the value of that cotton by the circumstances of the war has been reduced about 50 per cent, or, on the basis of normal valuation in the South of 12 cents, that it has been reduced 6 cents a pound, the reduction would amount to $30 a bale; $30 a bale on 14,000,000 bales of cotton would be $420,000,000.

It is now proposed that during the year 1915 no one in the South shall be allowed to raise more than one-half of the amount of cotton which he raised this year; or, to put it in another form, that no one plantation in the South shall be allowed to raise more than one-half of the quantity of cotton it raised this year, except under the penalty of paying what would amount to a prohibitive tax of 2 cents a pound. If, therefore, 14,000,000 bales of cotton is the normal size of the crop of this year, that would mean that the crop that could be raised next year would amount, in round numbers, to about 7,000,000 bales, and that 7,000,000 bales of cotton which the South might raise, if these conditions were not imposed upon it, would not be produced. The value of 7,000,000 bales of cotton at 12 cents a pound is $420,000,000. Therefore one of the penalties that the South would inevitably have to suffer from the operation of this amendment would be the diminution of the total revenue that would come from cotton to it next year by perhaps $420,000,000, or, in any case, a very large proportion of that amount. It seems to me that, as a practical matter, that view is one that ought to have very serious consideration before we undertake to go into such experimental legislation as is proposed to be indulged in by this amendment.

There is one other feature of the situation to which I should like for a moment to refer. There has been in times past a great deal of antagonism in the South to the operation of the present method of marketing cotton through cotton exchanges. It has been felt in the South that those cotton exchanges operated to reduce the value of the crop. There have been some people in the North who entertained that same view. There have been other people, both in the North and in the South, who doubted that that was the result of the cotton exchanges, and felt that, on the whole, their influence was of great benefit to the South in marketing its crop. I myself am one of those who have believed that the South has derived great benefit from the existence of the cotton exchanges. It has occurred to me that it would not be out of place for the people interested in cotton to consider, with reference to what is occurring now, whether or not their condition would not have been very much better if it had not been necessary to close the cotton exchanges, as well as to suffer the diminution in the demand for cotton that has arisen.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] day before yesterday, in discussing this situation, said that in some parts of the South to-day cotton was being sold as low as 3 and 4 cents a pound. He said that in Texas it had been impossible to get a bid upon it at all in some cases, and that it had been sold there in small quantities as low as 3 cents a pound, although it was being sold in other places as high as 6 cents a pound.

I myself believe very strongly that if it had been possible to keep the cotton exchanges of the country open, at the present time the force of the blow which has fallen on the South would be very much diminished. I know that there are at this moment a very considerable number of people who would be very glad to buy cotton if they could do it through the ordinary medium of the exchange, who would place their orders for cotton, both for actual use and for speculative purposes, in such a way as to make a market for it and a demand for it, and that the consequence of that would be a stability to the price of it that it has not at the present time.

I simply wanted to call that situation to the attention of people interested in cotton, that they might give it consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] speaks of this as a loan. We of the South come not to the Senate to ask for alms; we spurn them. We do not ask for any gift upon the part of the United States. What do we ask for? We ask simply that this great Government lend us its credit to take care of our own situation. That is all we are asking for.

I am amazed, Mr. President, to hear the utterances of some Senators, who seem to misunderstand the object of the pending amendment. What are we asking for? Are we asking to tax the people of North Dakota a cent? Not a cent. Do we ask to place a single burden upon any State of this Union except the South? No. We simply ask that we be allowed to bear our own burdens and ask you to lend us your credit for a term of three years. That is all there is to the proposition. Then we will take care of the situation; we will pay the bonds; we ourselves will submit to taxation. There is to be no burden imposed upon anybody in this country except the southern people themselves, and therefore I say we ask for nothing of the Senate except simple justice.

The first consideration, Mr. President, to which I desire to call your attention is the situation in the South. Are we overdrawing the picture of conditions in that great section? Are bankruptcy and desolation staring us in the face? Are we serious about this matter? Are we playing politics, as some Senators say? Mr. President, the Senators from the South who are here pleading for the distressed people of the South are as serious as if we stood in front of the cannon's mouth. It is a serious question.

We do not know what is going to happen in our section of the country, with 50,000,000 bales of cotton on hand that can not be sold at all. Some few bales are being sold at the rate of 5 and 6 cents a pound, but the cotton mills, I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island, do not know what to pay for the cotton crop; they do not know what it is going to be worth to-morrow, and so they are not buying it.

Will the bankers lend money on it? No. Why? I would not loan money on cotton myself if I were a banker. I would not, as trustee for the depositors of my bank, loan money on cotton to-day at 6 cents a pound, when to-morrow it might go down to 5 cents or to 4 cents.

We do not want money; we want a market. Give us your credit and we will make a market, and that is all we need. We are 9 great States of this Union. We have 39 sister States. If I were a brother of the Senator from Nebraska and should ask him to sign my note for $1,000, and I would give him the best security on earth, would he not sign my note? Would not my brother sign it when I asked him to do it? We are 9 sister States. In our trouble and distress, will not our 39 sisters come to us and lend us their credit?

Senators talk about precedents. I hope to God there never will be need to follow this precedent in the United States again. There never has been need heretofore to establish such a precedent and there never will be again.

The attorney general of North Carolina was in Washington a few days ago to make an argument before the Supreme Court of the United States, and he made a great argument. He has been all over my State; he is a conservative man, a great man. While here he gave an interview to the Washington Post from which I quote as follows:

> Wholesale bankruptcy for the South, with destitution, misery, and starvation to follow through the winter months, is faced by the cotton States if the Federal Government does not come to their rescue by the purchase of the surplus cotton, according to Attorney General T. W. Bickett, of North Carolina, who is at the Raleigh. Said Mr. Bickett:
> "* * * The South is unable to take care of itself. Every bank in the cotton belt in North Carolina has already strained itself to the point of violating the State and Federal banking laws in an effort to finance the cotton crop.
> "Wholesale bankruptcy will result if the cotton States don't get aid. There is not a man in the cotton States who will not be affected, because cotton is the source of our prosperity.
> "Almost half of our State raises no cotton, yet the situation is desperate with us, and the plight of the States farther South, where cotton is more widely grown, is horrible.
> "The South to day is naturally the most conservative section of the Union. The most thoughtful element of our people feel that the Government owes it to us in this emergency, which no business foresight could have anticipated, to come to our relief. They can't understand why the Government can spend millions in building the Panama Canal, millions in building a railroad through the ice fields of Alaska, and millions on the barbarians of the Philippine Islands, and not spend anything for the relief of a section that is a thousand times more valuable to this Nation than the Panama Canal, Alaska, and the Philippine Islands combined."

That is a fair picture, Mr. President, of the situation. I have a telegram from Georgia stating that the panic was not only coming, but that it is already there. People are being sold out under the hammer.

Mr. President, the banks of the South get their money from New York. They discount their paper in New York for the purpose of financing the crops in the South. The bankers lend the money to the merchants to supply the cotton planters, and the cotton planters supply the poor tenant farmers, and about 30 per cent of the cotton growers are the poor colored men of the South. Those men to-day can not sell their cotton. What is to become of them during the wintry months, or what is to become of the poor white tenant farmers?

I have been told that in a little town of 1,500 people there is a man who has borrowed from the banks $30,000, which is in excess of that which the bank is allowed to lend under the law, according to its capital and surplus. He can not get another dollar to buy cotton with; another firm in that town has loaned out $250,000 to the planters. They want to pay it back; they have the cotton; they worked for it and cared for it, but they can not sell their cotton to pay their creditor, and he must go to the wall. The situation in that little town will be duplicated in every cotton county in North Carolina and in all other Southern States.

Are we the only sufferers? You who sell us dry goods in New York, you who sell us automobiles in Michigan and Indiana, you who sell us our farm machinery, you from Missouri who sell us the mules with which to make the crops, are going to be sufferers; all the world will suffer. As Mr. McCara stated in a meeting of the London Chamber of Commerce a few days ago in London, the cotton question is not a sectional question, it is not a question for the Republic of America, but it is an international question as well, and he appealed to his people to send a delegation here to see if something could not be done for the cotton growers of the South.

Mr. President, what have we done for the West? Every year for some time past $9,000,000 has been appropriated to help you out on your public lands in connection with reclamation and irrigation projects. In the 10 years since I have been here we have appropriated $100,000,000 to help the people of the West. For this purpose we in the South have asked nothing except little appropriations for public buildings here or there or appropriations to clean out some of our streams. We have stood by you gentlemen of the West. We have not only helped to appropriate $9,000,000, but we have indorsed $30,000,000 of your reclamation bonds to aid in irrigation and reclamation work. Is not that a precedent? That was done not only to put water on the public lands, but to put water on the lands of private parties. Ought you not now to come to our relief?

Why, Mr. President, when the curtain went down on that great tragedy at Appomattox the southern soldier, with all lost but honor, wended his weary way along the country roads where the fields had been plowed by the cannon balls and his farm sowed down with bullets; wherever he went he found the fences down and the roofs caving in. Despair seemed to cloud his face when he reached home; he found his wife barefooted and his children in rags; yet, with that sublime courage that he had displayed in battle, he looked up, threw aside the old musket that had been his faithful companion for four long years, went into the field, took up the old rusty plow standing in the furrow, and began the work of State building. He threw aside that old sword that had clanked by his side for four years, and took up the old scythe, and began to cut down the briers. Again he was engaged in State building. Then came the sorrowful days of reconstruction. I have no criticism to make of them; I know it was war; but the suffering and the trials of those people through those terrible times were horrible. These people have succeeded under greatest trials and tribulations, and made these nine States as great as the greatest in the Union. Now that their fields blossom as the rose, will you permit this disaster to come upon them when you can avert it by loaning them your credit?

You, my friends, levied a tax upon our people, upon the little cotton which was raised, of $3 a bale. I will not criticize that, because it was done in time of war, but let me tell you a remarkable thing that happened, which I believe that great-hearted and good man, Abraham Lincoln, was responsible for. When those taxes were collected, the books of the Treasury down yonder show what? Did the tax go into the general fund of miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury? No. Upon the books of the Treasury Department to-day there is found there the amount that was collected from North Carolina, credited to her; there is found the amount collected from Georgia, credited to her; there is found the amount collected from every other Southern State, credited to them. Why was that done?

Talk about the constitutionality of that tax! I do not know, and I do not care, whether it was constitutional or not, so far as this argument is concerned; but I know that the great President had that money credited to the States, because he felt the time would come when the United States that had wrung blood money out of these people from the little cotton they were able to raise would return it to them.

Forty per cent of the population of my State had been killed or wounded in battle; but the Government went to work and collected millions of dollars from the tax on cotton, when unnumbered woes had come upon them and forced nearly $2,000,000 from the hard earnings of the people from my State. Whether it was constitutional or not, your fathers determined that that money should go back to the South, to the people to whom it belonged; and that is why, Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is not adopted, I intend to propose an amendment asking you to give that money back to us in this time of stress, because it is our money, and your fathers so considered it, or they would not have credited it on the books of the Treasury as they did. Will you give it back to us? Ought we not to have it?

Are we distressed? Why, Mr. President, our debts have got to be paid. On the 1st day of November and the 1st day of December all contracts for fertilizer, all contracts for supplies, are to be paid. Then, I tell you, my countrymen, if something is not done for the southern country in the near future, as the attorney general of North Carolina said, starvation will stare us in the face, and a million poor colored men, whom we have been trying to take care of, who have but little land, and who have been living on the supplies sold to them by the planters, who will have practically to give away their cotton, will be roaming up and down the South begging bread; and how can we give it to them if we are broken financially and in a condition of ruin and distress?

The Government gave $5,000,000 to relieve the conditions caused by an earthquake, but we do not ask alms. Help us to take care of our own situation. Do we ask for money? No. Do we ask that you issue any money to us? Not at all. We simply ask that you write upon a piece of paper a bond in the Government's name and give it to us, and let us take these 5,000,000 bales of cotton and save them and hold them until they may be sold, and you will then get your money back. Under these conditions the taxpayers of the South will bear the burden; and if the cotton does not pay back the amount of the bonds, we ask that you tax us for the purpose, so that the Government of the United States shall not lose a cent. We will pay it ourselves; no other States will be called upon to do so; we will bear our burdens. We ask you, our sister States, to help us to save ourselves from bankruptcy. Have we not done our duty to the Union? Have we not been loyal? Why, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement I desire to address myself to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], with reference to the cotton situation, which is now pending, I believe. It seems, for the time being, to have supplanted in interest here the bill to which it is proposed to attach it.

Mr. President, in the far northern and western State from which I come there is no political stress or business need of our people due to the cotton situation which could by any possibility influence my action in regard to this amendment; but there is in that State a constantly growing belief that through the development of business and the binding together of the Nation as one, where a great section of our country is in need of relief, that the Federal Government has it in its power to give, for which it can find relief under the Constitution, the aid of the Federal Government should be extended. Is it for the general welfare? That is a political consideration.

I have been satisfied from letters which I have seen, and which could not have been written with any hypocritical intent, from plain farmers and citizens of this great section of the country, that there exists there an emergency and a dire need of relief so extensive as to constitute a problem concerning the general welfare of the Nation. Nothing could better illustrate the changing nature of our relations as a Federal Union than the fact that those people who once looked with aversion and suspicion upon the powers of the Federal Government, and hesitated to enlarge the granted powers of the Constitution, are now turning to that very instrument which they feared might be the source of their oppression as though it were a city of safety; that they seek relief and protection, both political and economic, from the Government which, when conditions were so different, they dreaded as almost an alien power.

Whether or not we agree with the wisdom of that tendency, we can not disagree that it is a fact; and we can not escape the result of business and economic forces which bind us more closely, not only to each other, but to the entire world.

One of the acts of this administration which has been heralded as indicative of its interest in the people has been the depositing in the national banks of the country, by the Treasury Department, of large sums of money, professedly for the relief of the agricultural classes. Now, I assert, leaving out of the question the technical issues which have been raised in cases in courts from time to time, in connection with excise taxes, that what the Government can do indirectly it has the power to do directly. If it can relieve or pretend to relieve the necessities of our agricultural classes by depositing hundreds of millions of dollars in national banks, which ordinarily in greater part are hoarded there and loaned out at exorbitant rates of interest to the people for whose benefit the money was intended—it can, through some such measure as is proposed by this amendment, and I think that is one of the wisest features of it, deal directly with the people themselves, and insure by that action that the purpose and intent of the measure will be effected.

It is said that this is not a uniform tax. I think that question has been disposed of, so far as the tax feature of this bill is concerned. It is uniform, because it is applicable to the entire country. Under the same conditions the law is uniform. What is not uniform is the production of cotton. That is not uniform, but that does not invalidate the law in any way whatever. There is not a tax measure upon the statute books which operates to an equal degree and extent in every community in the United States. It applies where the conditions exist to which it is directed; and that is true of this measure. It is admitted by those who have attacked it upon that ground that it is not a direct tax.

It has been argued by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that because the tax is levied for a specific purpose we should question, as a legislative body, at least, whatever the courts might do, the right to levy it. I admit that we ought to determine here the wisdom of this measure, but I assert that as a matter of law we can not question the disposition by the Government of the money which it derives from a valid tax merely on the ground that it has a special purpose. Of course the Government would have no right to apply it to an unlawful use, but that is entirely aside from the proposition involved here.

Some of the southern Senators fear the encroaching power of the Federal Government, and yet the same Senators have voted here in recent weeks for a piece of legislation which is infinitely more comprehensive in its effect upon them and upon the business of the people of this country than this measure possibly could be, in that you have created a Trade Commission, appointed by the Federal administration, with power to supervise and inquire into the private business of every citizen of the land. That is far more paternalistic than this proposition to do a thing which the Governments of other countries, under a stress apparently no greater than that which affects us, have already taken steps to do.

England has come to the relief of the cotton growers of Egypt. I do not believe that any modern Government, if we can judge them from what we learn of their action in the issues which have been coming on so rapidly of late, would hesitate for a moment or question at all their power to do the thing which is proposed to be done here now for the relief of a section which constitutes practically one-fourth of the Nation in a matter which directly and indirectly involves all of our people.

There is not any governmental vacuum. It is asserted that the States can not take this action. Of course, they could if they amended their constitutions; but they are not taking it, and it is really not a State matter. It goes beyond the bounds of any State. It involves a number of States. In my judgment it is a national matter in its very nature, in its extent, in its importance, and because it can be relieved by the use of agencies which the Government has very frequently undertaken, as I said before, to use.

I rose only to express what I believe to be the feeling of the people of a section far removed from the immediate pressure which exists in the cotton-growing States, and to say that I shall vote for this amendment. As to the bill itself, which for the time being seems to be laid aside from the attention of the Senate, I shall take occasion when it is upon its passage to express some views.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to say that I do not expect at the next session, or any other session, to ask for any relief of this kind for the section of the Union from which I come, because I hope that that prosperity which has ever existed may continue to abide in their midst; but I believe I voice the sentiment of those people when I support the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

I am not disturbed by any qualm about the Constitution; for if it be true that our Government can not serve the moral and material welfare of those who constitute the association called Government, then our Government needs reforming; for, in my humble opinion, that is the aim and purpose of free government.

It has been said that similar acts have passed the Senate before. No measure like this has ever passed the Senate. The Senate heretofore has voluntarily, so far as its action can do that, opened the Treasury of this Republic to those who have been distressed. I helped to vote money to the sufferers from the volcano in the West Indies. I helped to vote money to the sufferers in Ohio and in California. No one ever questioned the right of our Government to reach out its hands to those who were afflicted. Those cases are not parallel to this case, because, without any reflection upon those cases, in this case all that these people ask is the loan of Federal credit. It is not a gratuity; it is not the granting of aid without prospect of return; but this case differs from all cases that have gone before in the fact that they only ask a loan of Federal credit and give abundant security for that loan with an assurance in the title itself that its benefits shall go to the producers of the cotton, and not into the hands of toll gatherers. To my mind the question of Federal aid involves in any case only a single question, and that is: Does the case, in the distress which it presents, warrant the use of the agencies of the Government for its relief? Whenever it does and wherever it does I would be false to my concept of government if I voted to withhold that relief.

In one section of this country for many years the sentiment has been growing and deepening that the purpose of government is to serve the moral and the material welfare of all the people. Owing to conditions that relate far back, there has been a more restricted view of that matter in another section. While I deplore the misfortune that has come upon the South, I can not but feel, in a sense, that if this misfortune shall deepen and broaden the feeling throughout the length and breadth of this Union that the sole purpose of the association called government is to advance the welfare, moral and material, of those who are thus associated, the disaster will not have been without some fruitage to the country as a whole.

No, Mr. President; there is no question here but that the disaster is sufficiently widespread to demand remedy at our hands. It has been my privilege to travel through the South, and I have often wondered at the remarkable recuperative powers of that section of the country. I have wondered how those people, with their property destroyed, with their homes in many cases destroyed, were able to advance and develop as they have. This great disaster has come upon them; and I want to congratulate the Senators who have had in charge the framing of this amendment that they have gone one step beyond where similar appeals have gone before. Instead of asking the gratuity of money from the Federal Treasury, instead of asking money without the purpose of return, they have limited their request to the mere loan of our Federal credit, and, out of the ordinary, they have provided that the benefits go direct to the real sufferer, the consumer, instead of benefiting speculators. It seems to me that it would not only be unjust, it would not only violate that theory of government which I personally so long have advocated, to withhold this help, but this case goes one step further than the particular section. This disaster can not go unchecked without its being visited upon the people of this Union from one end to the other. Upon that broad plane and upon that broad equation I believe it is our duty to extend this relief.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is with a feeling of satisfaction—if I may use that term in the face of a great disaster impending upon one section of this country—that I am permitted to stand here and contribute my feeble voice and my single vote for the advancement and adoption of this amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it is a matter of great pleasure to me to listen to the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] in the discussion of the pending amendment. There is a ring of patriotic sincerity in their tones which is very refreshing.

More than 50 years ago a difference occurred between the sections of this great country of ours. I was not old enough to take part in that unfortunate conflict, but I had a representative who gave four of the best years of his honorable life to it. Often when a child, sitting upon his knee by the fireside of our humble country home, I listened with hungry ears to his story of that conflict. The sad and sickening tragedies of the battle field, the camp scenes, and all the array and panoply of cruel warfare so impressed my youthful mind that in my imagination I heard and felt it all. I was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of antagonism created by that war. I did not understand the real question at issue. The differences had existed from the foundation of the Government to the day when the tragedy began. The issue could be settled only in the court of might. My father and his comrades presented their case to that dread tribunal with all the power inherent in them. They believed they had a right, and I still believe they had a constitutional right, to do what they did. They gave all, they suffered all; they were willing to die in defense of those rights; but when the Stars and Bars trailed in the dust of defeat on that fateful day at Appomattox and the court handed down its decision, my father and his comrades of the South accepted the arbitrament as irrevocable. From that day to this they and their sons have been ready, as they have demonstrated on more than one occasion, to shed their blood in defense of the Stars and Stripes. Thank God, to paraphrase the language of another, that—

> The war drum throbs no longer
> And the battle flags are furled
> In this reunited country,
> The greatest in the world.

Mr. President, I want to say that if this Government shall realize the hope, if it shall fulfill the dreams, of the great men and women who gave it being, it is going to take all the patriotism, all the intelligence, all the altruism of all of us to save it from the fate which has befallen every Government similar to this one whose skeletons mark the shores of time this afternoon.

There is no room for hate in the heart of any patriotic American. There is no time for bickerings and strife in the consideration of this great problem.

> New conditions teach new duties,
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still and onward
> Who would be abreast of truth.
> Lo, before us gleams the camp fire,
> We, ourselves, must pilgrims be,
> Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
> Through the desperate winter sea,
> Nor attempt the future's portals
> With the past's blood-rusted key.

What is the question at issue? The people of the South are experiencing a business depression brought about by international conditions. Four months ago the South was never so prosperous. Hope sprang exultant in every breast. Our people looked forward to better times this fall than they had enjoyed since 1861. The war came as a devastating cyclone from a cloudless sky, and the crop which they had spent eight months in producing fell from a price that would have brought profit, contentment, happiness, peace, and prosperity to every home to a price that means bankruptcy and want. They come now to the General Government, the only power beneath the stars that can give them relief.

All this talk about a pool being formed by the banks and putting money in the hands of the Reserve Board, and all that, to help the southern cotton grower is sounding brass. It is not going to help the man whose strong arm tickled mother earth and produced this crop. That man is not going to be given any relief It may give a few speculators, a few business men—and under our system now nobody is a business man unless he is living upon the product of somebody else's toil—coining into gold the sweat of some one else's brow—but it is not going to help the man who, bowed by the weight of taxation, leans upon his hoe and gazes upon the ground—the tragedy of injustice written in mysterious hieroglyphics in his face, and on his back the burden of the world. It is not going to give him any relief.

We come to the Federal Government—a Government that derives all its powers from the consent of the governed, a Government that derives all its wealth from the labor of man, a Government that derives all its mentality and all its morals from the individual citizen—we come in an entirely constitutional and regular way, and I want to say that I was in hopes that the constitutionality of this measure was without question, and ask that you give to us that which we, as a part of the Government, have a right to expect you will concede to us.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator leaves the subject of the direct benefit, I wish he would emphasize for the RECORD what is written in the bill, that these bonds can only be used to purchase the cotton of the producer himself.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was going to come to that.

Mr. CLAPP. All right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is why I prefaced what I was going to say by the statement that the pool being formed by the bankers is not going to help the man who produces the cotton. It is not going to put any clothes upon the backs of the little children who help their parents pick the cotton in the fall, whose little hands are chapped by the frost upon the cotton boll and whose dear little bodies are chilled by the surly blasts of winter. It is not going to give days of schooling and hours of recreation and books and papers, all so necessary for the proper development of those little ones upon whose shoulders soon are to rest all of the responsibilities of government and of home.

No, Senators; it is not going to relieve the people who toil and produce the wealth of this country, who maintain its commerce in time of peace and fight its battles in time of war; it is not going to help them, but it will be an assistance and a help to a lot of men who will make great fortunes out of the necessities of the people.

Now, the question is whether or not the aid shall be given by this Government, this Government whose flag we all revere, this Government whose flag should be an emblem of liberty, beneath whose sacred folds no man should wear industrial shackles, which should be an emblem of equal opportunity in this Government, founded upon the dignity of labor and the equality of Anglo-Saxon manhood. We come to the Federal Government and ask it to make the loan; not to donate anything, not as a matter of charity, God forbid, but do by us simple justice.

I want to say if an amendment were adopted taking away the tax, refusing the people of the South the right to reimburse and indemnify the General Government against any loss, I would vote against the bill. We are not mendicants. We are not asking you for anything that is going to put one dime's expense on the Federal Government or taxation upon anybody except the people who are sought to be benefited by this act.

What is the proposition? It simply authorizes the General Government to make a loan of its credit for $250,000,000. These bonds are to be used to purchase 5,000,000 bales of cotton to be put in warehouses, and that cotton is to be kept there until after the war is over and normal conditions are restored. That is the proposition in a nutshell.

I have no patience with this talk about destroying cotton. To be candid with you, I have no sympathy whatever with the proposition to limit the cotton crop by legislation. That is not a legitimate subject of congressional or State legislation, in my judgment. Nor would I come to Congress and ask help if the difficulties with which we are dealing in the South now were the outgrowth of economic errors and business mistakes on our part. But they are not. They are the result of conditions over which we had no more control than we have over the movement of the planets.

The bonds are a loan to the cotton producer. They are to be used to buy the cotton from the producer, not the speculator. The producer is to get the benefit of them. The substratum of society, the man who is usually most neglected in matters of legislation, is to get some of the advantages. The cotton is to be held until such time as normal conditions are restored and the chasm bridged.

After the cotton shall be sold, if there is a deficit, if there is an expense which has been attached to carrying out the plan here, the people of the South tax themselves to pay it.

Can the Government do that? Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt about it. Is it violative of the spirit or the genius of our institutions for the Federal Government to reclaim land by irrigation and sell it to the citizens on long time in small payments at a low rate of interest? I think not. We of the South have favored and supported measures of that character. Is it destructive or out of harmony with the general form of polity of our Government to build levees to protect land from inundation and to reclaim the overflowed lands and give men the opportunity to make a living that such reclamation brings? Nobody questions that now.

Is it a wise policy for the General Government to lend its credit to private individuals, to donate lands for the purpose of constructing transcontinental railroad lines and opening up the empire of the West to settlement, to dot the landscape with happy homes and fertile farms, the breeding place of patriots and the well spring of patriotism?

If we can give the people's land to build railroads in order to promote the public good, why can not we lend the people's bonds to the cotton growers of the South in order that general prosperity may be promoted? Is it proper under our form of government to penetrate the frozen wastes of Alaska in order that the mines stored with inexhaustible supplies of coal, silver, and gold may be used for the enrichment of the world and the promotion of the happiness and well-being of mankind? If the Government of the United States can do all of these things and more, I am sure it will be no stretch of authority to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. Mr. President, I realize that this amendment embodies principles and policies which are rather unique in the history of our Government. The conditions that confront us are unique—extraordinary. It is reported in the public prints that the President has said that the head and not the heart is to settle this problem. Mr. President, I deny that that is the proper way to settle it. There is work for both organs. The heart must blaze the way, and the head devise the means to solve it. I would rather trust the prompting of a loving heart, I would rather follow the lead of a trusting soul, than to be guided by the conclusions of cold-blooded, unsympathetic, dollar-loving intellectuality. This is a great Government of ours, and its strength is in "courageous men of purpose, great," rather than in material riches. The spirit of the Declaration of Independence puts the man above the dollar. The happy home of the laborer is preferable to the palace of the opulent idler. The man who serves his fellow man best pleases most his Maker and deserves most of his country. I trust the amendment may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to call attention to three amendments to the amendment, which are not material but with a view of perfecting the amendment as it was intended to be drawn.

First, upon line 23 of page 2, at the close of the line, after the word "cotton," that there may be no doubt about its meaning, we wish to add "of the crop of the year 1914." I felt that it meant that before. It was meant to mean the crop of 1914, but it has been suggested to me that perhaps some other construction might be placed upon it. So I ask to add "of the crop of the year 1914" after the word "cotton," at the end of line 23, on page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 23, at the end of the line, amend the amendment by adding after the word "cotton" and before the comma the words "of the crop of the year 1914."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 3, in line 8, after the word "middling" the word "upland" should be used, because the technical term is middling upland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the close of section 30, on page 6, line 9, lest there should be any doubt about the meaning of the section, I wish to add "and the appropriation made in section 31 of this act." Then there can be no doubt about the fact that the purpose of this tax is to return to the Government the appropriation made for the temporary conduct of the work of the board.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator repeat that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the close of line 9, page 6, add the words "and the appropriation made in section 31 of this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to amend the amendment by striking out certain sections.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the question be divided so that we can vote separately on section 26 and thereafter on sections 29 and 30. There is no reason why it should not be divided, because section 26 really provides for the reduction of the production of cotton, and section 29 and a portion of section 30 provide for a tax for reimbursing the Government for its expenses in carrying out the provisions of the act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the motion to strike out, referring to several sections, of course, there is no doubt about the divisibility of the motion. I shall not contest that. That demand is one of right.

Mr. President, before the motion is put I want to say only one word. There seems to be a notion in some minds that if the tax is stricken out it becomes a donation instead of a loan to be paid back to the Federal Government. That is not the case at all. The language on line 14 to the end of page 3, and on page 4 down to section 29, and the first part of section 30, on page 5, all provide for the repayment of the loan. The Government has the cotton as security, and it is permitted to sell it the first year whenever it shall get 11 cents a pound. There is not a man living who does not know that cotton is going to be more than 11 cents a pound after peace comes. The cotton itself is ample security.

I just wanted to say that before the vote was put.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have not spoken on this measure. Really I wanted to hear others speak. Especially did I want to hear them before I spoke myself.

That the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is constitutional I do not think can be questioned. I am clear that it is constitutional. If I thought it was not, I would not vote for it.

I acknowledge, Mr. President, that the amendment is not in accord with the principles heretofore declared and maintained by the leaders of the party to which I belong, but those principles have been departed from and no longer insisted upon by that party. They are history; they are not living, vital principles to-day. They were uttered by our fathers at a time and under circumstances very different from the circumstances that surround us now. New propositions confront us with which they were not called upon to deal.

This is, in my judgment, purely a question of policy. It seems to me that the question before the Senate is whether the emergency is sufficient to justify the action proposed by the amendment? We can not justify our support of it unless there is a real emergency calling for the legislation; that it is necessary to meet a disaster not only to a limited section of the country but one that carries disaster to an extensive section of the country.

Let us inquire what section is involved? What area? I mean immediately involved, because every section of this Union is involved either immediately or indirectly. But what section is involved immediately and directly? Sir, it reaches from the Atlantic Ocean to the Rio Grande. An area stretching 2,000 miles across this continent is brought directly under the influences of this situation. Twenty million people are directly involved; and how are they involved, Mr. President? In such sort as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] have described? No; they speak of industries in which only a part of the population are engaged and only a portion of them injuriously affected and only a limited area involved. Quite different is the cotton situation; there practically the whole people are engaged in its production and involved in its conservation. Situations described by Senators are more like the iron industry of Alabama, where only a few people, comparatively speaking, are involved. The coal-mining interests of my State might be affected, and yet comparatively few of the people of the State would be affected and only a limited area of the country would be immediately concerned. You might close the iron mines and furnaces and the coal mines of Alabama, and still Alabama would live and prosper. Those particular industries, of course, would suffer and those dependent upon them would suffer. Mr. President, every farm—I might say practically every farm—from the Rio Grande to the Atlantic Ocean grows cotton to some extent; and in that way every family, every neighborhood, every county, and every State are involved. I had occasion to see my country when the besom of war had swept over it, but it did not present conditions so disastrous to the people as the situation does now. Through those sections where the armies passed they left desolation behind them.

In other sections where confiscation was put into effect those sections were prostrated, but back in the country, far behind it all, was a thrifty, virile, strong, determined population ready to divide what they had with those who were in destitution. But in this unforeseen, unexpected calamity all sections of our country are stricken alike.

Mr. President, a worse catastrophe than that which now threatens us was never known before and probably never will be again. I do not want to be misunderstood; I do not want Senators to take a narrow view of the situation, because in doing that they would fail to appreciate its effect and might fail to apply a remedy that they otherwise would. The blow, of course, will first come with all of its force upon the poor white people and the poor negroes in the South. They will first feel the blow. When they fall it will be transferred to the local merchant and banker behind them; they will next stagger under the blow, and they will fall. This giant of destruction will make his next stride into the North and the East, where the South's indebtedness is carried, and will there deliver his blow.

I would remind Senators that this crop has been produced by a year's continuous labor; that but for the war in Europe it would be worth a billion dollars.

The people of the South borrowed probably half that sum. Does any Senator believe that they can bear that loss and bear it all at once. They owe that amount, and approximately half of it to other sections of the country, and this loss must eventually fall upon other sections of the Union unless the people can be rescued from this pending disaster. It will fall upon the farmers of the West, from whom they purchase the live stock, grain, flour, and meat with which they made the crops. The other portion will fall upon the East, to whom they are indebted for manufactured goods and for money borrowed. If the South can not get relief, other sections must stand their portion of the loss or wait a long time for its payment. Sooner or later they must face it.

Do not Senators think it is wiser to make this appropriation and relieve the situation now. Adopt this amendment, thereby force European spinners to commence exporting this cotton, turn the balance of trade in our favor, replenish the Treasury with gold from abroad, rather than by internal taxation levied as we are proposing in this bill? Had we not better do this than do as some of our friends suggest, wait until bankruptcy and starvation comes and then make appropriations to meet a situation even more desperate than now confronts us? Will the conditions be easier to handle if we wait until other sections have become involved in the ruin? I think not. We are asking now to give us the aid of the Government's credit, really the aid of its great arm, with which we may unite our efforts. Our cotton itself will furnish the credit if we had the power of organization and could apply it to the situation. What we need is the arm of the Government more than the aid of the Government.

We are told, however, that, if we do this, it will make a precedent—a dangerous precedent. I tell you, Senators, we need such a precedent for similar condition; we need it to make us broad American citizens, as we should be; we need a precedent of this kind to make us love one State as well as another, Alabama as well as Michigan; we need a precedent that will stretch our sympathies over the whole country and see it in its broad light. Give us the precedent; it will not. When a man talks about a precedent harming him in the future, it occurs to me that it is want of courage and want of nerve, for, if the precedent does not suit him, he can turn it down. Whenever one yields to a precedent that should not be applied, the fault is not with the precedent so much as it is with the man. When such a situation meets your section, as it has met mine, and you ask me for help, I am ready to set the precedent.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped with his gavel.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to read into the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement from the Treasury Department. I should like to have it read.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator can not now have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no power to extend the Senator's time. That is a question for the Senate under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WHITE. Then I ask to have the statement printed as a part of my remarks. It shows that the precedent has already been made and repeated by all political parties. But I wish to say that this Government has been engaged in this kind of business since 1810, when it appropriated money to take care of sufferers by an earthquake in Venezuela, and has continued ever since.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the statement referred to by the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 16, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been requested to call attention to the business details of this amendment. To comprehend it I must first mention that for the last 10 years middling lint upland cotton has averaged about 12 cents a pound, and for five years past it has averaged 12¾ cents a pound. It was selling 30 days before the war in Europe began, and just before it began, at 13½ cents a pound. This measure recognizes the fact that the changed conditions should affect the price. It provides for no money from the National Treasury. It provides for a short-time bond issue, due on or before three years from date, in small denominations, to be exchanged with the producer only of the cotton and distributed to the States, as far as practicable, according to the quantity of their production, for upland lint cotton of middling grade at a price of not over 10 cents a pound, accepting a fall of between 20 per cent from the average price of the product during the past 10 years and substantially more than that from the price of cotton at the time the war began.

It provides next year for a tax of 2 cents a pound to be levied on cotton where the grower produced more than one-half the quantity he produced this year. I do not apprehend that that will bring much revenue to the Treasury, although I believe it will be enough to carry the interest next year.

It provides that if in 1915 the mills should demand more cotton, the board, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Agriculture, may sell it. Of course if the war ended there would probably be an increased demand, and therefore in order that no corner may be produced in the crop the board is authorized to sell. The board is also authorized to sell in 1916.

For 1916 the amendment provides that a tax of half a cent a pound shall be levied on all cotton producers, measured on the quantity of cotton they produce. A normal crop of 14,000,000 bales will bring in 1916, through the tax, $37,000,000. Half a crop, of course, will bring a smaller sum, but will make it absolutely certain that the cotton held by the Government would sell at a handsome profit.

By July 1, 1917, the board is required to sell all of this cotton, and a tax is levied of 1 cent a pound on each of the producers for that year, to continue until every dollar that the Government loses, if it loses anything, including interest and all expenses, shall be returned. So that, Mr. President, this tax, which is placed as an excise tax upon the producer, is an absolute surety against any possible loss by the Government, while the situation is such, really, as to make it practically certain that no tax will ever be required.

Mr. President, what justifies this legislation? How is the general welfare involved? It is conceded that foreign mills will require during the coming year about 4,000,000 bales of cotton. Shall the cotton be sold at something like normal price, or shall it be sold for half the normal price and our country lose in consequence $150,000,000?

Mr. OVERMAN. In gold.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In gold. Shall the country as a whole save $150,000,000 on this foreign sale? Our bonds and our stocks are coming in from abroad. A gold pool has just been formed in New York City to care for part of them. The cotton crop will care for $150,000,000 more if this amendment be agreed to than it would if it be not agreed to.

The business of the merchants of Massachusetts and of New England generally is being injured by the loss of custom from States constituting one-fourth of the Union. Business all over the country is injured by it. This amendment, without costing the National Government a dollar, will restore conditions to something approximately normal. Already the southern section is debtor to the Eastern and Middle and some of the Western States, probably to the amount of $400,000,000, growing out of the production of the cotton crop. Shall the debt be promptly paid? This amendment, if adopted, will cause its payment, and it will continue normal conditions of trade between the other States of the Union and the 10 Southern States. Then, Mr. President, when we come to the South itself it will save millions and millions of people from bankruptcy.

It is the small farmer, white and black; it is the man who has but little, who has made his crop, as usual, in part on credit, who will find that his cotton can not settle his debts and that he must give up his team, his cattle, his hogs, his plows, and his wagons to settle his obligations. Shall we save them? Shall we care for the general welfare of our entire country, and do it, not by giving a dollar, not by taxing anybody a dollar, except the cotton producers, who are to be benefited by the measure? Shall we save them and relieve our entire country under a plan that, if anything is made by it, the Treasury gets it, and if anything is lost by it, the cotton producers pay it? Why not?

Senators talk about precedents. Has anybody questioned the constitutional right of the Government to use its credit in this way? Can anybody successfully do so? It has not been done before just in this way, but there never before has been such an exigency as the one which confronts us at the present time. But we have used the credit of the Government to help the banks by legislation passed by the present Congress. We have used the credit of the Government to build railroads and in numerous other ways, and in the use of the power of the Government, through its Treasury and its credit, to promote the general welfare this has been perhaps the most progressive Congress that ever sat. Shall the progress stop? Shall that line of conduct cease when the greatest opportunity for the greatest good, with the most absolute certainty of no loss, is presented to the Congress?

Mr. President, if we add this amendment, it goes to conference. It goes still to the House. They may be able to improve it. They may be able to perfect it. They may be able to modify it so that it will be better than it is as framed by those who propose it. That opportunity for additional consideration remains; but so far as we see it presents the only plan to save the Nation from a great loss in its international trade, to save the business of the other States of the Union in the collection of their debts and in the continuation of their commerce, and to save the individuals of the section affected who offer to carry the responsibility and the risk and to guard the balance of their fellow citizens against the possibility of loss.

I ask Senators to support the measure.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I shall vote in favor of the pending amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which, under the division of the question, is now the elimination of section 26 of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. The same section—26—while on its face proposing to levy a tax of 2 cents a pound on cotton raised in excess of one-half of what was raised by a planter during the present year, is intended by its authors, as we all know, to curtail the production of cotton next year by one-half, and that will be its effect if the provision becomes a law.

I am not at all concerned with the constitutionality of the section. I have considered that but slightly. Such consideration as I have given to it makes me think that it is constitutional. In the very able legal argument presented to-day by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on that question, I think he could have cited with great force a decision which he did not cite—McCray v. The United States (195 U. S., 27)—commonly known as the Oleomargarine case; and, in my judgment, the reasoning of the court there would go very far toward establishing the constitutionality of this tax.

As I have said, however, I have not entered into that phase of the question. If I were convinced that it was ever so constitutional I would vote against it, and I would do so for the reason that I am not willing by my vote to give the Federal Government the right to say what any farmer in my State or any other State of this Union shall grow on his property in the way of agricultural products, or how much of them he shall grow.

Of course we understand that the object the authors had in view is that with this amendment and this forced curtailment of production the price of cotton next year will keep up, whereas if a full crop is raised it necessarily can not keep up to a price commensurate with the cost of production. That may or may not be.

Whether it is so or not, I will not vote for a law that will allow the United States to say what farm products the people of the State of Louisiana shall raise on their farms. I am an advocate of curtailment of production. I have preached it in my State for the last six years, since the boll weevil struck us; and, while my feeble utterances have had little or nothing to do with it, as a matter of fact the cotton production—the planting and consequent production—has been curtailed there to the extent of nearly one-half already. In consequence of the diversification, the raising of food products, they are beginning to be better off than they were before the boll weevil came—a great many of them, at least.

I claim that the cotton farmers of Louisiana are just as intelligent as the cotton farmers in any other of their sister States of the South or any of their sister States of any section of this Union, but I do not claim that they are any more intelligent than they are. Now, if moral suasion and the application of reason has brought about that result in Louisiana, it certainly can or ought to bring it about elsewhere in the South.

I am told that Louisiana suffers from the ravages of the boll weevil and that they have not got it in so many other States. I answer to that that the present calamity is a far greater calamity than the boll weevil ever could be—at least it is for the time. Therefore they can apply their reasoning to the situation and themselves curtail the crop.

I am perfectly willing for the State of Louisiana to pass a law which will carry into effect the wishes of the author of this amendment, because I know that the State of Louisiana will not do it unless a majority of her citizens wish that it be done; but I am not willing that the Federal Government, without asking the consent of those States, shall say what they shall raise and what they shall not raise in the way of any agricultural product.

I have no objection to the remaining sections, which provide for a tax, because that is intended to reimburse the Government for what the Government expends in trying to relieve the disastrous situation which confronts the people of the South. Therefore it is proper; but that is abundantly provided for without this 2-cent tax in section 26. I will support those sections, and I will oppose this, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill that is pending before the Senate. I think it is absolutely unnecessary and uncalled for. I think that when we are taking $100,000,000 out of the pockets of the people in new and special taxes, it is simply to cover the results of unwise domestic policies and to take care of the unparalleled appropriations that we have made. The amendment, however, that has been proposed to take care of the situation affecting a large section of our country I favor. I believe that it is in fact a direct result of the war, and that this is an emergency proposition that we should take care of. The lack of diversification is unfortunate, but the immediate cause of this distress is the war and the loss of market it has taken from them.

I have always believed in a liberal construction of the Constitution of the United States. I believe that that instrument is so framed that the National Government can properly solve almost any problem that it is beyond the power of the States to take care of. I believe that with the expanding industries, changed conditions, new necessities, and greater problems that arise the fundamental principles of that great instrument may be applied so that those questions can be solved as they come up for the best interests of the people and the Government.

This great proposition affects 20,000,000 of the people of this great country—I do not say people of the South or southern people; I do not like to refer to them in that way. They are a part of the country. They are American citizens, just the same as we are. This great question that now affects 20,000,000 of our people directly, and indirectly the whole country, it seems to me, can be solved by the National Government, and by no other agency; and it seems to me that there is no question that can confront us of greater importance than the question of meeting the great emergency that confronts the country on account of this crisis.

Twenty millions of our people are threatened with poverty and ruin and bankruptcy and industrial disaster, and that affects all the balance of the seventy or eighty millions of our people in a most disastrous way. To say that this Government has not the power to meet that situation, it seems to me, is to confess that our Government is an absolute failure. It is a proposition that, in my judgment, we have the power under the Constitution to meet. Now, if we have the power to meet it, ought we to exercise that power?

There does not seem to be any question as to the condition that confronts our country, and that confronts millions of our people, and that confronts all of our people. If the statements made are correct, we are threatened with one of the greatest disasters that has ever come or can come to our people. Nobody contends that the condition does not exist as represented. Then it seems to me, if that condition does exist—and we must accept it as existing—we are derelict in our duty if we do not attempt to meet it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. KERN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Washington if he will vote for the pending measure in case this amendment should be adopted?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that that is the only thing that would induce me to vote for it. I am not so sure that I will vote for it even if this is adopted, so far as that is concerned; but I have always followed this rule in the Senate: I have voted for every amendment that I thought would improve any measure, regardless of whether I expected to vote for the measure on its final passage or not.

Mr. KERN. Does not the Senator know that he would vote against this bill even if this amendment were adopted?

Mr. JONES. I do not. I have not made up my mind upon that proposition; but I do know that I will vote against it without the adoption of this amendment, and that the adoption of this amendment is the only proposition that would induce me in any way to consider voting for it. I am in good faith when I say that I have not yet decided whether or not I will vote against it if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am confronted with this proposition: I believe we have ample power to pass this legislation. I believe the great emergency that has been described here exists. Therefore I feel it my duty to do whatever I can to meet that great emergency. We have spent 18 months legislating for big business; let us now do something for humanity, for the producers of one of the great staples of life, who are actually threatened with poverty, suffering, and distress, and the country with widespread industrial disaster.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], it seems to me, addresses itself to the consciences of Senators in a very striking manner. I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is the only feature of this bill which rises to the dignity of a war measure. The cotton situation at the present moment is undoubtedly in large part attributable to the European war. I find that the exports of cotton a year ago in the month of September amounted to 930 338 bales, while the exports of cotton for September just past amount to 125.778 bales. That is sufficient evidence to my mind of the fact that the European war has affected the export cotton market very detrimentally, although other causes enter into the situation.

I think if the proposition now pending in the Senate had to do solely with the rehabilitation of the demoralized cotton situation, it would have far better claims to support than when coupled with the proposition to raise $100,000,000 in revenue by special tax upon the vocations of the people. I have said many times during this discussion that I did not see a single meritorious feature in this deficiency revenue bill; that it was unnecessary, and that in my opinion it was the result of misjudgment and miscalculation upon the part of those who framed and are responsible for the changes in our customs laws. The day that revenue bill passed Congress the President of the United States said, at 9 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., when he signed the bill, that business men should not be disturbed by it; that he had chosen the hour of 9 o'clock and 10 minutes in the evening in order that all places of public business might have closed for the day, including San Francisco, and that at that hour it might not have a detrimental effect upon the American market place. He said in his message to the joint session of the two Houses a few weeks ago that the changes in our customs laws were not responsible for the deficit in revenue.

The author of the present tariff bill, Mr. UNDERWOOD, said, the day that bill was passed, that it would not unfavorably affect business in our country, and that it would not affect the revenues of the country harmfully. Mr. President, much as I regret to say it, it has done both, and we are now here to repair the national finances. While these striking figures on the exportation of cotton this September and September a year ago need no argument to disclose some of the causes which have operated against that particular industry, I want to say to my fellow Senators that the thing that has prevented the country from enjoying normal conditions in our industrial and commercial life is the overimportation of the products of other lands, made easy by free trade and the downward revision of the customs law.

Feeling as I do that this deficiency bill is unwise, unnecessary, unjust, and inequitable, that the country could have gotten along very well without it with reasonable economy and the ordinary sources of rehabilitation now in the Treasury, I must oppose it. If the President of the United States had had the courage of his late predecessor, Mr. Cleveland, he would sell the bonds now in the Treasury, and spread the responsibility for this deficiency in revenue of the Government upon the entire people, instead of choosing here and there a vocation sufficiently prosperous to be taxed again.

Mr. President, I can not listen to the eloquent appeals of southern Senators upon the other side of the Chamber with deaf ears. I know they are deeply moved in behalf of their people. I know that a great crisis impends. I know the intensity of their patriotism and their love of country, but this amendment comes as a rider to a very objectionable bill. If this proposition stood by itself alone, as has every other crisis which is cited as a precedent for this action, this side might well be moved to cast aside ordinary restraints and go to the relief of an affected and unfortunate section now in the very throes of business disaster.

But, Mr. President, this is an amendment to what I regard as a most unnecessary and atrocious proceeding. This is a makeshift, temporary and futile. This is an arbitrary exercise of the taxing power to make up revenue that could have been easily obtained by following the former practices of this Government for the better part of 100 years.

The suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] as to whether Senators upon this side of the Chamber who vote for this amendment are prepared to vote for the bill as amended raises a question of individual official conduct which I shall neither parry nor deny. I would seriously consider casting my vote for a carefully framed measure standing by itself and well calculated to meet this situation in the South, but I can not bring myself to the point where I can cast a vote for this amendment, thus keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope, and my judgment cries out against this bill. I had not intended to say anything about this amendment, but the situation is grave and all-absorbing. If we are to meet a war situation, this crisis should have had the support of the President of the United States. It is one of the contingencies resulting from the European war. I can not, however, bring myself to believe that even that crisis quite justifies me in supporting an amendment which, when finally perfected and in its entirety, I should feel called upon to oppose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] requests a division of the question. The first part of the amendment to the amendment the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. The first part of the amendment proposes to strike out section 26 of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. It begins on page 1, line 1, of the printed amendment and extends down to and includes line 14 on page 2.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the second division.

The SECRETARY. The second part of the proposed amendment proposes to strike out section 29 as printed in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. It is found on page 4, beginning on line 13, and extending down to and including line 6 on page 5 of the print.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The third division will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The third part of the amendment is on page 5, beginning on line 17, after the words "internal revenue," to strike out the remainder of line 17 and all down to and including line 9 on page 6.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I shall vote in favor of the amendment in view of what I consider to be a great emergency, although I consider that it is opposed to all governmental policies that have controlled in this country heretofore, and particularly to the principles of the party to which I have had the honor to belong since I cast my first vote, 46 years ago. Nothing but the extreme stress of the situation will justify me in voting for it, as I intend to do.

I wish to say, however, in this connection, that I deprecate some lines of argument that have been used on the floor by Senators during this debate. Very strong intimations have been thrown out to the effect that those southern Senators who are opposed to this amendment and would vote against it were lacking in patriotism or devotion to their respective States. I have not the slightest idea but that every southern Senator who has spoken against this amendment and will vote against it is just as patriotic and is just as devoted to the interests of his State and section as any of the Senators who are going to vote for it.

What I say in regard to them I say also in regard to Senators from other sections of the Union than those of the South. There is no reason to suppose that any southern Senator or any Senator from any other section is actuated in his vote by any other motive than that of conviction to duty. They either think the scheme is impracticable or, as some of them have said, unconstitutional, and some of them think that other agencies can be brought about to relieve the situation. But no matter what it is, I consider that they are just as honest and genuine in their opinion in the matter as I am in my view or as any Senator is from any State of the South who advocates the amendment.

Then, something has been said on the floor in the nature of a reflection, as it were, upon the administration, or some portion of it. That could only apply to the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States. It was said here that if this condition of affairs prevailed anywhere else except in the South the Government would be very prompt to relieve it.

Now, the intimation there is, in my judgment, entirely uncalled for. I have had no communication of any sort with the Secretary of the Treasury. We have seen some general newspaper statements to the effect that he thought other governmental agencies could be brought to bear that would relieve this situation without the necessity of taking this step, which he did not consider practicable nor proper. While he is not a resident of the South, he was born and reared there, and it is utter folly to suppose that he has not just as much sympathy with the people of the section in which he formerly lived as he has for the people of any other section of this Union. But he has his duty to perform and he has to administer his office in accordance with what he considers his duty to every other section of this country.

And so with the President. It has been said here on the floor that he is opposed to this amendment. It has even been said he would veto the bill if it was adopted, and it has also been said that if he did so he would do an improper thing.

I have had no more communication with the President of the United States in this matter than I have had with the Secretary of the Treasury, but I have just as much confidence in his feelings of sympathy for the South in which he was born and reared as I have in that of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe that if the President does think this is not a proper amendment to attach to the bill he does so from a sincere conviction of duty, because he is President not of the South alone but of the whole Nation; and if it should pass both Houses and he vetoed it I will still believe that he does it from his conception of duty and with regard to what he considers his constitutional oath of office.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the city at 5.30 to-day, and I ask that I may be excused from further attendance on the Senate during the present session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah being compelled to leave the city requests unanimous consent that he be excused from further attendance upon the present session of the Senate. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. Unanimous consent is given to the Senator from Utah to absent himself from the further sessions of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now offer an amendment which I had printed the other day to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, and ask that the amendment follow at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia the following words:

Provided further, That whenever the price of No. 1 northern wheat at the principal terminal markets in the United States shall fall below $1.10 per bushel, and whenever No. 1 barley shall fall below 65 cents per bushel, and whenever No. 1 white oats shall fall below 50 cents per bushel at such markets, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase all of said grains offered for sale at said prices, and to also purchase all other lower grades at such reduced prices as are generally recognized by commercial usage as the proper difference in value of such lower grades in the purchase and sale of grains.

It shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Treasury to store and hold said grain so purchased until it can be resold at a profit of 2 cents per bushel.

To prevent the value of such grains falling below the aforesaid prices, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall prohibit all importations of such grains. If by reason of scarcity of production the price of any of the said grains shall rise above the price authorized to be paid, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall then allow importations until such prices shall have reached the standard of the purchasing prices herein mentioned.

The sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of this provision.

To secure the necessary funds to carry out this purchasing project the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the United States, bearing 4 per cent interest, in such denominations as he may determine, and due five years from the date of issue; said bonds shall not be sold for less than par.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for a very few moments, and especially that of Senators on this side of the Chamber. I am offering this amendment not as an original proposition, as I explained this morning. I am offering it to perfect an amendment that is offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which amendment would be imperfect if it did not accord to the industries of other sections of the country the same benefits that he seeks for his own section of the country. I am asking those Senators on this side of the Chamber who are Republicans to support me in this amendment, not, as I say, as an original proposition, because I never could be induced to offer it as such, but simply as one to perfect another amendment to secure equality of treatment of all our sections.

I hope the original amendment will not be adopted. I should not vote for it even if my amendment was attached to it; I would hope that both of them would be defeated. All I insist upon is that my amendment perfects it in the line of equality and justice.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say one word about what I regard as a false issue on which this scheme is offered, and that is that you are asking the credit of the Government, that you are asking a loan from the Government. Every Senator here knows that this is not a loan, but you are asking the Government to buy cotton. The only element of a loan is that you will guarantee that the Government, by curtailing the product, will receive enough for the cotton that it buys to get its money back; and if it does not, you will tax yourself for the difference and the interest.

It is a simple sale and purchase; it is a simple bulling of the market to create and inflate the price; it is simply a corner upon the Government and a monopoly by the Government.

We are not misinformed with the claim here that we are making a loan; that it is only the credit of the Government that is asked. If you will change this amendment so as to allow the Government to loan you $250,000,000 or $500,000,000, taking as security a lien upon the cotton itself at a price that will secure the Government, I think I would be induced, much as I am against paternalism, to help you under those circumstances. If you will say that cotton is worth 10 cents a pound and you will ask the Government to make you a loan of 5 cents a pound upon all of the surplus cotton until the price increases, when the Government can sell that on which it has a lien, that would be a clear case of a loan where the credit of the Government might be of some benefit to you. I would join you in that, and I think there are other Senators here who would do the same; but you know that you are asking the Government to go into the matter of cornering the market, and in order to make itself safe to fix a limit upon the productivity of the southern section of this country. I am opposed to that, and I think that every Senator ought to be opposed to it.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], with tears in his voice, told us of the wonderful things that he had voted for our section of the country. I am not pleading for loyalty to the North; we only hear that on the other side of the Chamber. We have but one country and the loyalty ought to be all over it. The argument of loyalty ought not to be always indulged in in favor of some particular section. I want the same equal treatment of the North that we are giving to the South.

Mr. President, how did the Senator from North Carolina vote to help us out? I have here a list of 22 products upon which our people must depend for a living, every one of which can be produced in any quantity all over the face of the earth, and can be produced all around us in such quantities that by throwing them into our markets they can so depress our prices as to put us continually in a condition of semipoverty. I have shown you this forenoon that the cost of raising these cereals is to-day greater by 50 per cent than what we are to-day receiving for them if we hire the labor to produce them, and that we are only able to produce them at all and live because, unlike you, we put our own hands to the plow, we callous our own palms with the hoe and the fork, we do not depend upon hired labor to operate and run our farms, and in that way we are able to exist.

Mr. President, if you will just give us the same kind of treatment we will not ask for a loan. If there is anything the American people are entitled to, if there is anything that the Government of a Nation ought to do for its people, it is to assure to its people the first right in its own market. That is a duty which every government owes to its people. Give us that right, the first opportunity in our own market to the extent that we are able to supply that market at reasonable prices for our products, and we will never ask you for a loan, though hail and drought, though chinch bug and rust, and all of the other enemies of nature may from year to year inflict great damage upon us. On the other hand, we will go further with you. We will forgive what you have done against us in the matter of placing us in competition with the entire world, and we will vote you a loan to help you out in cotton until the European war is over and you can again sell at your normal prices.

You are not asking for a loan; you are asking us to buy your cotton; you are asking the Government to go into the business of a monopoly, instead of into the business of making a loan for your benefit. I am willing to vote for a loan, but I am not willing to do what you are asking us to do. What is that? It is that we take this mighty advance step into the field of paternalism, from which you know, or ought to know, that we never in the world can retreat; that you introduce an element into the finances and into the industries of this country that will be a precedent for every industry to call upon the Government to buy its product whenever that product will not pay the cost of producing it. If we in the country paid for our labor what is paid for labor in the cities, there would not be a single one of our farming industries that would pay the cost of raising the product.

I am opposed to this measure, because under a paternalistic government you destroy every incentive for exertion; you destroy the individuality and the responsibility of the citizen, upon which we must depend for all of our future progress and all of the hopes of the Nation; and you substitute for that the Government, as a father, leading its children, giving them employment, and determining what pay they shall receive in the several lines of their vocations. That is what it means. God knows we are traveling in that direction rapidly enough, and every man who does not believe in socialism, every man who does not believe in the principles of the Industrial Workers of the World, ought to set his face strongly against a proposition that leads directly toward that final result.

Mr. President, I think that for equality's sake my amendment ought to be added to the pending amendment, and then that the amendment as amended ought to be defeated. Then Senators ought to come before the country honestly for a loan by the Government to carry their product, if it be necessary, until after the conditions which have brought about the distress no longer exist.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire, while the bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, to give notice of the fact that I will, when it gets into the Senate, call for a vote upon the amendment to the amendment which I offered as in Committee of the Whole, and which was voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The pair is of such a character, however, that I feel at liberty to vote on a matter of this kind, which so directly and intimately affects the interests of my constituents, and I will underake to square it with him. I vote "yea."

Mr. PAGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM'S name was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If it becomes necessary to make a quorum, I will vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and I shall therefore take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). On the cotton amendments I am relieved from my general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], and am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], but I am advised that on this vote he would vote the same way that I intend to vote, and therefore I take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me inquire about that. Did not the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] transfer his pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and does not that leave the Senator from Pennsylvania at liberty to vote in his own right?

Mr. OLIVER. Owing to the fact that the Senator from Oregon and myself think alike on this proposition, I considered that I could vote without a transfer of the pair.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on this vote under the transfer of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], so that it is not necessary for the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to make any announcement.

Mr. O'GORMAN. To avoid any misunderstanding, Mr. President, I will state that I am advised that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], if present, would vote as I have voted on this question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all right.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL'S name was called). I desire to announce that if my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Were he present he would vote "nay." This is a matter which concerns so much my own people that I have been released from my pair, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and I will vote as I understand he would vote if he were present. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but I have been released from that pair on this vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and I ask that this announcement stand for the day. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr CHILTON]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and his pair with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. This announcement may stand for all votes to-day.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Borah	Lane	Sheppard	Vardaman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Shields	White

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I gave notice some days ago of an amendment to this bill proposing to return to the Southern States the cotton tax which was collected by the Federal Government during the Civil War.

I have taken from the books of the Treasury Department the amounts credited to each of those States. Evidently our fathers, who had the amounts charged up in that way, intended that this money should be paid back to the States from which it was collected. We have asked for it time and again, but I do not think the question has ever come to a vote.

If the Senate wants to help the South, which during all these years has come up through toil and trouble and tribulation and is now standing on the mountain top, having become great and prosperous, and is about to be driven back into poverty and distress, now is the time for the Senate to do something for those States in the way of simple justice. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the collections made from the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, or from any citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, companies, corporations, or associations, under act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and the amendatory acts thereto, for the purpose of aiding said States in assisting the producers of cotton in taking care of their surplus crop, which they are unable to sell by reason of the European war; to be used for the purchase of cotton by said States from the producers thereof, or making loans to the producers of said cotton under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Attorney General, and the governor of each of said States.

SEC. 2. That the following sum shall be paid to each State, the same being the amount found upon the books of the Treasury of the United States as the amount collected from each of said States under said act: To the State of Alabama, $10,388,072.10; Arkansas, $2,555,638.43; Florida, $918,944.98; Georgia, $11,897,094.98; Kentucky, $553,327.45; Louisiana, $10,098,501; Maryland, $51,349.52; Mississippi, $8,742,995.93; Missouri, $592,098.36; North Carolina, $1,959,704.87; South Carolina, $4,172,420.16; Tennessee, $7,873,460.71; Texas, $5,502,401.24; Virginia, $657,588.58.

SEC. 3. That said sum paid over to said States may be held for a term of five years subject to such disposition as Congress may hereafter provide.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $65,963,598.31 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That when loaned to the producers of cotton, the rate of interest on said sum shall not exceed 3 per cent per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to say a word upon this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the Senator from North Carolina before the Senator from Mississippi proceeds. In this enumeration of States, is it not a fact that some or, in fact, a number of the States are indebted in another account to the United States for money loaned in the early days of the Union?

Mr. OVERMAN. They may be, Mr. President. I can not tell how that is. Does the Senator say in the early days of the Union? No, sir; I think not—not that I know of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Prior to the time of the Civil War there were amounts of money loaned to several of the States, and they include a part of these sums. I have not the sums before me. My attention was called to the matter only a moment ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. This has nothing at all to do with that. I am informed by the Treasury that this is the amount collected by the Treasury itself by a tax upon cotton. There may be some account——

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, then, puts this upon the ground that it is a cotton indebtedness, without reference to what these same States may owe to the United States on other accounts?

Mr. OVERMAN. There may be other accounts; I do not know as to that. I know that the Treasury informs me that this is the amount of the tax collected on cotton from 1862 to 1868, at the time it was repealed, and credited to each State.

Mr. WARREN. I do not doubt that the Senator is correct about that; but I may say to the Senator that I am very certain that a large sum in total is due from the several States to the United States—some $30.000.000 and interest since 1836. I ask that a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, relating to items of unavailable funds reported in his general account, may be printed in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, relating to items of unavailable funds reported in his general account.

This communication sets forth the history of the deposits of public moneys amounting to $28,101,644.91 made with the States under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1836, and subsequent legislation taking the control of these funds from the Treasury Department.

It seems desirable and important that the Congress should enact legislation that will finally dispose of said deposits, and my recommendation is made for such action.

Respectfully,

CHARLES D. NORTON,
Acting Secretary.

HON. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 15, 1910.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration a statement relating to the deposits of public moneys, amounting to $28,101,644.91, made with the States under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1836, sections 13 and 14 of which are as follows:

"SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of $5,000,000, shall be deposited with such of the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their treasurers or other competent authorities to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurers or other competent authorities on receiving certificates of deposit therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid; which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations and pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the Public Treasury, beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid: Provided, That if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same shall be deposited with the other States agreeing to accept the same on deposits in the proportion aforesaid: And provided further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by the said Secretary to meet appropriations by law, the same shall be called for, in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding $10,000 from any one State in any one month without previous notice of 30 days for every additional sum of $20,000 which may at any time be required.

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said deposits shall be made with the said States in the following proportions and at the following times, to wit: One-quarter part on the 1st day of January, 1837, or as soon thereafter as may be; one-quarter part on the 1st day of April, one-quarter part on the 1st day of July, and one-quarter part on the 1st day of October, all in the same year."

The amounts of public moneys transferred to and deposited with the respective States under the foregoing provisions were as follows:

Maine	$955,838.25
New Hampshire	669,086.79
Vermont	669,086.79
Massachusetts	1,338,173.58
Connecticut	764,670.60
Rhode Island	382,335.30
New York	4,014,520.71
Pennsylvania	2,867,514.78
New Jersey	764,670.60
Ohio	2,007,260.34
Indiana	860,254.44
Illinois	$477,919.14
Michigan	286,751.49
Delaware	286,751.49
Maryland	955,838.25
Virginia	2,198,427.99
North Carolina	1,433,757.39
South Carolina	1,051,422.09
Georgia	1,051,422.09
Alabama	669,086.79
Louisiana	477,919.14
Mississippi	382,335.30
Tennessee	1,433,757.39
Kentucky	1,433,757.39
Missouri	382,335.30
Arkansas	286,751.49
Total	28,101,644.91

These deposits represent but three of the installments provided for in section 14 of the act of June 23, 1836; when the time arrived for making the transfer of the fourth installment, the necessities of the General Government were such that it became necessary to postpone such transfer which was done by Congress in the following enactment (act of Oct. 2, 1837):

"Be it enacted, etc., That the transfer of the fourth installment of deposits directed to be made with the States, under the thirteenth section of the act of June 23, 1836, be, and the same is hereby, postponed till the 1st day of January, 1839: Provided, That the three first installments under the said act shall remain on deposit with the States until otherwise directed by Congress."

You will observe that by this enactment the transfer to the States of the fourth installment was not only postponed, but also that control of the first three installments previously transferred to and deposited with the States was taken from the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the amounts thereof were to remain on deposit with the States until otherwise directed by the Congress.

The Congress in assuming direct control of these deposits by this enactment excepted them from movement under the laws governing public moneys deposited in the general account to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, viz:

"All public moneys paid into any depository shall be subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, drawn agreeably to appropriations made by law. (Sec. 3593, R. S.)

"The Secretary of the Treasury may, except as provided in the next section (3641), transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary of public moneys to the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Treasurer; and he may transfer moneys in the hands of one depositary to any other depositary, as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require. (Sec. 3640, R. S.)"

The Government has on several occasions since 1837 been very much in need of money to pay the ordinary expenses, yet the Congress has never reinvested the Secretary of the Treasury with authority to recall to the Treasury the public moneys deposited with the States. And now, 73 years after the last enactment relating to these deposits, it may be safely assumed that the Congress will not authorize the recall of these deposits to the Treasury. For many years they have been stated as "unavailable funds" in the annual reports of the Treasurer of the United States. They form a part of the general account, and are so stated quarterly by the Treasurer.

There is no way by which these deposits, anomalous in character, can be taken out of the general account under existing law; therefore I have to request that recommendation be made to the Congress, in such manner as you may deem advisable, for legislation that will relieve the Treasurer of further accountability for said deposits with the States.

Respectfully, yours,

LEE MCCLUNG,
Treasurer of the United States.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. OVERMAN. That may be. I do not know how that is. I want to say that this tax was originally levied in 1862, but, of course, the war being on at that time, only a small amount was collected in 1863, 1864, and 1865; but in 1866, 1867, and 1868 a large amount of revenue was collected under it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Where would this money go?

Mr. OVERMAN. This amendment provides that it shall go to the State.

Mr. JONES. It just goes to the State, not to the cotton producer?

Mr. OVERMAN. To be loaned to the people at 3 per cent, to take care of their own cotton. It provides that at the end of five years Congress may decide what shall be done with the money in the future.

Mr. JONES. Could your State government loan the money to the producers?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES. You have no prohibition against that?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President and Senators, I want to say a few words in behalf of this amendment.

The cotton tax of 1866 was a tax of questionable constitutionality. I went into that whole question yesterday, and I shall not repeat it now. I do not say now, and I did not say then, that it was unconstitutional, nor do I say that it was constitutional. The Supreme Court of the United States split evenly upon the question. Four justices of the Supreme Court held it constitutional and four justices of the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional. For twenty-odd years—longer than that, in fact; ever since the early seventies—the South's people here—Col. Oates, of Alabama; the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK, in the other House; and various others preceding them and some succeeding them—have been contending that that was an illegal and an unconstitutional tax, and ought to be returned to the Southern States; that it had been laid upon them as a matter of war indemnity and as a matter of punishment; and having been laid upon them in that way, independently of the question whether it was constitutional or unconstitutional, it ought now to be returned. That agitation has been going on for Heaven knows how many years, and one of the reasons why I wanted to strike all features of taxation out of this bill was because we could not stand upon two horses, riding in opposite directions, at the same time. We could not contend that we have a right to have that money back and at the same time contend that we could make a new cotton tax. So there was some slight difference between the two taxes——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I stated——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Please let me continue, unless the Senator wants to ask me a question, because I am right in the middle of a sentence.

Now, Senators, this was a tax of questionable constitutionality. Keep that in your minds. There is no question at all about the fact that it was laid upon our backs right after the war as a punishment, or as a part of a war indemnity to be paid by the conquered section, or the overcome section, to the victorious section. Now, then, with our cotton crop in this condition, why is it not right and fair to return to the cotton raisers of the South that which was taken away from them in a spirit of unfriendliness and hostility—I will not say hatred? Why not now, in the day of reconciliation and in the day of friendship, when the sons of the veterans who fought on each side have stood side by side in battle upon the land and upon our naval ships, give us at least this $68,000,000 back and let it go to the States in order that the States may buy cotton with it, and in that way hold up the price if they choose to do it?

I submit to you that that is a fair proposition. You ought never to have taken that money. You took it at a time when the South was a land of burned houses and blackened chimneys. You took it at a time when they had not started to work their fields. You took it at a time when every other burden was upon their backs. You took it at a time when the entire social fabric was in anarchy. I do not blame you so much for having done it, because at that time hatred existed between the two sections, and for every vial of wrath that you had stored up I confess that we had another. That time is past now, however. Why not vote us back this sixty-eight and a half million dollars?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. STONE. The bill we have before the Senate is an emergency bill, in a sense at least. We are attempting by this bill to raise a very little over $100,000,000 to meet the exigencies of a situation. If we appropriate substantially $70,000,000 of the $100,000,000 that we are endeavoring to raise by this bill, where will the money come from to pay this or to relieve the Treasury?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see the drift and I recognize the force of the interrogation and the objection contained in it, and it comes with perfect pertinency. I had thought about it beforehand, and had thought of amending the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina so that instead of appropriating so many dollars out of the Treasury for this purpose we should issue that amount of bonds and sell them. If the Senator from North Carolina will accept that amendment, I hope he will add it to the one he has offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can draw that amendment. I have no objection to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course it would not do to take sixty-eight and a half million dollars out of the Treasury now without adding sixty-eight and a half millions to the Treasury. The Senator from Missouri is right about that. I had thought of that beforehand and intended to come to it after awhile.

I will say to Senators that I do not want to delay them, nor have I the time under the 15-minute rule, but if they will go back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 27, 1908, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 24, 1908, they will find all the facts in connection with this tax and all the debate upon those two occasions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the fact that there is an appropriation here of $68,000,000 out of the Treasury. How is that provided for? Are we to have another emergency tax bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, there is no trouble about that. If we make this appropriation here, it will be settled in conference, and we can provide for a bond issue if you want to give it to us; or the President might even do as President Roosevelt did under the law that allows him to borrow that much money on his own certificates.

Mr. WARREN. My colleague [Mr. CLARK] calls my attention to the fact that this matter has already been discussed, so I have nothing further to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall offer the amendment which I referred to a moment ago. I move to strike out section 4 of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and to substitute for it the following language:

To secure the necessary funds to carry out the provisions of this amendment, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the United States bearing 3½ per cent interest, in such denominations as he may determine, due five years from the date of issue, said bonds not to be sold for less than par.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, as modified.

Mr. OVERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair. Under my arrangement with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I am advised that my pair would vote as I would vote on this proposition. Therefore I am relieved of the pair. I vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL], if present, would vote "yea" on this proposition.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before of my pair and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have not been released on this matter from my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and at present I can not vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and on that account I can not vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I desire again to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. For this reason I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bryan	Overman	Simmons	White
Fletcher	Perkins	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. OVERMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when we disposed a short time ago of the amendment that I offered to the tax bill,

I think we disposed adversely of a measure far more important than the tax bill itself. I now move to lay the tax bill upon the table.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not allow me to offer an amendment for the committee before he offers his motion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for that purpose only.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 10, line 18, of the bill, after the word "section," I move to insert the words "whose annual receipts from the sale of tobacco exceed $600."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will let this amendment be acted upon.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us have it reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 18, insert after the word "section" the words "whose annual receipts from the sale of tobacco exceed $600," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

Dealers in tobacco, not specially provided for in this section, whose annual receipts from the sale of tobacco exceed $600, shall each pay $4.80 for each store, shop, or other place in which tobacco in any form is sold.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that under the unanimous-consent agreement we are to vote upon the final disposition of this bill, and the motion of the Senator from Georgia to lay the bill upon the table is not a final disposition of it, and therefore is out of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is a final disposition of the bill unless the Senate subsequently takes some other action. No vote upon a bill, even if it were a vote upon the passage of the bill, would be final, so that the Senate could not take additional action up · it. If we have a final vote upon the bill as to whether it should pass or not pass, on Monday morning a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate could be had, so that no vote could be had in the final sense in one view to-night.

Now, if we lay this measure on the table, it ends the matter unless some subsequent motion is made. It is a final disposition of the matter unless the Senate resorts to subsequent action with reference to it. As I said before, if the Senate voted upon the passage or the rejection of the bill, it would be final only in case a subsequent motion was not made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I make the point of order that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Upon this point of order I simply want to call the attention of the Chair to one phrase in the agreement, which is that we will "proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill itself." Is a vote to table the bill a vote upon the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Until a few moments ago——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask if the motion made by the Senator from Georgia was not suspended pending an amendment which the Senator from North Carolina laid before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Was that agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Georgia withhold his motion long enough to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill, in order that it may be printed and be pending, subject to future disposition?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Until a few moments ago the Chair was of the opinion that there was one thing that had been definitely settled and to which there were no exceptions, and that was to the effect that a unanimous-consent agreement was a gentleman's agreement among the Senators of the United States, which they could keep or break, as they chose; that the Chair had nothing to do whatever with construing unanimous-consent agreements; and that the construction thereof rested with the body that made it. But the attention of the Chair has been called to the fact that all those decisions of former presiding officers arose at a time when there was no rule of the Senate with reference to unanimous-consent agreements, and when such an agreement was not recognized in any way as any part of the regular parliamentary proceedings of this body. Sometime last January, after some difficulty over a unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate adopted this rule:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present; and when a unanimous consent is thus given, the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

The effect of that rule is to make this present agreement an order of the Senate, which can only be set aside by unanimous consent after one day's notice and when the roll has been called to disclose a quorum.

The unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into here yesterday clearly provides that at 3 o'clock p. m. of this day the Senate should "proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill itself, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition."

Mr. Jefferson in his manual lays it down that a motion to order a bill to lie on the table is not a final disposition of the bill. It may be called up at any time when the Senate chooses to call it up. The rules of the Senate are in accordance with that, because they provide for certain motions to be received, taking precedence in their order—to adjourn, to adjourn to a day certain, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, to postpone indefinitely. If a motion to lay on the table were the same as to postpone indefinitely, then the Chair does not understand why the two were placed in the rule of the Senate.

It is true—and I think it is but fair to make the statement—that the House of Representatives has construed a motion to lay on the table as a final disposition of a bill. The Chair does not believe that the Senate of the United States had any idea yesterday, by entering upon this agreement, either to lay this bill on the table or to do anything else with it except to pass it or defeat it, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the same point of order on that as on the motion to lay on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to overrule that point of order. That is clearly a final disposition of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regret that the ruling of the Chair, from which I shall not appeal, precluded the motion to lay on the table. At the time on yesterday when this agreement was made I had it in mind myself that a motion to lay on the table would fall within that agreement. Otherwise I should not have made the motion to-night.

It is my own desire that this bill should not be killed, but that it should remain before the Senate and continue before the Senate for further consideration, and that before it passes it may be amended so as to carry some provision, at least, along the line of the amendment which I offered and which was acted upon a short time ago.

It is my purpose to vote for the motion to indefinitely postpone, although I shall subsequently exercise my right in the matter to bring the bill again before the attention of the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I trust that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] may see the wisdom of withdrawing their motion. For many days I wavered as to a position in which I had a feeling of love and a sense of duty. My sympathies and feelings were one with the generous South, and yet I any times I questioned the wisdom of my position. After having listened to the various arguments and, in fact, with the broad ideas that I feel I have as to the duty of the Government to the people, I voted with the South in this measure; that is, for the Smith amendment.

Now, Mr. President, it has been legitimately thrashed out and legitimately defeated. I think now to propose to kill this measure by a process of indefinite postponement or laying on the table would be unpatriotic and I say ungenerous.

Mr. President, while I have not agreed with every thought that has pervaded this assemblage, I believe that the war-tax measure, which is rather a misnomer, was presented for legitimate, honest, and honorable reasons. I believe the administration, after having thoroughly investigated, were convinced that this measure was necessary, and hence came this measure, regretful, as it is, for none of us, whatever may be our partisan affiliations, desire to advance a measure that shall look to the taxing of the people. But there was a legitimate and an honorable purpose upon the part of the administration, and that was that the honor and the integrity of our Government should be sustained and maintained.

This proposition came forth, whether a wise method, whether better than a flat issue of bonds for the purpose, I will not now discuss. This measure has been up for weeks, and the gentlemen who to-day propose a method of strangulation were participators with the rest of us in thrashing out a tax bill, which tax bill has been presented.

I say to some of our Republican friends on the other side, who have tried to bring in the tariff, it is they who told us that with our tariff we would be flooded with pauper goods, and now you are howling and finding fault because there are no pauper goods coming in upon which to assess the customs levy. You are in an unfortunate position. I think this is above and beyond partisanship. My sympathies were with and are with the South. But better than and beyond that, my sympathies are with the integrity and the desire that this Nation shall be placed in a position under which it may be able to satisfy the obligations that are upon us.

I say this seriously, earnestly, and kindly to my friends, and you are all my friends. As I said before, I love the sunny South. I love its people. I love its bloom; I love your grassy forests and your sun-kissed hills; I love your disposition; but in heaven's name, for the welfare of our Nation and for the credit of the great party that to-day dominates the Senate, I appeal to you upon the grounds of patriotism to cease and let us vote upon the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been trying to get the attention of the Chair. Is the question debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if there be those who would leave the Government of the United States with a deficient revenue because they could not put upon this emergency revenue bill the amendment or any amendment which they desire, the responsibility for the entire country will rest upon them. If there be Democrats who are willing, after Democratic committee and caucus action, in which many of them participated, now to join hands with the opposite party in order to make the party itself appear before the entire country as incompetent to govern and deficient in governing ability, the responsibility will rest upon them. None of it shall rest upon me for one.

But what are gentlemen trying to do? Do gentlemen really believe that the Democratic Party in the Congress of the United States is going to permit six or seven gentlemen to stultify the party and to starve the Treasury? Do they imagine that they can win anything by tactics like that? If so, I beg leave to warn them that they will not. However we shall proceed to manage it, we shall proceed to manage it, and after two or three or four weeks perhaps, now or hereafter, of holding up the entire country and attempting to starve the Treasury in order merely to assert their right to the passage of an amendment for which they voted and against which a majority of the Senate voted, after two or three weeks of standing before the entire people of the United States in that attitude, I prophesy they will be tired of it, fatigued with the effort, and regret that they ever made it.

It is no light thing for a man to undertake to reverse the fiscal policy of his own party; it is still less a light thing to undertake to leave the entire country with deficient revenues because we do not get what we want. This is not a world where everybody can get all that he wants; this is not a world where a Government can be carried on without party cohesion; and this is a party whose enemies in the past have accused it of absolute incapacity for cohesion, of a lack of competency to govern, and an inability to sink differences and drive on to the best goal attainable.

In my opinion, that man is mistaken who thinks that the constituencies even of the cotton States are going to justify going thus far, to this unusual extent, for the purpose even of accomplishing that which the southern cotton growers want. I do not see how Senators are going to reconcile this position either with their duty to the party or with their duty to the country. When I say that I am indulging in no censure, I am just simply expressing my opinion, which I have as full a right to express as they have to express theirs in doing what they are proposing to do.

What are you trying to do? To bulldoze, intimidate, and dare the Democratic Party to give to the Government revenue unless you tack on to the revenue measure something which we down South want. I do not believe the South can afford to take that position; I do not believe that my constituents or your constituents will justify it. I know the Democratic constituencies of the balance of the country will not. Moreover, I do not believe that the average American citizen will justify it.

The Republicans to-day may, for party advantage, throw a solid vote, with a few men upon this side of the Chamber, which may dislocate the fiscal arrangement of the Government, which may starve the Treasury, as I have twice before expressed it, and win a skirmish of that sort; but it is one of those skirmishes which will be at the cost of defeat in a battle, Senators, if you attempt it.

This country is to-day abiding in its confidence in this Democratic administration, and you know it as well as I. This country will justify any fair, right, and proper opposition to the Democratic administration upon the part of the Republicans, but it will not justify playing mere politics with a Delilah to cut off the Democratic Samson's hair.

I say this with the idea in my mind that perhaps this union may win for the time being, though I do not believe it is going to win for the time being, for I believe there is patriotism enough upon the Republican side of the Chamber to prevent it. We shall see.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I did not intend to make any further remarks, but I am not going to be misunderstood. I am not going to "have the things I have spoken twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools." I have no desire in the world to starve the Treasury; I want the United States Government to meet its obligations, but if you must lay the heavy hand of taxation upon people who are now groaning under the burden they already bear and who have been reduced to indigence and poverty, without any fault of their own, in order to maintain the Government and pay appropriations which were made when the Nation was enjoying an era of unparalleled prosperity, then I for one say to you that you can not do it with my consent.

You shall not, with my consent, take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned in order to maintain such prodigality of appropriations as were made by this Congress before the war in Europe occurred.

The large business enterprises of this country, suffering from the depression brought about by the European war, have cut down the salaries of their employees, they have reduced their disbursements, their outlay, and they are adjusting expenses to the new conditions. Congress could very readily do that. And it ought to do it.

We saw that the expenses of the Government were running too high, far beyond the ability of the people to pay, and we cut down $35,000,000 on the river and harbor bill. The President, in his message to Congress, advised the country that there were $75,000,000 in the banks that could be readily used to defray the expenses of the Government; but he would have those $75 000,000 remain in the banks for the banks to use for their own interest, while the people are to be plundered under the form of law. And you ask me to approve such an unjust policy with my vote! I will not do it.

I am willing to stay here through the entire fall, will stay until Christmas, or as long as may be necessary, in order to reduce the appropriations and bring them within the limits of the ability of the people to meet them; but I am not going to vote to put one dime additional tax upon the people in my section of the country when they are already in a state of want, reduced from independence to indigence. That is why I made this motion. I said to the Senate two or three weeks ago that I would not vote to levy additional taxes upon the people, and I am not going to do it. I wish with all my heart that the bill may be defeated, and I am going to vote against its passage. Now, if that is treason, make the most of it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I announced early in the consideration of this bill that I was not in favor of it, and I gave my reasons as being due to the fact that I thought it was the first duty of this body of Senators, some of whom are scolding one another now, to use every effort to lop off a lot of useless expenditures and to stop waste, but not to stop anything that was legitimate, nor deprive anyone of employment who was usefully employed. If we did this we would save more than $100,000,000. I object to having every telegraph message and every package that goes by express first affixed with a stamp at the hands of the sender when there were other means of raising revenue.

I do not, however, wish to see the bill laid on the table or indefinitely postponed. I am willing to see it fought out to a finish on its merits and to stay while it is being done. I should like to see the bill sent back to conference and have some of the items of taxation more equitably distributed among the people, or to have some relief afforded for those people who are suffering in the South, to have the farmers who raise cotton granted a legitimate and proper method of relief. That could be done, and could be done legitimately, by loaning them money at a low valuation, a reasonable valuation, on their cotton, taking the cotton as security, which can be done by the Government as speedily as a bank can do it. It would be as legitimate for the Government to do that as it is to do many other things which it does at great profit both to the Government and to the people.

I do not want to have a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill at this time agreed to. I do not believe in doing public business behind closed doors. I have had a little experience with that method and it was not agreeable to me, and I have reformed in that respect.

In other ways I purpose pursuing my sinful method, but will not attend caucuses and assist in doing the people's business behind locked doors. For these and other reasons, I am going to vote against the motion to indefinitely postpone consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am too fully aware of and too deeply impressed with the magnitude of the calamity which has fallen upon the people of my State for me to permit to pass any chance that may by possibility be utilized for their relief. When this particular bill passes from the jurisdiction of the Senate the last hope of anything like definite and adequate relief must be forever abandoned. I am not willing to be a party affirmatively to bringing about any such situation.

I am in favor of the Government paying its obligations; I am in favor of the Government discharging all of its obligations. I am not only in favor of the Government discharging its obligations to the promiscuous lot of liabilities that this additional $100,000,000 is to be raised to pay, but I am in favor of this Government and this administration having brought to their attention the fact that there is an obligation more binding than that, more comprehensive than that, and one that comes nearer to the humanity of the case than any of these other merely pecuniary obligations. Our situation has not been adequately considered, nor do I believe it is properly understood.

Both my colleague and myself are determined that we must represent the people of Arkansas as we understand their wants and as they would represent themselves if they were here and could concrete their voice into a single expression.

This is no mere parade occasion; it is a serious and momentous situation, and it affects the welfare of 20,000,000 people. The calamity has come upon them from a source that they did not create and that they can not control by the exercise of any of the powers subject to their local and individual control.

Every people in entering into a civilized government give up certain parts of their liberty in order to have the balance protected and conserved and administered, so that they may better perform the paramount obligation that rests on every civilized society to preserve and perfect itself. I do not believe that the matter of providing this additional revenue at this particular hour is the paramount feature of the demoralization in this country to-day. I believe that there is a great national duty that lies behind it all which has been either minimized, overlooked, or openly disregarded. I would appeal to the sober second thought of the Senate by having this bill indefinitely postponed, and thus allowing those whose business it is to prepare another to take it up; and being fully informed of the overwhelming responsibility that ought to rest upon them, in view of the conditions that obtain in the southern section of this country—and I will not confine it to the southern section of this country, for I largely patronize the idea that there ought not to be any northern or southern section of this country when a question of human rights is involved. It is a national question, an international question, and a most serious one; and I am willing, yea, I feel it to be my duty, to part company with many of my political brethren, because I know that I am impressed to a degree that they are not with the duty of this hour, which requires that this particular bill shall be put in a condition where we may consider the general question again and give to a people who are entitled to it the right which they earned when they entered into membership in this great Republic and assumed the duties and acquired all the right to enjoy the rights conferred by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] says that he will vote to indefinitely postpone this bill, and in the same connection declares that he is willing to stay here until those who are more particularly charged with formulating this character of legislation may prepare and present another bill to raise a hundred million dollars. I do not see, Mr. President, how that would benefit or promote the purpose which the Senator from Arkansas and those cooperating with him have uppermost in mind.

Judged by the vote this afternoon on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and from the expressions which have been made in the Chamber, it is clear that the proposition advanced by the Senator from Georgia and a handful of Democratic Senators cooperating with him does not meet with the favor of this body, and hence it follows that, even if this bill should be indefinitely postponed and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate should bring in another bill, who supposes that any such proposition as that embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia would be incorporated in that bill? If the Senate is in temper or mood to adopt such a proposition, why not adopt it now? Why was it defeated? But since it has been overwhelmingly defeated by the vote of the Senate, upon what ground do the Senators favoring that proposition predicate a hope that another bill might contain it?

Mr. President, there can be nothing to that. Of course, if these recalcitrants—I am using that word deliberately—these Democratic Senators who repudiate the action of the Democratic conference and undertake to defeat a measure they were pledged to support, shall succeed in their effort, I warn them that we will remain here until something is done, some necessary thing is accomplished, to relieve the abnormal and unexpected pressure upon the Treasury.

The Democrats of the Senate and of the House of Representatives would be recreant to their duty if they should adopt the motion made by the junior Senator from Mississippi and adjourn and go home, whipped by a small contingent of recalcitrants, and leave the Government stranded, thereby holding the Democratic Party up to contumely and contempt and leaving this Democratic administration in the closing hours of the session—a session whose achievements have been the triumph of Democracy—seriously and desperately embarrassed.

No, gentlemen! You can take your own course and vote as you will, but the overwhelming majority of your colleagues will stand true to their guns and not run away and leave the administration for which we are responsible in that humiliating predicament. Most of us will stand unflinching by our guns.

The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] says he is willing to stay here until Christmas, or even a little longer, if necessary, to reduce the appropriations to a point that will save the hundred million dollars needed by the Treasury to supplement the losses sustained in our customs receipts as a result of the European war. Mr. President, that is wholly impracticable. The appropriation bills have been passed already and we can not now reconsider them, and if we could reconsider them we could not reduce the appropriations $100,000,000 without creating embarrassment and endless confusion. The business of the Treasury has been adjusted to these appropriations, and it is utter folly to talk about revising and revamping all these appropriations during the present session of Congress. That is as impossible as it is impracticable.

Mr. President, I wish to present just one view touching the merits of this cotton proposition, for I do not intend to discuss it. In my State of Missouri we raise cotton. It is not one of the large cotton-producing States, but one of the smallest; and yet we produce something like 60,000 bales of cotton. It is perhaps the principal agricultural industry in three of the most fertile and important counties in southeast Missouri bordering on the Mississippi River. But, Mr. President, the people of my State also produce other things that are suffering from the distresses incident to the stupendous European struggle. Missouri is the largest producer of zinc and lead of any State or perhaps of any half dozen States all combined. During the last three or four weeks lead and zinc have depreciated very rapidly, and I am advised that the mines of my State are about to be closed because of this unexpected and sudden depression in prices. This word has been conveyed to me, and I am asked this question: "If you are going to help the cotton producers of the State, why not help the thousands of men who are engaged in mining zinc and lead by purchasing some considerable quantity of their production and hold it in store awaiting a more favorable market?" How am I going to answer them? Where is the line of division?

I do not intend to argue the merits of the question further than to call attention to this one situation, which in some form will present itself to many Senators here.

Mr. President, before I sit down I wish to say that this bill was passed by a Democratic House of Representatives as a party measure. It came to the Senate; and the Senate Finance Committee, after considering it, referred it to a Democratic conference in order that that committee might have behind it the undivided support of this side of the Chamber. I recall at least one Senator now present, the distinguished and able Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, the Senator should add that I was not at the Democratic caucus or conference, whichever it was, and also before any action was taken by the Finance Committee upon the bill I was compelled to leave on account of sickness.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have not said that the Senator from Georgia was present. I said he was a member of the Finance Committee. But what matters it whether he was present at the conference or not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] because I believed it violated every principle of sound national finance. When I cast that vote I had a sympathy which extended to the Southland as well as I would expect it to extend to the Northland were the situations reversed. It pained me to hear some of the Senators from the Southland refer to the vote upon this measure as if it were a sectional matter. Not so.

The situation has been, I believe, somewhat misrepresented by the Senators from the South when they presented this measure. You refer to it as a loan, but under the bill as it is drawn it is declared to be a purchase. More than that, you say to the Government, which is to purchase this cotton, "You shall not sell it for more than a year." To me that makes a precedent which would come back to plague this Government every year of our future national existence; and when you speak of this as being a sectional matter, I appeal to you, are you doing justice to the effort which has been put forth by the distinguished banker from St. Louis when he started out, with some other friends of the South, to raise $150,000,000? For whom? For the Southland.

In St. Louis they raised seven and a half million dollars. In the city of New York the bankers pledged $50,000,000, and the papers tell us that the other northern cities, such as Boston and Pittsburgh and Cleveland and Cincinnati and Chicago, were to raise $42,500,000, leaving only $50,000,000 to be raised by the South. The horn of plenty from the Northland will pour into your laps if it becomes necessary, but it can not be done by such measures as that which has been here proposed.

Now, on the other hand, let me offer this suggestion: When you are coming here to the National Capitol and asking the Congress to do a thing which never has been done in the history of our Nation, let me ask the Senators from each one of these States, what has your legislature done to relieve this situation? How many bonds have been issued? How many laws have been passed providing for warehouses under which warehouse receipts could be issued?

We have the promise of the Secretary of the Treasury that he will accept warehouse receipts as security for notes to be issued under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. Let me ask you further, when you are seeking to embarrass the administration by indefinitely postponing this bill, what have your bankers done to relieve your people?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. In a moment.

I have before me a copy of a letter written by a man who has a string of banks, a southern banker, to a system of southern banks, as I understand, in the heart of the cotton belt. What is the advice he gives to these banks? I do not know his name. I hope I shall never know it. If it ever were an honored name, he has dishonored it beyond recall. This is his advice, under date of September 24:

> DEAR SIR: Absolutely shut down on any more loans. Now is the time for collecting in, and not for putting out——

Mr. ASHURST. He is a Shylock.

Mr. POMERENE. To call him a Shylock is a libel on Shylock. [Continuing reading:]

> This until when money here shall become easier by reason of the selling of cotton, etc., and the consequent increase of deposits and paying of notes.
> This includes that do not under any circumstances whatever make any further loans to our customers to pay notes and accounts to the wholesalers. Let the latter do their own toting.

I shall not read more, but I ask that the entire letter be incorporated in my remarks. I hope, for the sake of the Southland, that that is the only banker of that kind you have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 27, 1914.

Secretary McAdoo gave out the following circular letter issued by the president of a State bank in the South to a chain of other State banks controlled by the writer of the circular. As the name of the bank was given to the Secretary in confidence he regrets to be unable to disclose it to the public. The circular speaks so plainly for itself that comment is unnecessary. Nothing could be more reprehensible than the conduct of this bank nor more clearly show how credits are being restricted and money being hoarded by some banks. A similar policy pursued by all the banks in the United States would produce untold suffering and general disaster.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1914.

DEAR SIR: (1) Absolutely shut down on any more loans. Now is the time for collecting in and not for putting out. This until when money here shall become easier by reason of the selling of cotton, etc., and the consequent increase of deposits and paying of notes.

This includes that do not under any circumstances whatever make any further loans to our customers to pay notes and accounts to the wholesalers. Let the latter do their own toting.

It also includes lending on cotton warehouse receipts of one form or another, and also the lending of small amounts to farmers and others in order to keep from selling cotton.

Stop this "lending" money in the shape of overdrafts. When you allow a party to overdraw and he then takes the pose that he can not pay, and can cover only by a note, he's "got" you. Cut out persistent overdrafts, not only with cotton accounts but with all.

(2) Collect up the notes falling due from now on, to the very best of your ability. Do your very utmost to get in every dollar that you can on your present loans. And particularly be most diligent to get in our money out of various and sundry notes that are of no advantage except the interest.

(3) Do not consent to renew any of your present notes, without special authority in each case from our office.

When you renew a note, you that very instant put off any further payments on the note until it shall again fall due.

(4) In any case that may seem extremely important, write or perhaps even telephone me. But always remember that you represent the bank and not the customer.

The situation is gradually (although slowly) improving. Some little cotton is moving, and I wish that it could be appreciated in this section that it is better to sell the cotton as it is baled and pay what is owing.

The present crop looks like it may be 17,000,000 bales, including linters. Even without the European war any such crop as seems likely would naturally drop cotton away down to 9 cents. To-day it is selling here nearly that high, notwithstanding the war.

We of course have the kindest feelings and wishes for our customers, but we can not undertake to assist in the holding of cotton. It is absolutely essential that this bank shall clean up all of its borrowed money. If we were to fail to do this, even just one year, it would seriously injure us in our future ability to take care of our customers.

As an instance of the course I wish you to pursue, please note the following copy of a letter received by me this morning and my reply thereto:

SEPTEMBER 23, 1914.

DEAR MR. ——— ———: I owe your bank a note for $150, secured by a rent note for $165. I think the money falls due some time in the next few weeks.

My renter has already gotten out four bales and has about five more in the field. He is very anxious to hold his cotton for a while. Could you carry over my note for a while to see if cotton will go up some, or do you prefer my meeting the amount I owe your bank when it falls due? If at all possible, it would be quite an accommodation to the old renter.

I hope you and the family keep well and that you will bring some of the children with you when you are next in ——— and come by and pay mother and myself a little visit.

Yours, truly,

——— ———.

Miss ——— ———.

DEAR MISS ——— ———: I have before me your letter of September 23, and regret that I can not consent to an extension or renewal of the note in order to allow your renter to hold his cotton for a while.

I do not need to tell you that it is always a pleasure to serve your mother and yourself in every way possible, but it is a very real and practical matter to require the payment of notes owing this bank as they fall due. If we were lending merely our own funds, doubtless we could readily do what you request. But in order to take care of our good customers, we have brought in considerable money from the cities which we are under absolute necessity to pay back this fall. Hence it is not in our power to do what you ask, either in your case or the many others that are arising.

The best way is for the farmers to sell enough of their cotton to pay what they owe and then to hold the balance for a rise, if they desire. But my impression is that with a 17,000,000-bale crop in sight there may not be any rise later on, but perhaps even a decline.

With best regards to Mrs. ——— ———,

Your friend,

——— ———,
President.

I inclose receipt form for this circular letter, which you will kindly sign and return so that I may know that you receive it.

Yours, truly,

——— ———, President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is his name signed to the letter?

Mr. POMERENE. No; his name is not signed to the letter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Why does not the Senator give his name?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know it. I read from a statement issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. He knows it.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that I stand ready to do anything that can be done to help the South in a proper way, and in a way that is not going to embarrass the entire Government. I do not feel that Senators are justified in saying that this is a sectional matter, when the people of the North are trying as they are now trying to relieve the South.

Certainly upon second thought those Senators who are now appealing to their Government for aid are not going to find it in their hearts to embarrass the entire Democratic administration and the entire Nation simply because their theory will not be accepted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I apprehend that unless the people of the States represented by the Senators who have made this motion are very different American citizens from those who live in other States it will not be very difficult to persuade them that a Government which has $1,109,000,000 of annual expenditures and is alleged to be confronted by a stress in the cutting off of its revenues, and is now under that stress, if it applies itself to it in sincerity can get along with a billion dollars for a year's expenditure until the stress is over. That is the situation which is presented by this matter.

We appropriated $1,109,000,000 and over, and you are attempting to raise $107,000,000 by this bill. All that is necessary to meet the emergency is to examine the appropriation bills of this Congress and consider the confused method of making the appropriations and the extravagances which appear on almost every page of them to convince the people of this country—in fact, you would have great difficulty in convincing them otherwise—that there is no need of the passage of an emergency revenue bill, but that, on the contrary, if there is a falling off in revenues it affords an unlooked for and magnificent opportunity to any political party which is in power to get away from the reign of profligate extravagance which has characterized not only our public but our private life during the last decade and more.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest to my colleague that even though we appropriated those large sums of money, there is much of it that does not have to be spent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true, as my colleague has said. Furthermore, there are matters which I have not now time, on account of the limitation of debate, to go into; there are resources of the Treasury which can be used to meet such appropriations as have already been made which can be reimbursed from the revenues of the Government which will be saved by eliminating the extravagances from future appropriations.

If there is an emergency upon whom should the burden fall? Upon the people who are affected by a bill which proposes to tax $1,500,000 upon the senders of telegraph and telephone messages. It not only does not provide that that increased expense of these necessary incidents to modern business and life shall be borne by the corporation which has a monopoly of that business, but on the contrary it specially provides that the corporation shall collect it from the users of telegrams and telephone messages. It levies upon every person who purchases a sleeping-car passage a tax and fails utterly to provide that the corporation whose net annual profits over and above all its expenses last year were over $12,000,000, nearly $13,000,000, shall not add it to the price of tickets; and in the case of the Bell Telephone Co., a corporation whose net annual profits over and above all its expenses were over $58,000,000. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] who sits by me says it is a small tax in the case of Pullman car tickets. That is the same argument which he has heard advanced in defense of every high-protective tariff laid which he has opposed in this body—that it was a very small tax. When you figure out the amount of it which would be borne by each individual it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a second. But when you consider that it is not only that tax but every other tax which is levied by this bill upon the everyday business of the masses of the people, it is not a small tax. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator wants to be accurate upon the bill. I think by reading it he will find that the tax on the Pullman Co. is to be paid by the company itself and not by the individuals.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is to be paid by the company itself; but if the Senator will note particularly what I said, there is nothing in conflict with the bill. It is provided in the case of telephone messages and telegrams that they shall be charged up to the originator of the message. It does provide that the company shall pay the Pullman car passage tax, but there is no provision in the bill that the company shall not charge that up in the price of the ticket; and that, of course, is exactly what they will do. It is a mere matter of collection.

So much for some of the items of this bill. I notice in some of the larger classes of appropriations that it costs us very nearly as much for a little Army as it costs Germany for an army ten times as great. Does the Senator from Mississippi imagine that it is impossible to make some saving in an appropriation like that? The army of Germany, consisting on a peace footing of 800,000 men, has an annual cost of $167,000,000, while the Army of the United States of 86,000 men has an annual cost, under our system of making appropriations, of $133,000,000. The navy of Great Britain, which has at least three times the efficient strength of the Navy of the United States, costs Great Britain less than twice the expense of our Navy. The army of France, which is seven times as great on a peace footing as the Army of the United States, costs that Republic $287,000,000, as against $133,000,000 for our little Army of 86,000 men.

I will not take time, Mr. President, to call attention further to the particular matters in which these savings might be effected. It is only necessary for anyone to go into the departments of our Government to observe what is perfectly obvious—that in many of them there are double the number of employees that are needed. It is difficult sometimes to get through the corridors and passages of a department building on account of the great number of messengers accumulated there.

You call this a war tax. You have written in large letters across the face of the print of the comparative bills "war-revenue measure." If it was a war-revenue measure the Government could form several regiments of soldiers from the idle employees in the departments. I have not any doubt in the world that in many of the departments there are not sufficient employees and that there are underpaid employees and overworked employees, but, as everyone knows, in others there is a superfluity of salaried officials of the Government, with practically no occupation; and instead of directing attention to that and remedying those conditions, we propose to meet it by a tax upon the industries and occupations of the people.

The friends of this bill have failed absolutely to consider that great class of our people who are best able to bear the burdens of an emergency measure of this kind—the very rich. We have adopted the policy of an income tax in our laws, and yet when it becomes necessary to pass a measure to raise extraordinary revenues no increase whatever is made in that tax.

I notice from the returns under the income tax there are 222 individuals who made returns of annual incomes of $250,000 and over, 91 who made returns of incomes of $500,000 and over, and 44 who made returns of $1,000,000 and over. I assert, Mr. President, that, without any injustice, without crippling them in any way whatever, without exploding any torpedo underneath their ship, but leaving them with full facility to live the kind of life they are accustomed to, the income tax upon incomes of $250,000 and $500,000 and $1,000,000 could be increased, and if there is any real emergency here, especially if there is a war emergency, it could be doubled over the rate provided in the law as it now exists.

If it comes to a choice between raising the revenue from those people and raising it from the people who use the telephone and telegraph and ride upon sleeping cars and make promissory notes and have fire insurance, and to whom those items of business are important in their general accounts, we should levy the burden upon those who are best able to bear it.

I want to call attention to a statement which indicates the manner in which these great incomes have been acquired—or the fortunes out of which they flow—indicating at least that they are not entitled to the special consideration and favor of the Government when it comes to looking around for a basis of revenue. In the report of the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the last few days I read as follows:

Stocks——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's 15 minutes have expired.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask leave to print the statement which I hold in my hand in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

TELLS OF MONEY ROCK ISLAND LOST—EXPERT TESTIFIES TO FALSE ENTRIES, HUGE SALARIES, AND STOCK WATERING.

Stock watered to five times its value, loss of $40,000,000 to the Rock Island Railroad in the purchase of the Frisco and the Alton roads, enormous salaries to officials, and false entries on the books to boost market values of stock—these were some of the things charged by F. C. Sharood, expert accountant employed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, who occupied the witness stand through the opening session of the commission's investigation of the Rock Island's affairs to-day.

Sharood testified how, immediately after the Reid-Moore syndicate obtained control of the Rock Island in 1902, holding companies were organized in Iowa and New Jersey, and $350,000,000 stocks and bonds were issued dependent entirely for earning power upon the $71,000,000 capital stock of the Rock Island.

He told how the financial wreck of the Rock Island was hastened through the purchase of the Frisco, through J. P. Morgan & Co., with a loss of $35,000,000, and how the road lost $6,000,000 more in the purchase of the Chicago & Alton road from the late E. H. Harriman, Jacob Schiff, and James Stillman.

$175,000 SALARY TO LOREE.

A contract between the Rock Island and L. F. Loree, of Baltimore, former president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, under which Loree was to resign the Baltimore & Ohio presidency and become chairman of the Rock Island executive board, at a salary of $175,000 a year for five years, was produced.

Sharood charged the company made false entries in its books to make a better financial showing, and thus create a better market for its stock. A peculiarity of the entry of the $35,000,000 loss in the Rock Island deal, he said, was that it appeared as an asset instead of under profit and loss.

J. P. Morgan & Co. received 1,997,000 shares of New Jersey holding company stock in return for their negotiating the purchase of the Frisco, Sharood testified. He also produced records to show payment of $100,000 to R. A. Jackson, vice president of the Rock Island, in addition to his salary of $25,000 a year. There was no accounting for this other than as "legal expenses."

"A great big woodpile without any nigger in it," was the way Robert Walker, counsel for the Rock Island, characterized the investigation before it opened early to-day.

F. C Sharood, an accountant in the employ of the commission, was the first witness to take the stand. Commissioner Clements, who is presiding over the investigation, emphasized to Gov. Folk, chief counsel, the desirability of expediting the hearing for the benefit of witnesses.

One of the first disclosures brought out was the disclosure of how the Rock Island stock had been increased to five times its original capitalization shortly after the Reid-Moore syndicate obtained control of the stock.

EMPLOYEES ARE DIRECTORS.

Sharood told of the formation of the Iowa and New Jersey holding companies, the directors of which were employees of the Rock Island Railroad. The total stocks and bonds issued by the two holding companies were $350,000,000. These had no earning power of their own, examination disclosed, but were dependent entirely for earnings upon the dividends of $71,000,000 from the stock of the Rock Island road.

"Then the stock of the Rock Island was watered five times over," said Folk.

"Yes sir," replied Sharood.

LOSS CHARGED AS ASSET.

The total loss in the Frisco deal, according to the Rock Island's own books, the witness said, was $35,000,000. A peculiarity about the entry in the Rock Island books, Sharood testified, was that the $35,000,000 loss was charged up as an asset, instead of appearing under profit and loss.

The Rock Island lost $6,370,000 in the purchase of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, Sharood estimated. The investment of the Rock Island in Alton was approximately $9,000,000. The witness said the late E. H. Harriman, Jacob Schiff, and James Stillman sold the Alton to the Rock Island.

Sharood testified that misleading entries were made on the Rock Island books, to create a better financial report for the road, and thus benefit the Rock Island stock in the market.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, should the motion to indefinitely postpone carry it means the death of the bill for the present session of Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator says no. I submit the inquiry to the Chair whether that would not be the effect under the rule in Jefferson's Manual when taken in connection with the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is now operating.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The practice which appertains in the United States Senate came down from Jefferson's Manual that a motion to indefinitely postpone takes the measure over the session of the Congress; that is, it is the same as an indefinite adjournment or dissolution of Parliament, or the continuance of a suit sine die is a discontinuance of the suit. All the motions have been passed upon; they are all dilatory in their character; but this is one motion that disposes of the question for the session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wanted to ask this further question in the same connection: Is it not true, however, that a motion to reconsider would at once be in order, and if that motion prevailed the matter would then remain before the body for continued consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a question which has never come within the knowledge of the Chair, and so far as the examination of authorities is concerned has never been raised. No motion that the Chair has been able to find has ever been entered for the reconsideration of a motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to discuss the parliamentary question. The diversion occurred only because my statement of the parliamentary effect of the adoption of the motion to indefinitely postpone was challenged. You may vote to indefinitely postpone the further consideration of this bill, but you can not postpone the menace of public credit and to private enterprise against which the measure is designed to guard the country. We are confronted with an unparalleled situation. The war broke over Europe like a shock of thunder from a clear sky. It soon involved nearly all of Europe. It has extended to Asia and to Africa and touches the country across our own northern border. Our foreign commerce was at once affected. With the burst of war came the sharp dislocation and decrease in our foreign trade, and the resulting decrease in Federal revenues from duties on imports. Even in normal times this country can not afford to have a doubt arise as to the solvency of the Federal revenue; much less can it tolerate doubt in the present unparalleled crisis. To throw a bond issue on a market already glutted with securities returned from Europe was a doubtful expedient. Senators say, "Call in the Treasury deposits." These deposits are now being used in the limited operations in cotton in the South and to move the crops in the West and North. To rely on these deposits would for a time meet the exigencies of the Treasury, but would not meet the imperative necessity in this extraordinary crisis of guarding the public credit against a breach between actual current receipts and disbursements. There is no possibility of the adoption by the Senate of the amendment proposed, even should postponement prevail. This must be manifest to the southern Senators who supported this amendment, from the vote recorded a few moments ago. Then, in the vain effort to force an acceptance of their proposed remedy for a regrettable condition, will they vote to postpone this measure and thus force a recall of funds now in use in this emergency in sustaining enterprise in their States in common with the enterprise of the rest of the country? The chief product of their States being two-thirds export, they are affected in exceptional degree by the war. But manufacturers in the North feel the blow in the way of canceled orders from the South growing out of the demoralization in the cotton market. Every section of the country feels the adverse influence of the war, though in varying degrees. At a time like this the Treasury balance is watched with an unusually acute interest. This is a time when to reenforce revenue and sustain the public credit is to serve every legitimate interest of the country. I counsel Senators from the South to put the temptation to postpone behind them. The hour of temptation is the hour of peril. To postpone would be to increase the embarrassments of other parts of the country and aggravate and intensify the situation with which they themselves have to contend.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I do not believe that Senators here understand the sentiment of this Republic, even that of the Southern States, if they believe that the approval of the country will meet such action as is here undertaken. A great world war is waging, and the President of our country has called upon the Congress of the United States to supply the Treasury of the Government with sufficient money to meet an emergency caused by that war. I do not believe that Senators from the cotton States can afford to say——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question just at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Does not the Senator know that no part of this $100,000,000 will be needed until about next April?

Mr. JAMES. I accept the information that I have from the Secretary of the Treasury and from the President of the United States, that this money is needed now. I have sufficient confidence in both of them to do that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It will not be needed until next April. The value of this cotton amounts to more than a billion dollars.

Mr. JAMES. That is not sufficient to meet this issue now. The President of the United States says that the Government needs this money, and needs it now, and I accept him at his word.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JAMES. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that about seventy-odd million dollars of this money is now on deposit in the various banks of the country serving the people, and that a goodly part of that is in the South? If we were not to levy these taxes, it would be necessary for us to draw that money out of the banks and out of circulation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that about $3,000,000 of that amount is in the South. I do not mean to say that that is not fair, but really there is not very much of it that was distributed upon the crop-moving plan.

Mr. POMERENE. I saw a statement the other day to the effect that about a third of it was in the South.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I understand that $11,000,000 of the regular deposit and $6,000,000 of the amount recently deposited has been deposited in the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have just been informed that I was mistaken.

Mr. JAMES. Nearly $18,000,000 have been deposited, so the Senator from Georgia has been mistaken to the extent of $15,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have just stated that I was informed that I was mistaken, and I did not want my statement, which was erroneous, to go into the RECORD uncorrected.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Georgia was mistaken, and I am glad he has corrected it. Here is the issue now: Shall Senators from the Southern States—and I am a southern man myself, and proud of it—shall we say to this whole Republic, "Unless you give to a particular product in our section aid from the Public Treasury in the shape of buying it, we shall vote against financing the business of this Republic and against making secure the Treasury of this Nation"? That is the question which presents itself to Senators here.

Mr. President, the tobacco situation in Kentucky is as bad as is the cotton situation in the South as to one particular grade of our tobacco—the dark tobacco, that is produced in the part of Kentucky where I live. That tobacco is an export tobacco wholly; it is sold to the Governments abroad, particularly to the régies, to those Governments that buy for the people. There are no buyers of the dark tobacco in Kentucky. That market is absolutely stagnated; but, Mr. President, would I be justified, because the Congress of the United States would not go down into Kentucky and finance that tobacco crop, in voting against supplying the Treasury of our Government with necessary funds to meet all its obligations?

We had this bill in a Democratic caucus. There was no legislation proposed in that caucus for the relief of the cotton grower. After we had considered the bill a motion was made—and I have the minutes in my hand—as follows:

EXTRACT FROM MINUTES OF DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS OF WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1914.

Senator KERN moved that the bill as reported to the Senate be regarded as a party measure. Unanimous.

A true copy of minutes of Democratic caucus on war-revenue bill (H. R. 18891).

WILLARD SAULSBURY, Secretary.

Senators upon this side of the Chamber, I appeal to you, are you treating your Democratic colleagues fairly? You agreed to this bill in caucus; you made it a party measure; you did not offer anything in that caucus as an amendment to this bill to relieve the cotton situation in the South. It is now a late day, I submit to you, to come here when this bill is in its last stages, and by uniting yourselves in bolting your party with the enemies upon the other side of the aisle to defeat the President of the United States in this legislation and to deny to the Treasury of the country the benefit of this money which our President says is necessary. I will not bolt my party's action. I propose to stand by the bill which we unanimously made a party measure.

What good will it do to defeat it? If you want legislation for the benefit of the cotton growers why do you not call the Democratic caucus, introduce your bill, and submit it to your Democratic colleagues? This is not the last day that cotton legislation can be considered. Here is a question that will affect the revenues of this whole Nation. The Democratic Party up to this time has shown itself to be capable of legislation. Our Republican friends used to twit us with the charge that we were only destructive; that we could not construct; that we could not build up; that when we got in power we always divided and we did nothing. Up to this time the administration of the Democratic Party has been the most brilliant of any administration in the history of this Nation. We have gone forth in a solid phalanx, presenting to the whole Nation Democratic principles as we advocated them, and we have written them into law, and at this time the country rings with applause of our action. Now, here upon this last measure, right in front of an election, you are to say what? That while the world is at war; that when the President of the United States called upon his party to make the Treasury of the Nation secure, we were so unpatriotic as to deny that unless we could tie onto it some benefit to a particular class of our people.

Mr. President, I do not believe that when the vote is taken there will be found a sufficient number upon this side who will join with our enemies upon the other side to defeat this legislation that will make the Treasury of this Nation secure. The security and safety of the United States Treasury rises above partisanship; it rises above mere party advantage; it rises above the demand of any locality. The call to us at this hour is the call of patriotism, and we should respond to it as becomes real Americans.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it is incomprehensible to me to find Senators upon this side of the Chamber ready to overturn the entire work of the last six weeks; I can not understand their feeling. They have made a gallant fight. Everybody recognizes the intense earnestness with which they have entered upon the discussion of this matter; but, Mr. President, this is an amendment which properly does not belong to a revenue bill. It is what we might term a rider upon the bill, because on a bill for raising revenue a provision for buying cotton does not naturally pertain to it. If a bill were pending in any State legislature for raising revenue and such an amendment as this were offered to it, I have no doubt it would be ruled out as being unconstitutional.

The Senators who have advocated the amendment are earnest in this matter, and there is not a man in this entire Senate upon either side of the Chamber who does not feel a very deep sympathy for them, but when they talk about destroying legislation, when they talk of pulling down the temple upon our heads, when they talk about absolutely putting the Government in a position almost of distress, it seems to me they are going too far.

Mr. President, the raising of revenue is necessary, not so much that it has to be paid out to-morrow, but, as the President has said, whenever you have a lack of revenue, when the receipts are running behind, it affects the fiscal policy of the Government. All the banks immediately take notice with relation to the matter as to whether we are to have tight times and whether or not panic conditions will exist. Mr. President, we know that when money is taken out of the Treasury faster than it comes in, it affects the principle of the redemption of our legal-tender notes in gold; and that is the time when raids are made upon the United States Treasury for the payment of gold. Whenever we have expenditures greater than our income, we are going to have that condition arise; and when we do have that condition, we immediately have a panicky situation, and a great panic may spread itself over this country.

Mr. President, it seems to me, no matter what one believes with relation to this amendment, no matter how deeply he may feel upon it, he ought not to feel that he should defeat legislation which the people think, and the President and the Cabinet think, is essential for the proper administration of the Government. In view of these facts I hope that Senators who have so earnestly advocated the measure will not carry their opposition to the extreme of voting against the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on the last few votes which have been taken I voted with a great deal of pleasure with my southern brethren; I often vote with them; in fact, I always vote with them when I can see my way clear to do so, and I nearly always see my way clear to do so. I could vote with them on those amendments, because to do so, in my opinion, was not in any wise inconsistent with Democracy, or with principle, or with the general welfare of the entire country, or with my duty to the entire country.

I recognize the gravity of the appalling calamity that is impending over the South. I sympathize with them to the extent of my heart, but when it comes to putting the welfare and desire of one particular section of the country above the general welfare of the entire country, I must part with them. I am interested in the welfare of every section of the country—the South, the West, the North, and the East—but I must put the general welfare of the Nation as a whole above the welfare of any particular section. I feel that my duty to the entire country is higher and stronger than my duty to any particular section. The welfare of the entire country is higher and more important than the welfare of any particular section, and I believe that the welfare of the entire country and the necessities of the situation demand the passage of this bill. The President of the United States has come here in person and told us so, and I accept his word for it.

The national honor and integrity must be preserved; the country must meet its national obligations. I believe the good people of the South will find some way out of their troubles. God knows they have had troubles before, and they have always found some way out of them. Some of us are willing to help them out in any way in our power, and there is time yet in which a way may be found to do so; but I do not believe that their desire for the particular benefit to their section of the country ought to interfere with our duty to the welfare and well-being of the entire country. For that reason I shall vote against the motion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for just one short moment.

I resent the suggestion, the imputation, or the intimation that I made this motion because of a failure on the part of the Senate to extend a favor to the South. I should despise myself if I were ever inspired by such a spirit or impelled by such a base motive. Before the Smith amendment was proposed, I said upon the floor of the Senate that I would not vote to increase the taxes upon the people of the United States. I suggested that there should be a paring off or cutting down of salaries and appropriations, which I think could be done without inconveniencing or impairing in the least the public service. In doing it the men in the employment of the Government would only share in the inconveniences which the depression in business throughout the entire country is forcing the laborers and the wealth producers of this country to suffer. You can cut down the appropriations so as to render impossible the $105,000,000 deficit. No; I am not doing this in a spirit of pique; I am not doing it because the favor was not extended to the South at all. I am doing it in the performance of what I believe to be my duty to my constituents; and it is of no greater concern to me that the Government should be a little bit embarrassed to meet its obligations than that the laboring people of this Republic should be crushed and further humiliated by debt and want, Mr. President. That is why I made the motion.

I do not expect to vote for the bill, and it was known in the caucus that I did not expect to vote for it. I want to say further, with reference to that, that every caucus I have gone into since I came to the Senate I was told was a conference, and that we were there for an exchange of ideas, and not to bind or tie up anybody. My allegiance first is to the people of Mississippi and the United States; and I am going to be faithful to that trust as God gives me the light and the ability to see it. I am not taking orders or doing the bidding of any man. I think I know my rights and understand my duty, and I shall maintain them regardless of caucus action or what other men may think or say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] and to say that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). Announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have been relieved from my pair only on the cotton amendments. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am advised that if he were here he would vote "yea" on this motion. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." Under the circumstances I withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. RANSDELL'S name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is paired with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call with reference to my pair, and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I have not been able to secure a transfer, and therefore shall be compelled to withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not hear the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] make an announcement. My colleague [Mr. LODGE] has a general pair with him. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. If the Senator from West Virginia were here and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], owing to illness.

Mr. STONE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent. I make that announcement for the entire day.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] and, further, to announce that he is paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 32, as follows:

So the motion to postpone indefinitely was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I sought to obtain the floor just before the call of the roll began because I wished to say that personally I was in favor of the passage of this bill. I think it is wise and necessary legislation. My purpose in voting to postpone indefinitely was not with a view of killing the bill, having stated, and intending again to state, that if the motion prevailed I intended subsequently to move a reconsideration.

I desire to see the bill passed. I think it is necessary to furnish money for the use of the Government, in view of the appropriations that have already been made. My desire was, we having made an agreement for a vote to-night that would dispose of the bill, after having joined in that vote, to move a reconsideration which might keep the bill before the Senate for further consideration in the hope that before it finally passed we might add to it some feature by way of amendment to relieve a situation with reference to the cotton situation, which I consider vastly more important than this tax measure. Having cast my vote for indefinite postponement for that reason, I shall now cast my vote for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after line 22 on page 33, down to and including line 18 on page 36; also, all after line 2 on page 39, down to and including line 13 on page 42, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

There shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the net income of every individual an income tax, in addition to that already provided by law, of 5 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000; and 8 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000; and 43 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate to discuss this amendment at any length. I desire very briefly to say that it proposes to substitute the income tax stated in the amendment for the taxes upon promissory notes, money orders, express receipts, freight receipts, telephone messages, telegraph messages, indemnifying bonds, marine, inland, fire, casualty, fidelity, and guaranty insurance, passage tickets, powers of attorney, protests, sleeping-car berths, proprietary medicines, cosmetics, and chewing gum.

The bill as estimated by the committee proposes to raise $4,500,000 of revenue upon promissory notes. It proposes to raise $1,000,000 upon express receipts, $700,000 upon freight receipts, $50,000 upon telephone messages, $1,000,000 upon telegraph messages, $400,000 upon indemnifying bonds, $3,500,000 upon insurance, $100,000 upon passage tickets, $125,000 upon sleeping-car fares, $4,000,000 upon perfumery, and $3,000,000 upon chewing gum—a total of $12,065,000.

As nearly as can be ascertained from the reports of the collector of internal revenue, I estimate that the increased income tax will amount to approximately the taxes which are proposed to be stricken out of the bill. The amendment does not affect any income lower than $250,000 annually. It proposes to place a tax upon the excess of incomes from that amount up to $500,000 of 5 per cent in addition to that which is already provided by law, and upon incomes from $500,000 to a million dollars, upon the excess over $500,000 only, an increase of 8 per cent over what is now allowed by law, and upon the excess income over and above $1,000,000 annually it proposes to levy a tax, in this so-called war revenue measure, of 43 per cent.

I do not regard any of those rates as excessive. I regard them as falling upon those people who are best able to pay them; and, on the other hand, I think the taxes proposed to be stricken out of the bill are levied upon the people who are least able to pay them.

Mr. President, while this is called a war-revenue measure, so far as conditions flowing from the war affect our people as compared with the people who are actually at war—take England, for instance—there are burdens already upon the people of this country, which is not at war at all; burdens due to conditions which are largely independent of the war, not caused by the war, which existed before the war began, greater than those borne by the people of a nation which is engaged in a war for its very existence, so far as the prices they have to pay for the expenses of supporting themselves and their families are concerned. Bread and meat and sugar and many other of the necessaries of life are cheaper in England to-day than they are in Washington City; and yet it is proposed by these provisions of this bill, in addition to the difficulties already experienced by our people in the struggle for existence, to tax them to the extent of over $12,000,000. I move, by this amendment, to strike out that tax and to insert in place of it a tax upon those who are very rich.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Had not the Chair already recognized me to talk on this question, and can I be taken off the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had not recognized the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair was looking at me, and I supposed nobody else was trying to get the floor and the Chair had started to recognize me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from North Carolina, and was looking at the Senator from Nebraska to see whether or not the Senator from North Carolina would yield to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum. You will not make anything by that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Johnson	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Borah	Jones	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Kern	Page	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Lane	Perkins	Sterling

Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Shields	West
Hitchcock	Myers	Shively	White
Hughes	Nelson	Simmons	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has moved to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and, in his absence, withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I transfer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as before and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and on that account I shall have to withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. JOHNSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to announce my pair and the transfer of the pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], so I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I desire to withdraw my vote. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is absent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "yea." I wish to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 16—as follows:

YEAS—36.

Ashurst	Kern	Saulsbury	Thomas
Bankhead	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Thompson

So Mr. POINDEXTER'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have a committee amendment to offer. Upon page 39 I move to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted, beginning with the word "except," in line 21, and ending with the word "profit," in line 25.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer the amendment which I have sent to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, print of October 8, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words, within the parentheses, "except life, marine, inland, fire, personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit," and in lieu insert:

Except life, accident, personal, and health insurance, and insurance described and taxed or exempted in the preceding paragraph and excepting also workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I was trying to get recognition when the Senator from Maine moved to reconsider. I want to be heard on the proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not reconsidered. The Chair was about to put the motion to reconsider when the Chair noticed that the Senator from Nebraska rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the way the Secretary was going on the Chair had declared the motion carried. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine about this proposition. What is the particular change?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think it makes any change. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, except that it makes clearer what the exceptions are.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me inquire of the Senator on what page?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is on page 40 of the print.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That has been adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator wants to reconsider it?

Mr. JOHNSON. I moved to reconsider and to substitute the amendment which I sent to the desk in place of it as a committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator what particular change is made in the amendment he proposes to offer.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to make it plain that we except all the insurance policies described in the preceding paragraph and to make it plain by substituting the words "and insurance described and taxed or exempted in the preceding paragraph." All those bear a tax of 1 cent, while the policies described in the second paragraph bear a tax of one-half a cent on each dollar.

Mr. NORRIS. What does the Senator mean by the second paragraph?

Mr. JOHNSON. The paragraph in which this amendment appears.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the amendment printed?

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment has been sent to the desk.

Mr. NORRIS. As I have the bill here, the committee amendment consists in striking out of the text of the bill, beginning in line 20, on page 40, and running down and including line 10, on page 41. Is that the committee amendment the Senator wants to reconsider?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator has not the right print. It is on page 39.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair make a statement. There is no motion to reconsider here. No amendment to the bill has been agreed to at the particular place the Senator from Maine is now talking about.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Chair will pardon me, I think there was an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I am so informed by the Secretary, and it is simply proposed by the Senator from Maine to amend the text of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator's motion, it is to reconsider.

Mr. JOHNSON. To reconsider and substitute the amendment which I have sent to the desk, which only makes it clearer. If the Senator will listen to the amendment, he will see that it makes it a little clearer. I ask the Secretary to read it again.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it would clear the situation a little if it were understood that the Senator from Maine has one print of the bill and the Secretary another. The Senator from Maine has the late print of the bill, and not the one upon which we are acting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The desk is always obliged to act upon the original print. In no other way can the Secretary keep his notes.

The SECRETARY. On page 40 the amendments were made, as follows:

In line 8 the word "and" was stricken out before the word "fire." In the same line the word "insurance" was stricken out and the following added, after the word "fire," first a comma, then the words—personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.

The Senator from Maine now moves to strike out those words in the House text that are included within the parentheses, beginning with the words "except life, marine, inland, and fire insurance," and then the words just read, and in lieu to insert within the parentheses the following:

(Except life, accident, personal, and health insurance and insurance described and taxed or exempted in the preceding paragraph and excepting also workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.)

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if mutual accident insurance will be exempted from the operation of the law if his amendment is adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I so understand it; "personal, accident, health"——

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator reading from the printed bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am reading from the printed bill. Those words are in the amendment as offered. Everything is in the bill except I have referred to the preceding paragraph as far as fire, marine, inland insurance.

Mr. NORRIS. In the amendment the Senator proposes to offer in case this is reconsidered are the words "except life, marine, inland, and fire insurance" included? Are those exceptions made?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is short. Let the Secretary state it again.

The SECRETARY. On page 40 of the original text, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "except life, marine, inland, fire, personal, accident, health, and workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit," and in lieu thereof insert:

Except life, accident, personal, and health insurance and insurance described and taxed or exempted in the preceding paragraph, and excepting also workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will see that that excepts all accident policies, life policies, and health policies.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is of opinion that they were excepted before, is he not?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; they were excepted before, but the question was particularly raised by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who brought it to the attention of the committee. Perhaps the Senator from Connecticut will make a statement, as he has in mind the particular point he wanted to make clear.

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MCLEAN. I will state to the Senator that he will observe on page 39, the first paragraph on the top of page 39, there is a tax on fire insurance with the exception of mutual insurance. Then we come to the insurance described in this paragraph which is now under discussion. The Senator will observe in line 7, page 40, the language includes "or other branch of insurance," and there was a question as to whether the tax on fire insurance in the first paragraph was not doubled.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will observe it says "or other branch of insurance." Then follow the words in parentheses, "except life, marine, inland, and fire insurance."

Mr. MCLEAN. Certain classes of fire insurance are included in the exception, but not all, and they are all included in the term "or other branch of insurance." Again, the exception being in brackets might be construed to apply to mutual life insurance only, which is clearly not the intent of the exception; and the language is merely transposed so as to make clear the intent of the committee. They did not intend to double the tax on fire insurance or insurance against lightning, and so forth. That is all there is to it. It does not affect the purposes of the act.

Mr. NORRIS. Except to make it plain.

Mr. MCLEAN. It merely removes an apparent ambiguity.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think there really was an ambiguity there?

Mr. MCLEAN. I certainly think so. If the Senator will read the language in parentheses, for instance——

Mr. NORRIS. Would the legal effect of the proposed amendment be the same as it was before?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly. If the Senator will read the language in the paragraph he will see that it provides that all branches of insurance included there shall be exempted. Those exemptions should be made clear.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it is desirable to exempt those.

Mr. McLEAN. The committee did not intend to exempt many forms of industrial insurance, although they are mutual.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the discussion may be very instructive, but it is not illuminating. We can not hear a word of what is being said.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will state to me any point in the language used that he does not understand, I think I can make it clear to him.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not aware that I misunderstood anything that was in the amendment; I thought I understood it; but I wanted to get an idea from some reliable source as to just why we were taking up the time of the Senate to pass an amendment and reconsider some action taken before, and when we get through we shall have the same thing we had when we started out. It occurred to me that we ought to have an explanation of that, and that we did not have.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Nebraska is satisfied that the language used by the committee secures the same object as the language used in the amendment, I do not think I shall waste the time of the Senate in continuing my explanation.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been satisfied all the time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is the same question that arose on the floor here some days ago. I agree entirely with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and I tried to persuade the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in charge of the bill, that this amendment ought to be made.

I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the language intends to except this form of insurance, but it says "fire, accident, life, or workmen's compensation insurance in companies organized for mutual benefit and not for profit." So it limits the insurance excepted to mutual companies, so called. It was not intended to limit it in that way, but it was intended to except from tax accident and life and workmen's compensation insurance in any kind of a company.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator from Washington a question. In the amendment which he offered here, to which the gag rule was applied, when I was so unceremoniously taken off the floor when I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the good points in it—in that amendment which the Senator offered he had exempted all insurance policies, had he not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; it struck them all out of the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. All life insurance.

Mr. NORRIS. All fire insurance also?

Mr. POINDEXTER. All kinds of insurance.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel satisfied with the explanation. If the Senator from North Carolina does not care to make a motion to lay the amendment on the table, I am satisfied to vote on it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not make the motion. I regret very much that I made the motion a little while ago, as the Senator takes it so seriously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had two amendments which I intended to offer, but I am not going to take the time of the Senate to do so. I will say just a word or two about them.

One of the amendments proposed to give the President the power to increase the rates of duty on imports into this country from countries where they have imposed additional import duties since the passage of the last tariff act. I have gathered some very interesting information in reference to that matter. There are some countries where the tax on some goods, especially canned goods, is practically prohibitive. It has been charged that since we passed our tariff law giving those countries more freedom in the matter of imports, they have imposed a tariff on imports into those countries equivalent to what we cut off in this country. I had intended offering an amendment covering that situation, but I know that it would be voted down; and so I am not going to take the time of the Senate in regard to it.

The other amendment was one proposing to authorize the President to appoint a commission of five to investigate and ascertain what industries might be established in this country and what development might be made in other industries by the imposition of tariff duties, and to report to the President and to the Senate by the 1st of January next. There is not any doubt in my mind that the present situation offers a very great opportunity to this country to establish a great many new industries here if we could assure our people that they would have protection and encouragement after the European war closes. I know that the amendment would be voted down. So, however desirable it might be, I shall not offer it, but I shall hope that our Democratic friends will learn the lesson from the present situation, and that by and by they will give up this fetish that they have been holding to and join with us in encouraging the development of our own industries. I especially hope our friends in the South will join with us in a policy that will diversify their industries, so that they will not be afflicted, as they are now, and that they can come even to a Democratic Congress and get relief.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to strike out all of Schedule A, which would mean all of pages 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, and all of page 42 down to line 14, and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of Schedule A, relative to stamp taxes, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

There shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon the net income of every individual an income tax, in addition to that already provided by law, of 5 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $500,000; and 8 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000; and 43 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered is in many respects the same as that offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], to which the gag was applied and which was so unceremoniously thrown out.

The motion which I have made proposes to strike out more of the bill than was proposed in the motion of the Senator from Washington, but the part I propose to insert is the same as that offered by the Senator from Washington to be inserted; in other words, the effect of this amendment is to strike out all of the stamp taxes included in the bill, which includes, in my judgment, the most objectionable part of the bill, and that which would prove to be the most objectionable in its enforcement. In place of the stamp-tax provision it inserts a provision that increases the income tax on all incomes which exceed $250,000 per annum.

Mr. President, there may be an honest dispute as to whether any legislation for special taxes is necessary at this time. I am not here to say to those who favor such a plan that there is not some argument and some reason for it. Personally I do not believe that the time for it has come. I have been opposed to this bill, although recognizing the fact that there are indications now, and have been ever since the new tariff law went into effect, that something of this kind might be necessary. When the European war broke out the difficulties were increased, and what I believed would have come in any event has been brought about sooner, although I do not believe that even now the time has come when it is necessary for us to levy these special taxes upon the people.

The President himself, when he asked for this legislation, stated that there was $75,000,000 of Government money deposited in different banks over the United States. He gave as a reason why he did not want to use that money that it might interfere with business. I have due respect for the views of the President, but I do not believe that it would interfere with business. I do not believe it is a good economic policy for us to say that, although we have $75,000,000 of money deposited in the banks, we ought not to withdraw it because the banks want to use the money. If that theory were carried out, and we do levy special taxes and deposit them in the banks, which we probably will and probably ought to do, then the banks may say again, "We want to use this money, and if you withdraw it it will be hard on us." It seems to me it is not a logical proposition that we should deposit money in the banks of the country and refuse to draw it out because the banks want to use it. I believe that a considerable portion of the money could have been drawn out without any injury, or at least with a less injury to business than special taxation will bring about.

Mr. President, while we may disagree on that proposition, it at least seems to me that if we are going to levy special taxes we ought to levy them where they can best and most easily be borne. We have levied in this bill taxes that will fall upon the ordinary, common person in as burdensome a manner as they will upon the millionaire. If we should adopt the amendment which I have proposed, we would be levying these taxes upon beer, upon whisky, upon tobacco, and upon those who had incomes exceeding $250,000 per annum. The man with an income exceeding $250,000 per annum is not hurt if he loses all of his income in excess of that amount. If he did not know he had lost it, he would not realize it at the end of the year. The tax on the excess of $250,000 per annum is light, and it remains light until the income exceeds a million dollars; and the man with an income that exceeds a million dollars, it seems to me, ought to be willing, in case the country is in need, to pay on the excess—not on all of his income, but on the excess above a million dollars—the amount provided for in this amendment.

When the tariff bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment imposing a graduated inheritance tax that went up as high as 75 per cent where the inheritance was over $50,000,000, as I remember—I am speaking now only from memory; perhaps it was 50 per cent; at any rate, a high figure—and the argument was made on the other side of the Chamber, by men who said they favored that kind of a proposition, that they favored the idea of levying such taxes upon those who best could bear them, but they would bring in too much revenue. A man with a million dollars is just as rich as a man with $1,100,000, and a man with $1,100,000 who loses a hundred thousand dollars will not know it the next day; if he had to count his money, he never would find it out; but it was argued, as I have stated, that that kind of a tax would bring too much of an income; that we would have money in the Treasury that we could not use.

Now you are here asking special taxation, you are here knowing that your tariff law has not produced enough revenue to operate and properly run the Government. We might disagree as to the cause, but it is conceded or it is claimed, at least, now by those who are behind this measure—and it is the only excuse for offering it—that the ordinary revenues of the Government are not sufficient to transact its business. Therefore, if you meant what you then said, if you believed in the arguments you made that you should like to levy a heavier tax upon incomes or levy a graduated tax upon inheritances, now is the opportunity to do it.

Mr. President, I expect to vote against this bill, because I do not believe it is necessary; but later on, if it shall appear that it is necessary and this bill should be defeated, I will give my best efforts to help enact a law which will bring the proper revenue. I want our Government to have sufficient income properly to carry on the business of the country, but until we get to the point where we are in need or it becomes necessary to enact special legislation, I do not believe we ought to levy additional taxes, particularly where they fall, as the stamp taxes do, upon those who can least afford to bear the burden.

If this particular amendment should be adopted, I realize—and I realize, the bill being a caucus measure, that it can not be adopted—but if it should be adopted, while the objection which I now have to the legislation would still exist, it would be removed to a great extent, and I would be willing and would then gladly give my support and vote for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as before and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I announce my pair and its transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I transfer my pair as before and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON. Again announcing my pair, and with the same transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and have no transfer. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. OLIVER. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay." I will allow this announcement to stand on all subsequent votes for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 39, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. NORRIS was rejected.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. In line 13, page 6, of the amendment I offered the other day, I move to strike out the last word, "with," and to insert the word "or," and after the word "fermented," in line 14, on the same page, I move to insert the word "with."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, page 6, of the amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Missouri on behalf of the committee as a substitute for section 3, the Senator from Missouri proposes to strike out the word "with" and to insert the word "or," and in line 14, after the word "fermented," to insert the word "with," so that it will read:

Is fermented or partially fermented with grape juice only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from one of our newspapers, reading as follows:

Newspaper bundle tax certainly unnecessary. Should be stricken out. Will procure little revenue and prove only vexatious to publishers.

I will ask the Senator from Indiana, who, as I understand, has charge of the matter, what is the situation of the bill in this respect.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the bill as is came from the House had the same provision with respect to the use of bills of lading for bundles of newspapers as did the act of 1898, but since 1898 there has been quite a change in the manner of the distribution of papers, due in large part to the growth in the interurban railway system. Time has increasingly become the essence of the situation in the distribution of afternoon daily papers. The issuing of a bill of lading for each bundle would become vexatious and burdensome. This amendment provides that the publisher of the newspaper in lieu of the stamped bill of lading is to make a return under oath on the 15th of each month of the general bundles shipped during the preceding month, to which return he is required to attach a 1-cent stamp for each bundle so reported. Instead of the stamp on the bill of lading, he makes his return and puts on as many stamps as there are bundles shipped.

Mr. JONES. I understand the committee has stricken out the provision of the House and inserted a new amendment covering what the Senator has just stated?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; to that effect.

Mr. JONES. And that is satisfactory to the newspaper representatives?

Mr. SHIVELY. It obviates a vexation which would be peculiar in that particular business. Unlike most other businesses, time is of peculiar importance.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana, having received similar protests, that I assume the protest is largely borne from a misapprehension of the present bill, and is possibly based upon the original bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I do not know, of course, whether the protests that have come in this afternoon are protests against the amendment inserted in the bill or protests against the original provision in the bill as it came from the House. The telegrams exhibited to me by Senators do not indicate. It was very late in the consideration of the bill when this matter was called to the attention of the committee; but the amendment adopted certainly obviates the principal objection made by those who protested against the form as it came from the House of the great inconvenience that it would occasion them. It is possible the later remonstrants want the provision stricken out entirely. They may want no tax at all. They may want it entirely exempt. The committee considered that, but could not arrive at such conclusion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think they asked that it be stricken out. I think they wanted this inconvenience adjusted.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is my impression, though I would not declare that none of them wanted no more.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the chairman of the committee as well as the Senator from Indiana a question? There is nothing in the present condition to avoid any error being corrected in conference if there is an error in the situation, is there?

Mr. SHIVELY. Oh, certainly not.

In order that there may be no misapprehension I want to state that there was an additional modification made, in pursuance of our general postal policy; that is, that the provision shall not include the report to the collector of the number of bundles delivered in the county within which the newspaper is published.

Mr. JONES. I understand that the whole matter is to be in conference?

Mr. SHIVELY. The amendment will go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BORAH and Mr. SMITH of Michigan called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the Secretary calls the roll I shall detain the Senate not more than a minute.

I am going to vote against the bill for the reason that I am of the opinion that owing to the war in Europe this country will be put under great financial stress; that we may have to rehabilitate or readjust our trade; that there will be ruin pursuing the most legitimate enterprises; and that before assessing the people for additional taxes under such conditions our first duty is to discard all wasteful methods.

I should like to support the bill, and would vote for any method of legitimate taxation if I thought it were necessary. I dislike to disagree with the members of my own party, but I think Congress would do better if it first did that.

For that reason I have scruples and doubts, and I question the wisdom of passing this bill. I think it is our solemn duty and our obligation first to ascertain wherein we are wasting money, wherein we can legitimately save money, and I believe that in that way we can save three times the amount we are now going to assess upon the people.

For these reasons, believing that to be our first duty, I am going to vote against the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED'S name was called). As I stated some time ago, my colleague [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I do not know how he would vote if present. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, October 19, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that out of the untold misery entailed upon the innocent men, women, and children in the war zone the Christ spirit is working in the hearts of our people to lessen the misery by deeds of generosity and kindness; for every society organized to carry on the good work; that the spirit has found its way even into the hearts of our children, who are busy preparing the Christmas ship with everything that will tend to bring comfort and pleasure to their little brothers and sisters who have been bereft of father, brother, and even their homes. Encourage, we pray Thee, the work of the good Samaritan, that not only the suffering may be alleviated, but that our hearts may be filled with brotherly love; that the Christ spirit may do its perfect work, and thus increase the desire for everlasting peace in the hearts of all men; that Thy will may be done. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, October 16, 1914, was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the Journal be approved. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6631. An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poison in the consular districts of the United States in China.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coco leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title: An act (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; had requested a conference with the Houes of Representatives upon the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STONE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President had, on October 13, 1914, approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 193. Joint resolution to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to two commissioned officers of the line of the Navy for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of Brazil as instructors in naval strategy and tactics in the Naval War College of Brazil.

LETTER OF THE PRESIDENT AND REPLY THERETO.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a letter that I am in receipt of from the President of the United States in reference to the work of this Congress, and my reply to the letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the President of the United States on the work of the present Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the purpose of this request to have this letter distributed at public expense?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think it is an official document, and of course it is subject to distribution if it is printed in the RECORD as other documents are. I think it is worthy of distribution; but more than that, it is a statement of the President of the United States with reference to the work of the Congress in his administration, and I think it is very proper to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I take it that it is a mere political statement that the gentleman and the President desire to have distributed at public expense.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is a most valuable political statement, but I think it goes further than that; it is an excellent review of the work of this Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understood the request that was reported was for the printing of the letter of the President and my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. The whole request of the gentleman is to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter of the President to him and his letter to the President. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up——

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 18801) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, to disagree to all of the amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. HENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama how many amendments the Senate added to the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall have to look. I can advise the gentleman in a moment. There are 98.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield until I can make a request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not yield to a request that is not pertinent to this request.

Mr. MURRAY. I wanted to ask leave to extend my remarks on the cotton question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks. It is not legislation.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if these amendments are material, or if they are merely verbal changes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I think there are some very material amendments in the bill.

Mr. HENRY. Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are 98 amendments that are material, it seems to me the House should have an opportunity to examine these amendments, and, also, the Committee on Ways and Means ought to look into them a little further before it goes to conference, and I therefore object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Speaker to at once refer the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The bill is referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LEON GREENBAUM.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MANN. Has the Senate asked for a conference?

Mr. POU. I think so.

Mr. MANN. It is rather unusual to ask for a conference on a Senate amendment to a private bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, as there does not seem to be a request for a conference, I move to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. POU, Mr. DIES, and Mr. MOTT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—I do not intend to object—I ask unanimous consent at this time to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that request in a moment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman wait until the Chair puts the question that the rule requires? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of cotton. Is there objection?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. BATHRICK. That there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will withdraw his point of no quorum I will withdraw my request, if that is the gentleman's reason for making it.

Mr. BATHRICK. No; that is all right. We will save a day by doing this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-seven Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 20, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy name is glorious in all the earth. One generation shall speak of Thy mighty acts to another. Thy glory shall fill all the world. We are receiving from Thee the unmeasured tokens of Thy love. Every thought of God to usward has been a thought of mercy and of compassion. We can not do anything without Thee. We come to Thee at this morning hour to ask for the inspiration that cometh from on high for the duties of this day. This we ask, with the forgiveness of our sins, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, October 8, 1914, when, on request of Mr. JAMES and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

AMERICAN VESSELS AND WATCH OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce acknowledging the receipt of a resolution of the 16th instant, relative to the number of Americans from the various customs districts who would be available for watch officers, including masters, mates, and engineers, etc., and also a list of vessels admitted to American registry under the emergency act, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARMY VETERINARY SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a telegram, just received from citizens of Michigan at Lansing, which I ask to have read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., October 19, 1914.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Army veterinary service bill, H. R. 4541, passed House of Representatives June 29 last. Same bill favorably reported by Senate Committee on Military Affairs and recommended for passage on floor of Senate. It is now on Senate Calendar, favorably looked upon by over 70 Senators. Will you please use your influence by urging consideration before adjournment?

R. P. LYMAN.
J. S. MCDANIELS.
E. P. HALLMAN.
S. W. CHAMBERLAIN.
J. P. HUTTON.
W. GILTNER.

Mr. JONES. I have received several telegrams similar to the one presented by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] in regard to the veterinary service bill. I will not present them, but simply desire to make this statement.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Florida Metropolis, of October 16, 1914, on the subject of river and harbor improvements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RIVERS AND HARBORS IMPROVEMENT.

Many of the newspapers and publications of the East are rejoicing over the failure of the original rivers and harbors bill of final passage, designating it as "the pork-barrel bill."

In many cases it is quite difficult to determine whether these editors condemning the bill as a "pork-barrel" proposition are just ignorant of the general needs of the country at large or whether they are merely malevolent perverters of facts.

The Saturday Evening Post, joining in along with some of the daily press yelpers, is much pleased that the bill was killed, and declares that a world disaster like the European war was necessary to stop what the Post is pleased to designate as "gross waste."

It is not surprising to read such rot in New York newspapers, for they have no vision beyond the sky line of Manhattan Island, are narrow, ignorant, conceited, self-opinionated, provincial. But that a publication of the character and general circulation of the Post would be guilty of the utterances to be found in its last issue is somewhat surprising.

New York and the East generally have received so many appropriations and such enormous sums have been expended in giving them deep, safe harbors and improving their waterways that they are wholly selfish in their utterances, and what they say is just a sop to the vanity of their readers, who, like the editors, do not know there is a country outside of the little island on which New York City is located. Having all the appropriations they need, and having their harbors and waterways in a high state of improvement, they are willing that no further improvements be made anywhere in the country.

But it is a notorious fact, known to every man who has gone into the matter with anything like an analytical mind and intent to discover the truth, that river improvement saves the country yearly more money than has been expended, all told, for the improvements of rivers and harbors.

One comparison alone is quite convincing. The State of Texas has practically no river improvement. She has few waterways susceptible of improvement. She is one of the States producing heavy freight, and a great bulk of it. Yet the State of Texas has the highest freight rate of any State in the Union, taken as a whole. In truth, the common-point rate in Texas is higher than any rate anywhere with two exceptions, in very small areas in the Rocky Mountain country. To get at the saving effected by river and harbor improvement one has but to compare the rate in Texas and the bulk of freight moved with the same area in the Great Lakes region or any other section where the waterways and harbors are in a high state of improvement. The rate in Texas in most instances is about three times as great per ton per mile as it is where there is water competition.

The rivers are natural arteries of commerce. They are where they are, and always remain there. The river channel will never stand an assessment and will never increase in value, so far as taxation is concerned, while every railroad in the country is all the time increasing in value, and all lines are constantly being taxed on a heavier valuation for their right of way. This will make freight rates go up rather than down, and the only possible solution of freight rates must rest with improved waterways.

If the Government had expended all its money as wisely as that which has been expended for waterway improvement, the entire Nation would be vastly better off to-day.

Instead of being a "pork barrel" in any sense, the rivers and harbors appropriations have been the only really wise and consistent continuous expenditures the Government has made.

TAX ON NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. JONES. I have three telegrams here to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee for consideration in conference in connection with the war-tax bill. They relate to the taxing of newspapers, to which I called the attention of the Senate just as we were closing the debate on the bill the other evening. The telegrams are from three of the principal papers in our State. One of them reads as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., October 19, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Think any tax unnecessary, in view large amount now paid Government by newspapers in postage. Leave it to your judgment.

A. S. TAYLOR.
SCOTT G. BONE.

That is from the editor and proprietor of the Post Intelligencer, of Seattle.

I have also one from S. A. Perkins, of the Tacoma Ledger, Tacoma, which reads as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., October 19, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

A provision taxing newspapers in any form is an outrage. The bill passed by both Houses will cost thousands of dollars annually to papers that send out any number of packages. It should be eliminated in any form.

S. A. PERKINS.

Then I have also a telegram from Alden J. Blethen, of the Seattle Times, which reads as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., October 19, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand Senate provision confined to shipments outside county of publication. If shipments include individual subscribers cost will be as estimated. If all papers going to one point daily be considered one shipment only, 220,000 shipments per annum will cover Times at $2,200 expense outside King County. Important shipment be clearly defined.

ALDEN J. BLETHEN.

I hope the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will consider these telegrams in connection with the conference on the revenue bill.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the druggists of Pasadena, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on drugs and proprietary medicines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill (S. 6667) granting a pension to Eugene Westcott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 6668) granting a pension to Catharine C. Abbott (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

INVESTIGATION OF TRADE CONDITIONS RELATIVE TO COTTON, ETC.

Mr. GORE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 478), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of the President pro tempore of the Senate and six other Senators, to be appointed by the presiding officer, is hereby authorized and is directed to inquire into the effects of the European war upon domestic agriculture and other industries and upon domestic and foreign exchange, commerce, and navigation, and to report to the Senate at the forthcoming regular session as to the best means, and recommend such legislation as may be deemed practicable, for reopening the customary channels of trade and meeting the existing emergency in the cotton and other markets of the country; and for this purpose it is authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress, at such times and places as it may deem desirable or practicable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings and have reports of same printed for use, and to employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary; and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers, to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

THE ANTITRUST LAW (S. DOC. NO. 606).

Mr. ASHURST. Last week the President of the United States signed the great antitrust bill, commonly called the Clayton-Culberson bill. I have here a very interesting and a very profound and brilliant speech by Mr. A. M. Belcher, attorney for the international organization of the United Mine Workers of America, delivered by that gentleman at Huntington, W. Va., in relation to that bill, which has now become a law. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by the President of the United States before the American Bar Association in this city this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to granting the request of the Senator from Kentucky. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address of the President, before the American Bar Association, Continental Hall, October 20, 1914, was as follows:

"Mr. President, gentlemen of the American Bar Association, I am very deeply gratified by the greeting that your president has given me and by your response to it. My only strength lies in your confidence. We stand now in a peculiar case. Our first thought, I suppose, as lawyers, is of international law, of those bonds of right and principle which draw the nations together and hold the community of the world to some standards of action. We know that we see in international law, as it were, the moral processes by which law itself came into existence. I know that as a lawyer I have myself at times felt that there was no real comparison between the law of a nation and the law of nations, because the latter lacked the sanction that gave the former strength and validity. And yet, if you look into the matter more closely, you will find that the two have the same foundations, and that those foundations are more evident and conspicuous in our day than they have ever been before. The opinion of the world is the mistress of the world, and the processes of international law are the slow processes by which opinion works its will. What impresses me is the constant thought that that is the tribunal at the bar of which we all sit. I would call your attention, incidentally, to the circumstance that it does not observe the ordinary rules of evidence, which has sometimes suggested to me that the ordinary rules of evidence had shown some signs of growing antique.

"Everything, rumor included, is heard in this court, and the standard of judgment is not with regard to the character of the testimony, but the character of the witness. The motives are disclosed, the purposes are conjectured, and that opinion is finally accepted which seems to be, not the best founded in law perhaps, but the best founded in integrity of character and of morals. That is the process which is slowly working its will upon the world, and what we should be watchful of is not so much jealous interests as sound principles of action. The disinterested course is always the biggest course to pursue not only, but it is in the long run the most profitable course to pursue. If you can establish your character, you can establish your credit.

"What I wanted to suggest to this association in bidding them very hearty welcome to the city is whether we sufficiently apply these same ideas to the body of municipal law which we seek to administer. Citations seem to play so much larger rôle now than principle. There was a time when the thoughtful eye of the judge rested upon the changes of social circumstances and almost palpably saw the law arise out of human life. Have we got to a time when the only way to change law is by statute? The changing of law by statute seems to me like mending a garment with a patch; whereas law should grow by the life that is in it, not by the life that is outside of it. I once said to a lawyer with whom I was discussing some questions of precedent, and in whose presence I was venturing to doubt the rational validity at any rate of the precedents, 'After all, isn't our object justice?' And he said, 'God forbid! We should be very much confused if we made that our standard. Our standard is to find out what the rule has been and how the rule that has been applies to the case that is.' I should hate to think that the law was based entirely upon 'has beens.' I should hate to think that the law did not derive its impulse from looking forward rather than from looking backward or, rather, that it did not derive its instruction from looking about and seeing what the circumstances of man actually are and what the impulses of justice necessarily are.

"Understand me, gentlemen, I am not venturing in this presence to impeach the law. For the present by the force of circumstances I am in part the embodiment of the law, and it would be very awkward to disavow myself. But I do wish to make this intimation, that in this time of world change, in this time when we are going to find out just how, in what particulars, and to what extent the real facts of human life and the real moral judgments of mankind prevail, it is worth while looking inside our municipal law and seeing whether the moral judgments of mankind are made square with every one of the judgments of the law itself. For I believe that we are custodians, not of commands but of a spirit. We are custodians of the spirit of righteousness, of the spirit of equal-handed justice, of the spirit of hope which believes in the perfectibility of the law with the perfectibility of human life itself.

"Public life, like private life, would be a very dull and dry matter if it were not for this belief in the essential beauty of the human spirit and the belief that the human spirit could be translated into action and into ordinance. Not entire. You can not go any faster than you can advance the average moral judgments of the mass, but you can go at least as fast as that, and you can see to it that you do not lag behind the average moral judgments of the mass. I have in my life dealt with all sorts and conditions of men, and I have found that the flame of moral judgment burned just as bright in the man of humble life and limited experience as in the scholar and the man of affairs. And I would like his voice always to be heard, not as a witness, not as speaking in his own case, but as if he were the voice of men in general, in our courts of justice, as well as the voice of the lawyers, remembering what the law has been. My hope is that being stirred to the depths by the extraordinary circumstances of the time in which we live we may recover from those depths something of a renewal of that vision of the law with which men may be supposed to have started out in the old days of the oracles, who communed with the intimations of divinity."

LETTER OF COL. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the New York Herald of September 18, 1914, which gives the contents of a letter written by Col. Roosevelt to his various followers throughout the States of Kentucky, Missouri, and other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks that a certain article, giving a letter of Col. Roosevelt, may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., Thursday.

At the conference in New York on Wednesday after Mr. Bonaparte and the other Maryland leaders had spoken on the situation in Maryland, Mr. Roosevelt said he could best deal with the questions of party policy in Maryland and indicate most clearly his views regarding the course appropriate for the Progressive Party there by reading some extracts from a letter he had written to a gentleman in Maryland who had promised to support him for the Republican nomination in 1916. This letter was written in the month of August. He said he had written substantially to the same effect to gentlemen in Kentucky and New Mexico who had expressed similar intentions.

Col. Roosevelt then quoted from his letter as follows:

"I am very sorry to say that I do not think anything whatever can be done through the Republican Party as now organized; in any event, as far as I am concerned. The result here in New York has shown that it is utterly useless for me to endeavor to get any Republican of prominence to come out in such a way as to make it possible for there to be cooperation between the Republicans and Progressives on any terms which I would consider.

"In all big States the Republican Party is more reactionary, more completely under the control of the bosses than it was two years ago. There is literally nothing whatever to be done with it while it continues as it is now; it at present is as far as the poles from the vital principles of Abraham Lincoln Republicanism, and I am sorry to say that actual experience has convinced me that any effort to make a combination between the Progressives and the decent Republicans for good government has resulted only in these decent Republicans being forced into subservience to the machine, and the machine gleefully and screamingly announced that the Progressives have surrendered to the Republicans, so that the situation becomes worse and not better.

"There are certain States where the Republican candidates have declared that they are for me in 1916, and a few where they, with more or less directness, announced themselves in favor of the Progressive policies. As regards the announcement for myself, I do not regard it as amounting to anything, because it is of no earthly consequence to indorse me unless the principles for which I stand are indorsed.

"Under these circumstances I am sorry to say that I do not believe it would be right in the contests this fall for the Progressives to support the Republicans in any State, no matter what the Republicans in these States may say, because in a great majority of the States the Republicans have come out with the utmost cynicism against the Progressives and in favor of all the worst policies and practices of the Bourbons two years ago, and where this is the case victory for Republicans in any States, even though nominally achieved under the banner of some man who says he is for me, would in its sum total result in advantages to the utterly Bourbon and reactionary machines.

"If the Republicans of Maryland, Kentucky, and New Mexico declare for me, but at the same time keep in the Republican organization instead of becoming Progressive, they are absolutely powerless before the Republicans of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and the great majority of the other States where they are bitterly and to the last gasp against me and against everything I represent.

"As things are now, it is worse than useless to support the few Republicans who announce that they are for me, but that they intend to remain in the Republican Party, for this merely means that, if elected, they will strengthen the great mass of Republicans who not only intend to oppose me, which is unimportant, but to oppose all the things for which I stand, which is very important."

BILLS OF LADING (S. DOC. NO. 605).

Mr. POMERENE. I have before me the report of the committee on commercial law of the American Bar Association touching the bill-of-lading bill recently passed by the Senate, and also treating of sundry other very important matters. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to granting the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. STONE rose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills upon the calendar. Those to which there is any objection will go over, but there are a number of House bills on the calendar, some very important, and if we do not pass them to-day the chances are that they will not be passed during the session. We have been promised a calendar day for some time. I hope the Senator from Indiana can see his way clear to let us take up unobjected business.

Mr. KERN. The Senate will be in session to-morrow, and there may be an opportunity to go on with the calendar then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the objection may be withheld for a minute. I take it for granted the Senator may have some reason for objecting.

Mr. KERN. If I did not, I would not have objected.

Mr. WARREN. With some dozen pages of the calendar and a very large number of House bills—more than I think have ever been on the calendar when a session has adjourned—it would seem that we might spend an hour or two in cleaning up the calendar. I should very much like to see that done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I should like to suggest——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made to the request.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Chair will indulge me for a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will indulge the Senator if the Senator from Indiana does not insist upon his objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that a motion to take up the unobjected bills on the calendar, of course, is in order. I do not wish to make that motion if by so doing it would disclose the absence of a quorum and prevent going into executive session, as is desired by the Senator from Missouri, but I do very much want to have the calendar taken up, and with the partial assurance of the Senator from Indiana that we shall be in session to-morrow and may be able to take up the calendar at that time, I will not press the motion.

Mr. KERN. I am assuming that we will be in session to-morrow. I had intended to move to adjourn by and by to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock. That would imply that we will be in session to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much afraid that the motion this morning would disclose the absence of a quorum, and I do not wish to interfere with the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to proceed to the consideration of executive business. However, I do want to take up the calendar, and I shall insist on doing so to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed. The Chair announces that several resolutions come over from a former day, but since the Senator from Missouri desires to be recognized, the Chair will recognize him at this time.

Mr. STONE. Does the Chair think it important to lay them before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are likely to provoke some discussion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 18 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

LETTERS BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. KERN. I have received a letter from the President of the United States, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 12, 1914.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I know that I need not say to you or to any of my colleagues in the Senate that my letter to Mr. UNDERWOOD was no less an expression of my feeling of the deep indebtedness of the party and of the country to the Democratic Members of the Senate than of my appreciation of the work of the House. We are all, happily, a single team, moved by the same spirit.

But I want to give myself the personal satisfaction of sending you a line of warm congratulation and of deep personal appreciation. I am sure we shall all be able in the years to come to look back upon the special and the long session of the Sixty-third Congress with genuine gratitude that we should have been given the opportunity to serve the country in so many ways.

Many problems, no doubt, still await us, but they will, I am sure, be met in the same spirit and, I earnestly hope, with the same success.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. JOHN W. KERN, United States Senate.

Mr. KERN. I ask that a letter addressed to me from the President of the United States, dated September 30, 1914, together with a copy of a letter from the President addressed to my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], of date March 3, 1914, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., September 30, 1914.

Senator JOHN W. KERN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am genuinely surprised that any question should have arisen as to whether I want Senator SHIVELY returned. I do most decidedly wish it. I have admired Senator SHIVELY'S steadfast devotion to duty and to the standards of the party and his unfaltering loyalty in all matters of public policy, as all his party associates have, and have learned to have a very warm personal feeling and admiration for him. It would, in my judgment, be a very great loss to the party and to the Senate if he should not be reelected. I trust that there is no doubt of his reelection.

May I not add a word of cordial appreciation of the whole Indiana delegation in Congress? The Members of the House have stood by the administration with unfailing generosity and spirit, and have made me feel a very deep interest in the political fortunes of every one of them.

I need not tell you, my dear Senator, what my sentiments are toward yourself.

Yours, sincerely, WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 3, 1914.

Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I think I ought not to let the ratification of the arbitration treaties pass without expressing the admiration I feel and the deep appreciation of the way in which you have executed the duties which have so unexpectedly fallen upon you as the ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The sudden death of Senator Bacon and the temporary illness of Senator STONE brought these duties upon you without warning, and you have certainly performed them in a way which deserves the gratitude of the country. The ratification of the treaties was of the deepest importance to the country and involved matters which you handled with singular delicacy and success.

What you have done in this matter, however, is only of a piece with what you have done throughout the period during which I have had the pleasure of being associated with you. I have always felt secure in turning to you for support and assistance in any of the great matters which concern the welfare of the country and the success of the party.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

NEUTRALITY AND TRADE IN CONTRABAND (S. DOC. NO. 604).

Mr. STONE. I have an article on "Neutrality and Trade in Contraband," which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and also that it may be printed as a public document.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed as a document and also to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEUTRALITY AND TRADE IN CONTRABAND.

The Department of State has received numerous inquiries from American merchants and other persons as to whether they could sell to Governments or nations at war contraband articles without violating the neutrality of the United States, and the department has also received complaints that sales of contraband were being made on the apparent supposition that they were unneutral acts which this Government should prevent.

In view of the number of communications of this sort which have been received, it is evident that there is a widespread misapprehension among the people of this country as to the obligations of the United States as a neutral Nation in relation to trade in contraband and as to the powers of the executive branch of the Government over persons who engage in it. For this reason it seems advisable to make an explanatory statement on the subject for the information of the public.

In the first place, it should be understood that, generally speaking, a citizen of the United States can sell to a belligerent Government or its agent any article of commerce which he pleases. He is not prohibited from doing this by any rule of international law, by any treaty provisions, or by any statute of the United States. It makes no difference whether the articles sold are exclusively for war purposes, such as firearms, explosives, etc., or are foodstuffs, clothing, horses, etc., for the use of the army or navy of the belligerent.

Furthermore, a neutral Government is not compelled by international law, by treaty, or by statute to prevent these sales to a belligerent. Such sales, therefore, by American citizens do not in the least affect the neutrality of the United States.

It is true that such articles as those mentioned are considered contraband and are, outside the territorial jurisdiction of a neutral nation, subject to seizure by an enemy of the purchasing Government, but it is the enemy's duty to prevent the articles reaching their destination, not the duty of the nation whose citizens have sold them. If the enemy of the purchasing nation happens for the time to be unable to do this, that is for him one of the misfortunes of war; the inability, however, imposes on the neutral Government no obligation to prevent the sale.

Neither the President nor any executive department of the Government possesses the legal authority to interfere in any way with trade between the people of this country and the territory of a belligerent. There is no act of Congress conferring such authority or prohibiting traffic of this sort with European nations, although in the case of neighboring American Republics Congress has given the President power to proclaim an embargo on arms and ammunition when in his judgment it would tend to prevent civil strife.

For the Government of the United States itself to sell to a belligerent nation would be an unneutral act, but for a private individual to sell to a belligerent any product of the United States is neither unlawful nor unneutral nor within the power of the Executive to prevent or control.

The foregoing remarks, however, do not apply to the outfitting or furnishing of vessels in American ports or of military expeditions on American soil in aid of a belligerent. These acts are prohibited by the neutrality laws of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 15, 1914.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I submit a proposed plan for the relief of the cotton situation, with a brief analysis of the same. It might be well to state first what it does not undertake to do. It does not undertake to valorize cotton at any fixed price. It does not undertake to interne 5,000,000 bales or any other specific number as a segregated surplus. In this respect it meets the two most serious objections urged against other proposals.

It does undertake to pledge the faith and credit of the Government to assist in the movement of the present crop and avert the loss of a half billion dollars to the cotton growers of the South and to the Nation. Under its provisions every bank, State or national, upon making a satisfactory financial showing to the Secretary of the Treasury and filing a bond, would be entitled to receive a guaranteed certificate of credit. This certificate would have several elements of a bond. It would involve all the security of a bond without any stipulation for the payment of interest. It would afford relief to every producer of cotton, however limited his assets or resources. It differs from other plans in being universal. The banks receiving the certificate mentioned would extend their own credit guaranteed by that of the United States. Every producer of cotton, upon delivery of his cotton or warehouse receipts to one of the qualified banks accompanied by his note, could receive from the bank receipts for the cotton which would be negotiable and also certified cotton-credit checks, which would undoubtedly pass as money and would be as good as the faith and credit of the United States. The cotton could be withdrawn at any time upon payment of the notes in question, and the cash thus paid in would be held as a redemption fund against the certified checks. In addition to this, a portion of the interest, together with an excise tax upon the ginning of cotton, would constitute a redemption fund sufficient for the retirement of every certified check issued and placed in circulation. The system would be automatic. It would provide credit for all who needed credit. It would enable the poorest to hold his cotton until the market price became satisfactory. It would prevent monopoly by requiring the sale of cotton when the price remained at 10 cents for more than a fixed period. It would be easy of administration. It is liable to no economic objection, except in the judgment of those who are opposed to such a use of the Government's credit under any circumstances and for any purpose whatsoever. In the absence of an effective market the only possible remedy or relief must be found in a system that will enable the producer of cotton to hold the commodity until the return or approach of normal market conditions. I now introduce the bill, and ask that it be received and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and also printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 6685) to declare an emergency and to establish a cotton-credit guaranty system was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 6685) to declare an emergency and to establish a cotton-credit guaranty system.

Be it enacted, etc., That the short title of this act shall be the cotton-credit guaranty act.

SEC. 2. That an emergency in the cotton market in the United States is declared to exist, and it is declared to be the purpose of this act to meet such emergency.

SEC. 3. That wherever the word "bank" is used in this act the word shall be held to include State banks, banking associations, and trust companies, except where national banks are specifically referred to.

The terms "national bank" and "national-bank association" used in this act shall be held to be synonymous and interchangeable.

SEC. 4. That any bank, as defined in the preceding section, desiring to avail itself of the provisions of this act shall file an application with the Secretary of the Treasury, in such form as he may prescribe, and if said bank shall make a satisfactory showing as to its financial status its application shall receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 5. That any bank whose application has been approved as provided above shall execute a bond payable to the United States, in such form and amount and with such sureties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe and approve: Provided, That the amount of the bond shall not exceed the capital and surplus of such bank, and the bond shall be so conditioned that the bank executing the same will faithfully observe the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations prescribed in pursuance thereof: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct the Federal Reserve Board to pass on such applications and bonds and approve the same and generally to administer this act.

SEC. 6. That whenever the application and bond of any bank shall have been duly approved, it shall be entitled to receive from the Secretary of the Treasury a guaranteed certificate of credit: Provided, That in no case shall such certificate exceed in amount 90 per cent of such bond or of the paid-up capital stock and surplus of such bank.

SEC. 7. That whenever any bank shall receive a guaranteed certificate of credit it shall open up a special set of books, in which shall be kept a complete and correct account of all its transactions, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. That any bank after having received such guaranteed certificate of credit shall be authorized to use and advance its credit to an amount equal to such certificate as hereinafter provided and in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 9. That whenever the owner of one or more bales of cotton of commercial quality or the owner of warehouse receipts of such cotton shall make application to a bank holding a guaranteed certificate of credit, herein provided, for an advance or transfer of its credit, such bank may make such advance or transfer of its credit upon its books, kept for that purpose, upon the following conditions:

That the owner deliver such cotton or warehouse receipts to the bank and also execute and deliver his separate note for each bale of cotton so delivered or represented by such warehouse receipt in an amount as nearly equal as may be ascertained to the average market price of such cotton during the week last preceding, less 1 cent per pound on the basis of middling upland cotton. Each note shall contain a sufficient description of the cotton which it represents and shall be payable on or before three years from date and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum for the first year, 6 per cent for the second year, and 10 per cent for the third year: Provided, That the aggregate advance or transfer of credit by any bank shall at no time exceed the amount of the guaranteed credit certificate held by such bank.

SEC. 10. That whenever any bank shall grant an advance or transfer of credit as provided in the preceding section it shall issue to the person executing such note or notes certified cotton-credit checks equal in amount to the aggregate amount of such note or notes, and such certified checks shall be in denominations of $1, $2.50, $5, $10, and $20, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Any bank or banks issuing certified cotton-credit checks shall, before the delivery thereof, state therein the weight, mark, grade, and number of the bale of cotton pledged for their redemption, and any other distinguishing feature connected with said transaction, and shall state therein the name of the owner or owners who delivered such cotton or the warehouse receipt for the same.

Any certified cotton-credit check issued by any bank under the authority of this act and in compliance with the terms thereof shall be assignable and negotiable, and the title thereto shall pass by delivery, and for all the purposes of this act the holder of such certified cotton-credit check shall be deemed the owner of the same.

SEC. 11. That the certified cotton credit checks authorized by this act may be used, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury, as security for the issue of Federal reserve notes under the Federal reserve act.

SEC. 12. That the faith and credit of the United States is hereby pledged to the redemption and payment in full of all certified cotton-credit checks issued in accordance with this act, and the United States shall be indemnified against loss on account of such payment as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 13. That in addition to the certified cotton-credit checks the owner of cotton or cotton-warehouse receipts receiving such checks shall be entitled to a receipt from the bank for each bale of cotton or each warehouse receipt representing a bale of cotton, and such receipts shall contain a sufficient description of the cotton which it represents, for purposes of identification, and such receipts shall be assignable or transferable.

Whenever cotton shall advance materially in price the holder of any bank receipt above provided for shall be entitled to present the same and, by substituting a new note for the original note, receive certified checks equivalent to the advance price under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Any lawful holder of any bank receipt or receipts for cotton shall have a right to present the same at any time to the bank issuing the same and upon payment in full of the note or notes represented by such bank receipts shall be entitled to the possession of the cotton called for by such receipt.

All money so received in payment of such notes shall be held as a redemption fund for the retirement of an equal amount of certified cotton-credit checks, and such redemption shall be paid at such time and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct.

Whenever the market price of middling upland cotton shall average more than 10 cents per pound for a period of 30 days it shall be the duty of any bank, unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury, to sell all cotton which it may hold under the terms of this act, and to set aside for the redemption of the certified cotton-credit checks an amount equal to the face value of the notes represented by such sale, and such notes shall be marked "Paid," and the excess shall be held for the benefit of the owner of the bank receipt for such cotton, and shall be paid to him upon the presentation and surrender of such bank receipts.

SEC. 14. That each bank shall be entitled to charge and collect 50 cents for each receipt for cotton issued in accordance with this act, and in addition thereto shall receive one-half of the interest collected on every note the first year, one-third of the interest collected on such note the second year, and one-fifth of the interest collected on such note the third year. The remainder of all interest collected shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States and shall constitute a part of the indemnity fund provided for by this act.

SEC. 15. That until January 1, 1918, every person, firm, company, or corporation engaged in the business of ginning cotton shall pay an annual license tax of $1, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in addition to such license tax an excise tax of $5 per bale is hereby imposed and shall be paid by the person, firm, company, or corporation ginning the same: Provided, That such tax may be charged against and collected from the person procuring such ginning to be done: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on or before the 1st day of July of each year, to ascertain the aggregate amount of the outstanding and unredeemed certified cotton-credit checks and the market value of all cotton in the possession of banks represented by such checks, and certify the same to the President; and in the event that the market value of such cotton shall exceed the total amount of outstanding unredeemed checks, the President is empowered, and it shall be his duty, to issue a proclamation remitting the excise tax imposed by this section.

SEC. 16. That the excise tax imposed and collected in pursuance of the preceding section shall constitute an indemnity fund.

SEC. 17. That all cotton held by banks under this act on January 1, 1918, shall be sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the proceeds used for the redemption and retirement of the certified cotton-credit checks outstanding against such cotton, and if the proceeds be insufficient for the retirement of all such outstanding checks, then the indemnity fund provided for in the preceding section shall be used for the redemption and retirement of such outstanding and unredeemed checks, and the excise tax provided for in this act shall be continued and collected until all certified cotton-credit checks shall have been redeemed.

SEC. 18. (Penal clauses to be inserted here.)

Mr. GORE. I present a copy of a letter to Gov. Cruce, of my State, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

[Letter from Senator GORE to the governor of Oklahoma.]

OCTOBER 20, 1914.

Gov. LEE CRUCE,
Oklahoma City, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR: In default of Federal legislation to relieve the stringency of the cotton situation recourse must be had either to legislative action by the States or to voluntary action and association on the part of the cotton producers and fellow citizens in the cotton section. Several measures for the relief of the situation were proposed in Congress. Their constitutionality was doubted by some; their expediency was doubted by others. But if their constitutionality and expediency had been above and beyond question the practical difficulties of securing their enactment into law have proved insurmountable. The cotton States have 20 Senators out of 96, and 98 Representatives out of 435. This explains the practical and insurmountable difficulties referred to.

Many plans have been proposed for the relief of a situation which is both difficult and tragic. Many, if not all, of them have been characterized as visionary. I do not like to admit that any practical problem defies solution that demands solution. Any plan to succeed must provide either cash or credit. There is no complete substitute for an effective demand for a commodity or, in other words, for a cash market. The utmost that can be done or hoped for in such a situation is a plan that will enable the producer to hold his cotton until the market is more satisfactory or until prices are less ruinous.

To the plans without number the following might be added, based upon the principle and experience of issuing clearing-house certificates in time of financial panic. Under the laws of some States an association might obtain a charter and operate as a corporation. In any State it could be operated by voluntary agreement and association upon the appointment of trustees to administer the plan. In either case cotton-credit associations could and should be organized. Bankers, business men and chambers of commerce should be interested in the plan as well as the cotton producer himself. Every producer of cotton should be allowed to deposit his cotton or his warehouse receipt for cotton with his local cotton-credit association. The association should execute two instruments to the person so delivering cotton. One should be in the nature of a bond; the other a receipt. The association should fix a price at which cotton should be received, allowing a margin that would guarantee safety. It should fix a definite term during which the bond should run and at which it should expire, as well as the rate of interest which it should bear. If the safety price of cotton should be fixed at 7 cents and the rate of interest at 5 per cent and the term of the bond and receipt at 10 months, the plan would work as follows:

John Doe would deliver a bale of cotton, say, to the Homestead Cotton Credit Association. He would receive therefor a receipt which would provide that the holder of such receipt upon presenting the same and upon the payment of $35, with interest at 5 per cent for 10 months, should be entitled to receive the bale of cotton against which it was issued, described as follows: (Here describe the cotton.) This receipt could be presented at any time during the 10 months and possession of the cotton obtained. Doe would also receive at the time of delivering the cotton a bond bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent for 10 months, which, however, would become neither due nor payable until the expiration of the 10 months. This bond would be assignable or negotiable and would undoubtedly pass current in the payment of debts and in the purchase of goods if the amount advanced on the cotton were kept within the limit of safety and merchants and other business men would engage to accept the same. If this bond should pass into the hands of Richard Roe, he could at the expiration of 10 months, and not before, present the same to the association issuing it and, if the cotton had not been redeemed, upon payment of the difference between the face value of the bond plus the interest and the market value of the cotton, in case it had increased in price, would be entitled to receive the bale of cotton against which it was issued. If, however, in the meantime John Doe had presented his receipt, had obtained his cotton, and had paid the $35, with interest, then Roe would be entitled to receive the $35 in redemption of his bond, plus interest. Rules and regulations might be made for the extension of the bond upon payment of accrued and anticipated interest for a limited period. This plan would not only provide credit for every producer of cotton but, if properly safeguarded, that credit in the form of the interest-bearing bond mentioned would enjoy considerable local currency. In its essential nature it resembles the plan adopted by the banks during the stringency of 1907 in issuing clearing-house certificates. The bonds are in the nature of such clearing-house certificates and are bottomed upon the cotton itself. Its success would depend upon the fixing of a price of cotton well within the limits of security. It would enable the producer of cotton to meet many of his imperative and immediate obligations. It would reserve to him the right within the period of 10 months, or such period as may be fixed, to avail himself of the increased price of cotton. Any time within the 10 months he could, by surrendering his receipt and by payment of the amount of the outstanding bond, with interest, redeem his cotton. Or, if he preferred, he could at any time within the 10 months assign his receipt and obtain the difference between the value of the outstanding bond and the market price of the cotton deposited against it. In other words, the producer who deposits the cotton remains owner and master of the same during the 10 months, or whatever period may be fixed in the bond. After the expiration of that time the owner of the bond has the option of presenting the same and obtaining the cotton if it has not been redeemed; and if it has been redeemed, then of obtaining the money deposited therefor at the time of redemption by the owner. Of course these conditions and details could be varied to meet the local situation or to meet the views of those constituting the association. It is an extraordinary plan proposed to meet an extraordinary condition of affairs. Conservative management and cooperation would insure its success. Its success would do much to alleviate the distress of a distressed people and a distressing situation. If, however, I have overestimated its merits, and if it be entirely void of merit, I have thought it might assist others to devise ways and means that might prove more practical in the future.

Yours, truly,

T. P. GORE.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 21, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

Almighty God, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for Thy goodness and for Thy wonderful works to the children of men. Help us as individuals to appreciate the opportunities spread out before us for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual growth of our being, and teach us to know as integral parts of a great Republic in unity there is strength, in discord weakness, that we may grow the spirit of fraternity unto the unity of the faith in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] called up two conference reports, which were agreed to. As a matter of fact, no conference report had been made to the House at all, and in this case I suggest to the gentleman that he ask to have that stricken out of the RECORD or move to reconsider the votes and present the conference reports. I think there is no objection to a unanimous-consent request to consider them immediately.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the votes by which the conference reports were agreed to on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that these orders of yesterday be vacated and stricken from the Journal. That will settle it.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The SPEAKER. What are the numbers of the bills?

Mr. POU. The first is H. R. 1055, and the next is H. R. 4405.

The SPEAKER The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the proceedings in reference to these two bills, the numbers of which he has given, be vacated and the entry as to them stricken from the Journal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the Journal be approved.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

say for the benefit, not of the gentleman from Alabama but of some other persons, that so far as I am concerned and some others on this side of the House who feel like myself, I shall not vote for a conference report that fixes the duty on beer at the rate of $1.75 a barrel.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying report:

Amendment No. 1: This amendment provides for the date of effectiveness of this act, and the House recedes with an amendment fixing March 1, 1915, as the date the act shall go into effect in lieu of October 1, 1914. This change in date is necessary, for before the act can take effect provision must be made for registering and issuing official order blanks to at least 250,000 manufacturers, dealers, physicians, dentists, and veterinarians.

Amendment No. 2: This amendment permits officers of the United States, the States, the Territories, the insular possessions, and the District of Columbia lawfully engaged in making purchases of the specified habit-forming drugs to do so without registering and without paying the special tax, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 3: The act requires the registration of every person producing, manufacturing, selling, giving away, or dispensing any of these specified habit-forming drugs, and then excepts certain officers of the Federal and State Governments. This amendment therefore becomes necessary in order to obviate any question of the right of these officers to dispense or give away the drugs which they purchase without registering, and the House recedes with an amendment, changing the word "obliged" to "required."

Amendments Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 33, 34, and 35 are either changes in language making the phraseology of the act more clear and certain or correcting clerical errors, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 8: This amendment as redrafted does not require the personal attention of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon to dispense or distribute any of the aforesaid narcotics, but, in case there is not personal attention on the part of the physician, dentist, or veterinarian, a record showing the amount of the drug dispensed or distributed, the date, the name, and the address of the patient to whom such drugs are dispensed or distributed must be kept for a period of two years, subject to inspection by the officers, agents, and employees of the Treasury Department and to the State, Territorial, District, municipal, and insular officials named in this act. Physicians, dentists, and veterinary surgeons will not have to keep a record of the quantity of the drug administered, etc., when in personal attendance upon their patients.

Amendment No. 10: Section 8 of this bill makes it unlawful for any person not registered under the provisions of this act to have in his possession or under his control any of the habit-forming drugs specified in this act, but exempts employees of registered persons acting in the scope of their employment and nurses acting under the supervision of a physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon. As nurses are often employed by the patient, in order to prevent a nurse employed by a patient having possession of the aforementioned drugs from becoming liable to the penalty for violation of this act it therefore is necessary for the physician, dentist, or veterinary surgeon to register under this act, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 15: This amendment is to make it clear that it will be lawful for manufacturers and dealers to sell to the specified public officers without the official order blank. This amendment becomes necessary because previous amendments have exempted these officers from the necessity of registering and obtaining official order blanks. The House recedes with an amendment specifying among the exempted class of officers those of the Public Health Service.

Amendment No. 17: This amendment becomes necessary because in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and the Canal Zone the United States internal-revenue laws do not apply and there are no Federal internal-revenue districts or collectors. Neither are there any United States district courts in the Philippines. This amendment merely bestows jurisdiction in the Philippine Islands on the local courts and gives the President authority to issue such Executive orders as are deemed necessary to carry into effect the intent and purpose of this act, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 22: This amendment merely extends the exemption from liability under this act to persons delivering any of the aforementioned drugs prescribed or dispensed by a physician, dentist, or veterinarian, and to United States, county, municipal, District, Territorial, or insular officers or officials acting within the scope of their official duties, and the House recedes with an amendment requiring the physician, dentist, or veterinarian to register under the terms of this act.

Amendment No. 29: The House bill limited the amount of heroin that could be sold, distributed, given away, or dispensed without coming within the terms of this act to one-twelfth of a grain. The Senate increased the amount to one-fourth of a grain, and the House recedes with an amendment limiting the amount to one-eighth of a grain.

Amendment No. 32: This amendment exempts nurses working under the supervision of physicians, dentists, or veterinary surgeons registered under the act from the provisions of the act. This provision becomes necessary because the nurse is generally employed by the patient, and is therefore not an employee of a person registered under the act, and the House recedes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was agreed by the House that on the next day, barring Calendar Wednesday and unanimous-consent day, after the Philippine bill was through should be given to the consideration of the District of Columbia business. Now, the Philippine bill was finished on Wednesday last, but by unanimous consent Calendar Wednesday was set forward to Thursday; and in that way the next day, Thursday, was not given to the consideration of District business. The next day thereafter was Friday, and that was consumed by preferential business before District business was reached. The next day being Saturday, there was no session; and the next day was yesterday, which was unanimous-consent day, to which the District day, under the rule, had to give way again. I now inquire whether or not this is not District day under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore reached?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair, without examining the RECORD, that that agreement was entered into.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was. There was no question about that. The question now is whether or not this day is the next day after the conclusion of the Philippine bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. MANN. What became of Friday?

The SPEAKER. Friday was consumed by oratory, under the unanimous-consent agreement, and the Chair thinks it is true under the rules and regulations and the rules of common sense that this is really the first legislative day after getting through with the Philippine bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of House joint resolution 331 and such other matters as may come up.

LOUGHLIN F. MAGINN.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. LOBECK. I rise for the purpose of offering a resolution correcting a name in a pension bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] withhold his motion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I withhold the motion for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 375) correcting an error in H. R. 15692, approved July 21, 1914 (Private, No. 95).

Whereas by an error occurring in the bill reported by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 15692, approved July 21, 1914 [Private, No. 95], the name of one Loughlin F. Maginn, late of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read Loughlier F. Maginn of said regiment: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved July 21, 1914 (Private, No. 95, 63d Cong.), granting an increase of pension to one Jennie L. Maginn, be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Jennie L. Maginn, widow of Loughlin F. Maginn, late of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the business that was in order on yesterday may be in order to-day, and I am in hopes that in a few days we can reach an adjournment. I think by making the business in order to-day that was in order yesterday we can expedite business that is on the calendar and ought to be enacted, and it is not business that would seriously interfere with the adjournment in any way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the business that was in order yesterday shall be in order to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] advises me that he desires to bring in a rule to-morrow, and I couple with the request that business that is in order on Calendar Wednesday may go over until Thursday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the rule about?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas what this rule is. Is it in regard to the cotton-warehouse bill?

Mr. HENRY. Yes. The rule is in regard to the Senate bill amending the Federal reserve act and the Aldrich-Vreeland bill and the Lever bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the business that was in order yesterday—that is, uanimous consent and the suspension of the rules—shall be in order to-day, and that business of Calendar Wednesday be postponed until Thursday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask, after consulting gentlemen who are interested in the matter, that business that is in order on to-morrow be in order on to-morrow week. In other words, that Calendar Wednesday go over a week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the business that was in order yesterday on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and under suspension of the rules be in order to-day, and, further, that the business of to-morrow be postponed a week.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama when he expects that Congress will adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will probably adjourn before to-morrow week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the latter part of the request does not amount to anything except to dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the reason for that is in order to obviate the objection on the part of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] to the first part of the request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman did not couple it in that way, but I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on Rules has agreed to a rule which the gentleman from Texas desires to present, and if it was not presented to-morrow it would be presented on Thursday, as the Rules Committee has the right of way. I think it would expedite business to let it be presented to-morrow while the conferees are working on the revenue bill.

Mr. MANN. Would it not expedite business to have it presented to-day, so that we can dispose of it? There are a number of Republicans asking if they will have to return in order to make a quorum; and we are staying here now because of the cotton situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have no objection to the rule being presented to-day and unanimous-consent day being to-morrow. It was merely for the purpose of helping some Members get through certain bills that they want to get through.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that would be better. So far as I am concerned, if there is a chance to escape our present imprisonment and vote to dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-morrow——

Mr. HENRY. This will help the adjournment. It is just as broad as it is long. There are other matters that ought to come up. This Plaza-award proposition, it seems to me, ought to come up, and some other matters, and it would take just as much time to work it one way as the other; and the preference of the Committee on Rules is to present these rules to-morrow and get through with them to-morrow if we can obviate the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. But why should we not proceed to-day with these rules? We will have no objection, so far as I know.

Mr. HENRY. I would prefer to let the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] go ahead to-day, and if he gets through, then we will go on.

Mr. MANN. If he gets through to-day, you can go on to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. He can not get through to-day if this request goes through.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us modify the form of the request.

Mr. MANN. Why not proceed regularly now, and to-morrow dispense with Calendar Wednesday and take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-morrow? It seems to me that it is desirable to know "where we are at" on this other situation. The sooner we do the sooner we will get away.

Mr. HENRY. If you obviate the proceedings of Calendar Wednesday we will get away just as quickly, because these rules will be presented to-morrow, and we will get through with those matters. Personally I would prefer to present the rules to-morrow. I would like to have copies made and give them to Members, so that they can see what we can agree on.

Mr. MANN. I can not see a prospect of daylight until we have a vote on that proposition.

Mr. HENRY. What is that?

Mr. MANN. I do not see any chance of daylight or a prospect of getting away until we have a vote on that proposition.

Mr. HENRY. Let the gentleman from Kentucky get up his bill.

Mr. MANN. That probably will not take very long.

Mr. HENRY. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering House joint resolution 331—and other District legislation, I was about to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. HARDWICK. As soon as we get through with that business we can go on with the rule.

Mr. MANN. I thought to-morrow we would take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar. If we have a quorum, I am willing to stay here to-night and finish your bills, or, if you do not get through to-night, to go ahead to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate matters, I would like to be given unanimous consent for the purpose of having the rules suspended for the purpose of taking up the former bill. That would give you the rest of the time.

Mr. MANN. Let us fix a time for debate. It will not take much time on the gentleman's motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I propose 10 or 15 minutes to a side. It will not make any difference to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Some gentlemen desire to be heard on our side. I do not know how much time it will take.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Kentucky will permit me, this resolution was before the House before, and at that time the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], representing his side of the question, spoke for more than an hour. I think he spoke about an hour and a half, and this side has not been heard at all, practically.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is mistaken, because the gentleman himself spoke longer than I did.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE] spoke about 30 minutes. He had an hour left, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] spoke about an hour and 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE] had 49 minutes left, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] had 15 minutes left.

Mr. MANN. The day the former resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky was up we had practically finished general debate. There was an agreement to close general debate, and I was to have 15 minutes out of the 20 that remained. That was on the first resolution. Now, I am willing to yield that under the circumstances. Then a second resolution came up.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I understand now that the gentleman from Kentucky is changing his proposition, and wants to make a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MANN. No; he is not making that motion.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; he is. If that is done, it cuts out our opportunity to offer any substitute.

Mr. MANN. Let us agree upon a time for debate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We will rest it on our 49 minutes and on their 15.

Mr. STAFFORD. Cut it down to half an hour on one side and 10 minutes on the other.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason why we should not stay here to-night if there is any occasion for it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say if it is to come up under suspension of the rules, without any opportunity for us to offer our substitute, we do not care to discuss it at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To offer a suggestion in the interest of the expedition of this business. If it is to be a matter of unanimous consent, it is not necessary that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] should ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to suspend the rules. The gentleman from Kentucky could ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. He does not want to suspend the rules. It takes a two-thirds vote to pass the bill under suspension of the rules. He is taking it up by unanimous consent, anyway.

Mr. MANN. It is in order. He has made his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Let us fix the time for debate on that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would not be in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the Chair has held it in order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then, Mr. Speaker, we are willing that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this resolution, and to take 30 minutes on our side and 10 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER. How much on the gentleman's side?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, that he shall have 30 minutes' time to his side and that the gentleman from Kentucky shall have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Plaza bill and other business from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Only the Plaza bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is all.

The SPEAKER. For the further consideration of the Plaza bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. About what?

Mr. KINDEL. On the subject of the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] objects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the cotton situation. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] can not have that courtesy extended to him, no one else can. I object. I do not think it very gracious of the gentleman's colleague to object, when similar courtesies have been extended to him.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. What became of my request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objected, and that is the end of it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oregon rise?

Mr. SINNOTT. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of representative government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of representative government. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] heard that request?

Mr. MANN. I did.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman intend to object?

Mr. MANN. I do not think I will, although if it was on that side of the House I would. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIFENDERFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Let it be all or none.

PLAZA AWARDS.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases, with Mr. WINGO in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was under discussion before, as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which had had this matter under consideration, I argued and reasoned and believed that the matter of acquiring a part of this property and not all of it was not good business and in the interest of the Government. I still hold to that opinion, and believe that it is the best business policy to acquire all of this property for the park as soon as we possibly can, without crippling our resources. But since that time different conditions have arisen. We are now passing a war-revenue measure to get money. The sum of $600,000 is involved in this matter, and if the payment of that can be delayed, I think it is in the interest of economy and in the interest of good government to delay the expenditure for a park which is not a necessity until the time comes when we can easily make this payment out of the Government funds without impairing the finances of the Government. I simply want to make this statement so that my position may be perfectly understood. I have not changed my ideas or my arguments. There is but very little difference between the report of our committee and the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to value this property, but I do feel that at this time a saving of the expenditure of $600,000 is of value to the Government. [Applause.]

We should pay the small property owners the amount of their awards, as the President and the commission have decided that these awards are fair and just, but as the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad are disposed to violate their former agreement to take the original price for their property, with 6 per cent interest added, I am in favor of letting them await the pleasure of this body and of saving this expenditure at this time.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, we have 30 minutes on our side, and I ask to be notified when I have used 10 minutes.

Our side desire to offer a substitute, and I want to ask if that will be in order now?

Mr. MANN. Not until the joint resolution is read.

The CHAIRMAN. We are proceeding with the general debate now. The substitute will be in order when the joint resolution is read for amendment.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, this matter has been thrashed over upon two different occasions prior to this time. There is quite a difference between the resolution that was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee, and the resolution offered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That difference consists in this, that the resolution offered by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds contemplates the ultimate acquisition of all of this ground which, in 1910, Congress declared its intention to take for the extension of the Capitol Grounds. In other words, the resolution that we propose to offer provides ultimately for the condemnation of the lands which are owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Baltimore Investment Co., all of that land practically belonging to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has included in his resolution a stipulation that the commission, which the resolution provides the President shall appoint, shall take over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.'s holdings at their original cost, with 6 per cent up to the time of the confirmation of the condemnation proceedings that was had on the 27th of February, 1913. I think that proposition is a preposterous one, for this reason: Here is the great Government of the United States attempting to take private property for a public purpose. We are saying to the private owner of that property, "We propose to give you the original cost of that property and 6 per cent up to a certain date." We are not putting the property of the Baltimore & Ohio Corporation upon a par with that owned by individuals. The just and equitable method is pointed out or provided in the resolution which we propose to offer as a substitute; that is, that the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall impanel a jury and let that jury assess the value of this property.

It is said by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON], who just preceded me, that owing to the fact that we are about to pass a war-revenue measure we should not include in this the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad holdings. For my part, I do not think that should cut any figure in this transaction. I do not think it is a business proposition for the Government to take isolated pieces of property, a piece of property here and a piece of property there, which destroys the very purpose for which the appropriation is sought to be made. The object of this scheme originally was to use all of this ground as a whole for the extension and enlargement and beautifying of the Capitol Grounds here. To take one piece of property here and another there would not accomplish anything, and what the Government would do with isolated pieces of property I do not know. In addition to that, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., when the proceedings in condemnation were dismissed in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, filed a motion to set that judgment of dismissal aside, and in all probability will prosecute its contention to the United States Supreme Court, and the resolution offered by the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee will be delayed, with the exception of the payment to private property owners. I say that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is anomalous, because he bases it on a false premise. He bases his position upon the fact, as he says, that Mr. Hamilton, who is the local attorney here of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., in the year 1902 offered to take the original cost of this property, with 6 per cent interest. Nineteen hundred and two is 12 years ago, and to undertake to hold the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to a proposition of that kind, even conceding that they made such a proposition, to my mind is monstrous.

The facts in the case are these: Long prior to the year 1901 it was agitated in Congress and it was agitated here in the District of Columbia that all of the railroads entering the city of Washington should obliterate their grade crossings, and that culminated, I believe, in 1901 in Congress passing an act requiring the Southern Railroad Co., the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to obliterate their grade crossings. That act provided that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. should move its station, which was situated on block 632, down here beyond the Malty Building, from that place to a point opposite where the Senate Office Building now stands. In view of the agitation, and in view of that act of Congress in 1901 compelling it to move its station, compelling it to obliterate its grade crossings, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. acquired the remainder of this property, and was contemplating doing what Congress had compelled it to do by its legislation, namely, moving its station there, elevating its tracks above the street, when in 1903 Congress passed another act repealing that act and establishing the Union Station where it now stands. The result of that legislation was to leave all of this property, after the streets had been raised, on the hands of the Baltimore & Ohio Co. absolutely as unproductive property. To say that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. under those circumstances should not be put on a parity with every other transaction of this kind in condemnation proceedings is an anomalous proposition. I have no license to present the case of the Baltimore & Ohio, but what I am interested in here and why I am pointing this out is this, that this is one proposition, it has one end in view, and that is the extension of the Capitol Grounds, and in order to do that you are compelled to have all of the property.

To take a part of it now and to wait in the future to take a part of it at some other time, or to provide for taking a part of it now and not to provide for taking the whole ultimately, it seems to me, would result in disaster in the future. In other words, it would leave a lot of isolated property on the hands of the Government that would be unprofitable to the Government. I say that we ought to make a plan here and we ought to provide, as was provided by the act of 1910, to acquire the whole of this property, and put everybody upon an equality. The condition of a lot of private owners down there is deplorable. I never thought until this was called to my attention that a great Government like the United States Government could conduct itself so as to absolutely confiscate some of this property. My attention was first called to this by a former constituent of mine, living in my own town, who owned property just this side of the new Post Office Building. He had there a prosperous mill, a prosperous business. Under the act of 1901, which provided for the obliteration of the grade crossings, they went around his property and filled up the streets as high as from 20 to 27 feet. They did it with railroad cars, filled it in, and actually crushed in his building and destroyed his business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] has stepped to his office, and the understanding was that he was to have 10 minutes when he came back. I desire to consume 10 minutes at this time. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether or not he will have more than one speech?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There will be but one more speech on our side

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy 10 minutes. There are three principal differences between the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and that of the gentleman from Kentucky. This matter was before our committee for quite a while. Eighteen months ago there was a condemnation and awards were made for land for the Capitol Plaza. Under the law under which the procedure was had the opinion of the Department of Justice was that the President had a veto power over the acceptance of the awards and payment and taking of the property, because after the provision of law for the adjudication of these questions there was a reservation that upon its approval—that is substantially it; I do not quote the exact language—by the President the property should become the property of the United States. The President disapproved the awards, as I understand, mainly because he believed that the award to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was excessive. The Attorney General was of the opinion that there should be no disapproval of one without the disapproval of all, and for that reason the President felt that he had no authority to settle with the small landowners and not settle with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

Now, in order to meet that situation the President and everybody who knew about the important condition of these people, some of whose property, as has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, having been virtually confiscated, have desired that some means might be reached by which they could be paid. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported a bill providing for a new commission to be composed of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the chairman of that committee of the House, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] did not desire to act upon that commission, and that necessitated further action by our committee. The further action, Mr. Chairman, was that we recommended a new commission, composed of some one to be appointed by the Department of Justice, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, and the other to be Mr. Harts, the officer in charge of the Washington Monument, a public building in the District—I am not sure what his official designation is—and that that commission was to be given the power in the first place to settle and pay all those whose claims had been adjudicated who are willing to settle on the basis of the amount of the award, and in case any would not settle for that amount then the commission is authorized to have further condemnation proceedings in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Now, the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] leaves out entirely the question of condemnation, although we have further stated in our resolution that the President could not pay any more to any landholder than the amount of the award, but that the award itself, if a new condemnation were had, should not be in excess of the former award.

The gentleman in his resolution omits entirely the proposition of a new condemnation. He merely authorizes the President to go ahead with the purchase of the property or to appoint a commission to do so. Now, I think that that would not be a proper way, because we do not want a checkerboard system if we have any Plaza at all. And another reason, Mr. Chairman, the idea of the gentleman from Kentucky is a good one, no doubt—to a very great extent, at least—in that he has eliminated the probability of a new condemnation of the property of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. But suppose some well-to-do property holder who has property that was previously condemned and that condemnation set aside says, "Well, you have no right to take my property by condemnation, and therefore I will not accept the price that you offer." Now, his poorer neighbor across the street, in his strained circumstances, will have to accept the price, but the other gentleman can defy the Government and say, "I will not do it, because you will have to go into the courts and institute condemnation proceedings, and the Johnson resolution does not provide for any." Then, why not provide for a condemnation proceeding, and the commissioners can exercise it or not, at their discretion, and in that way compel settlements without condemnation. Again, Mr. Chairman, we guard it by saying there shall be no award and no purchase in excess of the price heretofore made by the former awards. Therefore I think that the gentleman from Kentucky is mistaken in the idea that he should limit it simply to the purchase, and I feel that at the next session of Congress, or very soon, when they see how it is working, we will have to pass another bill authorizing a condemnation. I see nothing wrong in providing for it in the first place. It is under the supervision of the President, and the President has the same veto power that he had before, and I do not see why gentlemen are so opposed to the personnel of this commission. Something was said in a previous argument in regard to opposition to Mr. Elliott Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds.

Mr. Chairman, if Mr. Woods is dishonest and is a man who has been playing or is likely to play to the interest of the corporations and the great landholders of this city, as I understand it, he is under the Interior Department, and certainly a Democratic administration ought to remove an incompetent and dishonest official, if such a thing is true. Now, a jury is to be selected for the purpose of making the award under the Post resolution. The gentleman in his previous argument, as I recall it, has objected to that. Well, the court orders the jury and the marshal, a Democrat, will summon that jury, and certainly that Democratic marshal ought to find men enough in the District of Columbia to give a just award toward the Government and to the people. Mr. Chairman, I am willing for any kind of checks to be thrown around so that a great corporation can not take advantage of the Government in this manner, but I do not want others to seek to take advantage of the Government while these condemnation proceedings are going on. I would not want the well-to-do landholder to be in a position where he can say "I can hold you up"; but with the safeguards that are thrown around the resolution that will be offered as a substitute by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST], it seems to me that it is very well guarded, and we can certainly trust the President, and can certainly trust the one appointed from the Attorney General's office, and certainly trust those other gentlemen designated, to do right in regard to this matter, and I believe that, with the possibility of condemnation proceedings hanging over them, that every single one of them, except the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, will be settled by purchase and by agreement between the Government officials and the landowners. And when we omit the condemnation, mark the prediction, you will find that the next session, or before a great while, at least, they will be coming to Congress and asking for the power of condemnation in order that they may get what they want—that is, the entire opening, as I understand, between the Capitol and the station. There may be some of those lands that belong to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad that ought not to be taken. That can be determined by the commission. Full power and discretion to act in the premises is lodged with the commission and the President by the Post resolution.

If the commission and jury should go on and condemn lands beyond what they ought to, belonging to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad or anyone else, the President has the same right to reject it that he has always had. And the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky says that no Member of Congress or ex-Member of Congress shall be a member of this commission. I care nothing for that. It is merely immaterial, Mr. Chairman, and does not strike me at all; but what I want is to get action, and action that will be perfect action and conclusive action, so that these people that have waited for 18 long months shall be paid what the Government justly owes them and to which they are entitled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment there are two serious objections to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. One of those objections is the fact that it provides for a commission which is to be paid a salary. Those of us who have been here for any length of time know that whenever you establish one of these paid commissions their term never expires. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have in mind right now a commission which was created in 1908 to procure a map for the District of Columbia, and for which $5,000 was appropriated. There were other appropriations following until finally it reached $25,000, and that commission is just now about to conclude its arduous labors. So I am opposed to this resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, because it provides for a commission to be appointed by the President and to be paid a salary in the discretion of the President, for they will never get through. And it simply means thousands of dollars out of the Public Treasury, and it further means that these poor people who own some of this property will have to wait for years to come before they can get their money from the Government. Another objection that I have to the gentleman's resolution is that I am satisfied it would not hold water in any court in the land. You can not prescribe one rule of action for determining the value of an individual's property and another rule of action for determining the value of a corporation's property. It is simply absurd, and no court in the land of any standing would tolerate such a law for a moment. The resolution to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] is just as well safeguarded as is the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], and more so, and we get out of paying additional salaries, and we provide for a speedy determination of this matter upon a legal, equitable basis, and, if it is adopted, all these property rights will soon be determined.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose for another purpose. The gentleman, my friend from Kentucky, made what I thought was rather a savage attack upon the gentleman who fills the office of Superintendent of Capitol Buildings and Grounds. I have a letter from Mr. Woods which I desire to read. It is addressed to me, and is as follows:

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT,
UNITED STATES CAPITOL BUILDING AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., September 28, 1914.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CLARK: In connection with the discussion of the so-called Plaza awards on the floor of the House, some remarks have been made more or less uncomplimentary to me. For instance, it has been stated that the original commission named by law to acquire the Plaza property, developed into a one-man commission. It has also been stated that the attorney representing the Government during the proceedings was "my" attorney or "his" attorney, leaving the inference that the attorney was representing me personally.

I have therefor thought it wise to formulate a memorandum which I attach hereto and which gives the facts, all of which will show: First, that, so far as our commission was concerned, no vital matter during the entire proceedings was carried out without the presence of all or at least the surviving members of the commission, and that the attorney in the matter was the attorney named by the Department of Justice to carry out the court proceedings.

I hope you will consider this memorandum carefully and use your own judgment in the use of it.

In conclusion, I will state that my presence on any commission named by Congress has never been sought by me. I have simply followed the dictates of the law in my best judgment, and always, so far as I could, act in the interests of the Government.

This is the first time in my 29 years' of public service that an implied reproach has been cast upon my conduct.

Respectfully,
ELLIOTT WOODS,
Superintendent United States Capitol Building and Grounds.

The memorandum is as follows:

It is unnecessary to quote in full the original act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 738), or the subsequent act March 4, 1911 (36 Stats., p. 1414). These and the proceedings of the commission are given in a report to the House (Doc. 1392, 62d Cong., 3d sess.). The primal work of the commission appointed under the act was, and I quote from the report, as follows:

"* * * The commission organized June 28, 1910, and on July 8 advertised for sealed proposals for the sale to the Government of land in the area to be acquired. In addition, copies of the advertisement were mailed to the owners of the property or their agents, so far as they could be ascertained. The proposals received were publicly opened August 10. It is estimated there are 462 parcels of land to be acquired, and proposals were received for 272 parcels, or about 59 per cent, representing 71 per cent of the entire area. After being scheduled and tabulated the proposals and accompanying papers were submitted to the Department of Justice for examination and report. * * *."

For what reason? Because not a member of that commission felt that correct information as to real estate or its proper value could be obtained except by means of expert examination from outside sources, expensive to the Government and beyond the power of the commission to pay for. Therefore the commission unanimously—all members present—decided to submit all bids received to the Attorney General. After submission of the entire matter to the Attorney General we received a letter from him dated October 14, 1910—from the Acting Attorney General—which, among others things, states as follows:

"* * * I have carefully considered said schedules and bids and have been advised by competent persons skilled in real estate values within the 12 squares of ground covered by said act, and I reached the conclusion, and therefore recommend to your commission, that it would be to the interest of the Government and the property owners for the United States to acquire title through condemnation proceedings, by which method I think a fair and reasonable price for the land and improvements could be established. * * *"

Acting under and upon the advice of the Attorney General the commission, on May 9, 1911, determined to reject all proposals, and asked that he institute condemnation proceedings as to squares 634 and 685. This award was concluded April 22, 1912, and a report made by the Attorney General to the commission, which was approved; and an order was passed May 18, 1912—all commissioners present—as follows:

"Ordered, That the recommendation of the Attorney General be approved by the commission, and that the necessary steps be taken by him to make payment and obtain possession of the property referred to on behalf of the United States."

On August 23, 1912, the commission met—all members present—and "being convinced that the most economical method of acquiring the remaining portion of the land to be taken would be to secure an appraisal of the whole in one proceeding, to be paid for as appropriations are made by Congress in accordance with the act of June 25, 1910, and this course having the approval of the Attorney General the commission, on August 23, 1912, requested the Attorney General to institute condemnation proceedings against all the remaining squares except that part of square 633 west of Arthur Place."

In the interim Vice President Sherman died—October 30, 1912.

On January 29, 1913, the Attorney General reported to the commission that he had completed the condemnation proceedings as to squares 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 721, 722, 723, and that part of square 633 lying east of Arthur Place. In his report, and among other things, he says:

"* * * I have given careful consideration to the awards made for each parcel of land, and believe that the same are reasonable, and have to recommend to your commission, if deemed advisable by you, that each and every award be accepted. * * *"

The commission accepted the recommendation of the Attorney General, and at a meeting of the commission February 6, 1913, Mr. Cannon and Mr. Woods—surviving members—present, the record shows:

"Acting upon your advice, the commission has to-day passed the following:

"Ordered, That the recommendation of the Attorney General be approved; at each and every award returned on January 29, 1913, in the proceedings for the condemnation of squares numbered 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 721, 722, 723, and that part of square numbered 633 lying east of Arthur Place, be accepted by the commission, and that the Attorney General be requested to take the necessary steps to secure the confirmation of said award by the court.

"It is respectfully requested that you proceed accordingly.

"Very truly, yours,

"J. G. CANNON,
"ELLIOTT WOODS,
"Commission for Enlarging the Capitol Grounds."

Such are the main facts connected with the original proceedings. Is there any greater tribunal for such adjudication of values such as confronted the commission than the Department of Justice and the courts to which the commission applied for advice?

I think it will be seen that at no stage has that commission been "a one man commission." So far as I am concerned, I never have acted for the commission on any vital point except under the direction of the full commission as it existed prior to and after Mr. Sherman's death.

So far as I know, no representative of any corporation approached us on the subject, either before or after the enactment of the original law.

Some mention was made on the floor that the awards were confirmed four days before the expiration of time for filing exceptions. In this connection I quote from one of the memorandums furnished me by the former attorney of the Department of Justice, who during the time of proceedings was in charge of the case.

"* * * When the awards or total sum became known it was too late to present the same to the Appropriations Committee of the House, so the same was presented to the committee in the Senate and placed in the sundry civil bill, and the award was confirmed four days before the time for filing exceptions by the defendants had expired. But it was necessary to do so in order to present the matter legally to the committee of the Senate.

* * * * * * *

"Having the award confirmed four days earlier than is the usual custom could do no harm to the United States, as the Government thereafter had the right to dismiss the proceedings at any period up to the actual payment of the awards. (District of Columbia v. Cemetery, 5 App. Cas. D. C., 497; Garrison v. City of New York, 21 Wal., 197; Schreiber et al. v. Chicago & E. R. Co., 115 Ill., 340; Norris et al. v. Mayor of Baltimore, 44 Md., 604; United States v. Dickson, 127 Fed. Rep., 774.)

"If they had a right to dismiss all, they had a right to dismiss as to a part, and the awards could have been severed from each other, as there was not one total award for all the squares, but an award for each parcel, each ownership, each owner being a separate and distinct defendant free from all others. If one owner accepted, no other owner had a right to complain, and if another owner was rejected the others could not protest. There is absolutely no reason why the private owner should not have been paid the sum awarded by the court commissioners and the matter left open to deal with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, if that was thought to be necessary, and any statement to the contrary is an error. * * *"

I have no legal knowledge myself of such matters, but present these quotations for your information and consideration.

With reference to the statement that the railroad companies would settle their property for cost plus interest and taxes, my only knowledge on that subject is based on memory and one or two features of record in our proceedings. I remember that after the bids were submitted, on August 10, the commission endeavored to obtain by personal request some further information as to the bids submitted by the representatives of the railroad companies, deeming those bids too high. Replying to our representations, Mr. James McCrea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and at the time acting as president of the Washington Terminal Co., stated in a letter on January 17, 1911, that the prices asked, so far as the Washington Terminal Co. was concerned, and which represented only squares 682, 684, and 721, were based on cost plus the interest at 4 per cent and taxes paid. The total price asked for these squares was $496,234. The total award made on these same properties by the court proceedings was $481,939, so that the award was $14,295 below the asking price.

While I do not have the original bids at hand, I am informed that the awards made by the court for the railroad properties was approximately $140,000 less than they asked in the first proposal.

I want to say, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Woods has never had anything to do with his name being proposed as a member of this commission, but it was a matter entirely with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and he was not even consulted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me for the discussion of this bill I believe I can commence in no better way than by saying that the resolution which I have offered could very well be entitled "A resolution to save to the Federal Government $600,000." I believe that I can just as appropriately say that the resolution which will be offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] as a substitute for my resolution might have for its title "A resolution to pay to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad $600,000 more than it asks for its property."

We know that when the bill for the condemnation of this property passed the House on June 25, 1910, it passed by a majority of only 10 votes, and those of us who were here know reasonably well that that bill would not have passed at all except for the statements made by Mr. Tawney, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to the effect that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was willing to take original cost plus 6 per cent interest for its property. The original cost of that property has been accurately ascertained, and it has been set forth, lot by lot, in a speech heretofore made by me. When this 6 per cent interest has been added to that it is a mathematical certainty that it is now proposed to pay to the Baltimore & Ohio nearly $600,000 more than they asked originally.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not yield. The gentleman must remember that I did not interrupt a single speaker on the other side of this question.

Another thing to which I call the attention of this committee is that it has been sought through the press and otherwise to make this membership believe that property has been taken by the Federal Government, and that houses have been torn down, and that such property has not been paid for. No such condition exists. Every piece of property that has been touched in any way by the Federal Government has long ago been paid for.

Now, the question that arises is simply this: Are you willing for the individual property holders to sell their property to the Federal Government through a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, at a figure not greater than the awards heretofore made, and then let the Baltimore & Ohio property come along later, just as was said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], and acquired, if acquired at all, under another arrangement? The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad is at this minute in court claiming that they have a valid award, and yet here comes another proposition that they be given another award, so that they may have two condemnation awards standing at one time. Then, which are they going to take? Of course they are going to accept the proposition which gives them the greatest amount of money. I say that they should not have that advantage.

Now, then, as to Mr. Woods. I have never intended to question and do not believe I have yet questioned his integrity, but I say that the substitute which will be offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] fixes Mr. Elliott Woods upon that commission. Mr. Elliott Woods, should he become one of a new commission to acquire any of this property by purchase, is committed in advance to the former awards. He is on record as saying that they were just, equitable, and fair, including the awards made to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. He is so committed to that proposition that on the 24th day of February, 1913, he had Mr. Reese T. Strickland, the attorney representing the commission, go into court and ask for the confirmation of those awards four days before exceptions could be filed. Contrary to all rules, no notice was given to anybody, but those awards were confirmed four days before 30 allotted days expired.

Elliott Woods stands committed in that way and in numerous other ways, too many to be mentioned by me in this short discussion, to the confirmation of the amount fixed upon the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad property, which is nearly $600,000 more than they asked for it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] says: "Are we to acquire this property in isolated lots?" Do not the gentleman from Alabama and everybody who was here when this bill passed and everybody who has read about it know that the plan was to acquire it to the extent of $500,000 every year until the whole property was acquired? Yet when we come to carry out the provisions of that law we are criticized for it, and we are told that it should be acquired in one lump instead of in accordance with the act of June 25, 1910.

Now, I wish to emphasize the fact that no property has been touched by the Federal Government that has not been paid for, and that this commission which is to acquire this property by purchase, if it can, and by condemnation, if it must, should be a commission that has not already become committed to a certain price. One-third of this commission which is proposed by the substitute which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] will offer is committed by a formal motion made in court and by the recommendations that he has made to the Attorney General that that $600,000 ought to be paid to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission of three men to complete the acquisition by the United States of so much of the real estate in squares 632, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 721, 722, 723, and also that part of square 633 lying east of Arthur Place, in the District of Columbia, as, in the opinion of the President, is desirable for the extension of the Capitol Grounds. The said commission shall have power to purchase any of said real estate at such a price as the said commission may deem to be the fair market value thereof, not exceeding, however, as to any lot or parcel, the amount of the award made therefor in the condemnation proceeding, district court action No. 1046, recently pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That the purchase price to be paid hereunder for any of said real estate which was owned by either the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. or the Real Estate & Improvement Co. of Baltimore City at the time when said action No. 1046 was instituted shall not exceed the bona fide, actual, original cost thereof to either of said companies, plus 6 per cent interest thereon from the date of purchase by either of said companies until the date upon which the court confirmed the awards made in the aforesaid district court action No. 1046.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. There is but one section to the resolution, the first paragraph of which has been read. Will it be read for amendment by paragraphs, or will amendments be in order only at the end of the reading?

The CHAIRMAN. There is only one section in the resolution, and in cases of that kind the practice is to read it by paragraphs. However, the Chair presumes it is immaterial.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] want to talk on this resolution?

Mr. RAINEY. I only want to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the resolution be treated as one paragraph for purposes of amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as one paragraph for purposes of amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No purchase herein provided for by said commission shall be deemed to be complete until such purchase shall have been approved by the President of the United States. When the President has so approved, and the Attorney General of the United States has certified that all necessary deeds conveying to the United States the unencumbered, fee, simple title to the real estate so purchased have been delivered, the President shall cause payment of the agreed purchase price to be made to the person or persons entitled thereto. All such payments shall be made out of the appropriations heretofore made for the acquisition of said real estate.

Each of the purchases made in pursuance of the provisions of this resolution shall be deemed to be a separate transaction from any other purchase made hereunder.

No person who has, within the last five years, served on any commission or on any jury in any proceeding to condemn real estate in the District of Columbia shall be eligible to be a member of the commission herein provided for; neither shall any ex-Member of Congress or any Member of Congress be a member of said commission.

Each of the commissioners herein provided for shall, before entering upon the duties of the position, state under oath (or affirmation) that neither he nor any member of his family owns or has a lien upon any real estate, or has any financial interest whatever in any real estate within the zone herein set out; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family has, since the institution of the court proceedings hereinbefore referred to, owned any stock in or bond of any corporation which owns land in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family is the creditor of anyone who owns land in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family is an officer of or has any stock in or bond of any bank, trust company, or other corporation which is the creditor of any person who owns real estate within said zone; and, further, that he is not financially indebted to any person, firm, or corporation which owns real estate in said zone, or who has any loan to any person who owns real estate in said zone; and, further, that he is not indebted to or employed by any person, firm, or corporation which owns or has a lien on real estate in said zone; and, further, that neither he nor any member of his family has, since the institution of the court proceeding hereinbefore referred to, accepted or used any pass or other form of free transportation upon any railroad or subsidiary thereof which owns, directly or indirectly, any real estate within said zone.

The members of said commission shall be paid, out of said appropriations and upon requisition of the President, a reasonable compensation for their services, which shall be determined by agreement between the President and the members of said commission before they enter upon the discharge of their duties.

The said commission may employ a clerk and a stenographer to assist in performing the work herein provided, if they deem such assistance necessary; but the compensation of neither the clerk nor the stenographer shall exceed $5 a day while actually engaged in said work.

The improvement and upkeep of the land which may be acquired in the zone herein described and set out shall be paid, one half by the United States and the other half shall be paid out of revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation.

All laws to the extent they are in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 5, strike out all of lines 12 to 16, inclusive.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAINEY. I make that motion for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the address made by the President of the United States this morning at the annual convention of the American Bar Association in this city.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech of the President of the United States, delivered at the annual meeting of the American Bar Association in this city this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have coupled with that a request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman from Illinois couples with that a request that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. I object, Mr. Chairman. There is no connection between the two subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] objects.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks as indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech of the President of the United States delivered at the annual meeting of the American Bar Association in this city this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, we permitted on several occasions the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] to extend his remarks in the RECORD, a privilege which he has enjoyed. I think if one gentleman is permitted to extend his remarks another gentleman ought to be; and I therefore object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. RAINEY. I submit to my colleague that there is quite a difference between printing in the RECORD an address delivered by the President of the United States and a speech prepared by a Member.

Mr. MANN. I think a Member of the House is much better entitled to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting a speech of his own than for the purpose of inserting a speech made by somebody else, although I would not object except for the circumstances. I have no doubt it will eventually be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. POST rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to speak on the amendment?

Mr. POST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I offer House joint resolution 352 as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 352, offered by Mr. POST as a substitute:

"Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 352) providing for a commission to complete the acquisition of lands for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, and providing for the payment thereof.

"Whereas proceedings have been had in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for the condemnation of certain real estate desired by the Government for the extension of the Capitol Grounds, which said land is fully described in said proceedings; and

"Whereas report was duly made by the jury selected under said proceedings as to the value of the several tracts or parcels of land embraced in the said proceedings and the amount that the several and respective owners thereof were entitled to have and receive for the same; and

"Whereas the acts of Congress authorizing the acquirement of said tracts or parcels of land provided that the approval of the President of the United States should first be had before any of the said land should be acquired by the Government and payment made therefor; and

"Whereas the President of the United States has reported to Congress his disapproval of the said report of the jury as to some of the awards made by it; and

"Whereas by reason of the President's disapproval of the said report in parts none of the awards could be paid; and

"Whereas there has been appropriated the sum of $2,823,972.35 for the payment of said awards, the said appropriation having been made in the act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, approved June 23, 1913; and

"Whereas there are other moneys remaining of the appropriations made for such purpose in the sundry civil act of June 25, 1910, and the sundry civil act of March 4, 1911, and the sundry civil act of August 4, 1912; and

"Whereas it is deemed advisable that acquirement should be had of the said tracts or parcels of land and payment made to the owners thereof on an equitable and fair basis as soon as possible: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, etc., That an Assistant Attorney General, to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia and the Washington Monument, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Grounds be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission to complete the acquisition of the said tracts and parcels of land the subject of said proceedings, by either purchase or condemnation, making payment or settlement therefor out of the appropriations heretofore made and herein referred to, and in the acquirement of the said tracts or parcels of land the said commission to have power and authority as follows:

"(a) To acquire by purchase the said tracts or parcels of land at such price or sum as to the commission may seem just and reasonable: Provided, That the price agreed upon shall not exceed the amount of the award made for the same by the jury in the proceedings heretofore referred to, and to make payment therefor out of the appropriation heretofore referred to as having been made for the acquirement of the land in question, upon the owner or owners thereof making deed to the United States conveying to it a good and marketable title clear of all encumbrances: And provided further, That no such purchase shall be made unless the price to be paid has been approved by the President of the United States.

"(b) The said commission shall have the power and authority to proceed to acquire by condemnation proceedings such tracts or parcels of land as it has been unable to purchase.

"(c) That if condemnation proceedings become necessary the commission is hereby authorized to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, by petition in the name of the United States, a proceeding in rem for the condemnation of such tracts or parcels of land; that such a petition shall contain a particular description of the land to be condemned, and the name or names of the owners of the said land and their rights therein, as the same may be ascertained, together with the plan of the lots or parcels of land to be taken; that the said court shall cause public notice of not less than 20 days to be given of the institution of such proceedings by advertisement in three daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia, which notice shall warn and require all persons having any interest in the proceeding to appear in court at a day to be named in said notice and continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order, and in addition to such public notice said court shall cause a copy of said notice to be served by the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, or his deputy, upon such owners of land to be condemned as can be found by such marshal or his deputy within the District of Columbia and upon the tenants and occupants of the same. The said court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for any person interested in such proceeding who may be under disability.

"(d) That after the return of the marshal and the filing of the proof of notice provided for herein the court shall cause a jury of six experienced, judicious, disinterested men, who shall be residents of and freeholders within the District of Columbia, not related to any person or the officer, agent, servant, stockholder, or bondholder of any corporation interested in the proceedings and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States or otherwise interested in such proceedings, to be summoned by said marshal, to which jury the court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the lands or lots to be condemned and are not related to any of the parties interested, and that they will, without favor or partiality, and to the best of their judgments, ascertain the damages to which each owner of land to be taken is entitled at its true market value.

"(e) That the court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power and authority to pass upon any such objections and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury when impaneled to be filled; and after the jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the land and premises affected by such proceedings they shall proceed, in the presence and under the direction of the court, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the United States or by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings.

"(f) That when the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to the court in writing their verdict, setting forth the amount found to be due and award to each owner of the lands or lots to be condemned. The said court shall hear and determine any objection or exceptions that may be filed to a verdict of the jury, and shall have power to vacate and set aside any verdict, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, in which event the court shall cause a new jury of six experienced, judicious, disinterested men, who shall be residents of and freeholders in the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned, who shall proceed to ascertain the damages due the owner of any lot or parcel of land sought to be taken, as in the case of the first jury; that objections and exceptions to the verdict shall be filed within 20 days after the return of the verdict to the court. But no award shall be conclusive unless the same has been approved by the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to disapprove of any award made by the said jury, but his disapproval of particular awards shall not affect more than the award specifically disapproved, and all other awards shall be and remain fixed and conclusive. But such disapproval must be in writing filed in the proceeding within 60 days after the confirmation of the said report, and in the event of no such disapproval the said report as confirmed shall be fixed and conclusive.

"(g) That after 60 days from the confirmation of the award of the jury the commission shall cause the amount of such award, for any parcel or lot taken, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding entailed in the condemnation of such parcel or lot of land, to be paid out of the appropriation hereinbefore or hereinafter made for such purpose, unless the President has disapproved as aforesaid.

"(h) That the said court shall have full power and authority at any time to allow amendments in form and substance in any petition, process, verdict, record, or other proceeding, or in the description of property proposed to be condemned, whenever such amendment will not interfere with the substantial rights of the parties interested. Each juror shall receive as compensation for his services the sum of $5 per day for every day necessarily employed in the duties herein prescribed. In case any of the owners of land taken as herein provided are under disability, or can not be found, or neglect or refuse to receive the money awarded to them, or in case the record is imperfect, or the title to the property is in dispute or uncertain, the amount of the award for the land taken shall be held in trust by the United States for such owners, and the title to any such land or lots shall become vested in the United States.

"(i) That to enable the commission to procure said parcels of land and lots it is hereby authorized to use the sum of $15,000, or such sum as may be necessary, out of any money appropriated for the acquisition of said land."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I will state briefly the differences between this substitute and the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. This substitute provides the complete machinery for the ultimate acquirement of all of this property. It provides who the commission shall be for the acquisition of the property. It provides that the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds shall be a member, that the overseer of the Washington Monument and the public grounds in the District of Columbia shall be a member, and then it provides that the Attorney General of the United States shall designate some Assistant Attorney General as the third member of this commission. All of the three are already United States officials and under pay. The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky provides that the President shall appoint three persons. Who they will be I do not know. I think that a resolution appointing public officials already under pay is much better than what the gentleman provides for.

There are more than 350 of these pieces of property. The title to every piece must be looked into, and therefore it has been thought wise that the Attorney General should designate some assistant in his office as a member of this commission, competent to look after that branch of the work of acquiring the property.

The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has what is to my mind a very peculiar clause with reference to the pay of the commission which he proposes the President shall appoint. That is found on page 5 of his resolution. It is provided there that the compensation shall be agreed upon before they enter upon their duties, and, as I conceive it, before they know what their duties will be. No one can determine in advance the amount of work involved in seeing all of these property owners, determining the value of their property and the title to it. It seems to me to be a very absurd proposition.

As was said by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has anything against Mr. Elliott Woods, he owes it to this Congress to make it known, and he should make it known. The gentleman from Kentucky has attempted to get converts to his resolution upon the bare statement that he is proposing to save to the Government of the United States $600,000. Now, I want to call attention to some pertinent facts. The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky provides that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. shall be paid the original cost of their property, with 6 per cent interest up to January 27, 1913. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., under an act of Congress permitting it to do business in the District of Columbia, bought, in 1833, almost a century ago, its first piece of property in this city, and the property upon which the old Baltimore & Ohio depot stood upon until the building of the new station. It acquired another block northeast of that block in 1876, and that was all the property that it owned in this District until the act of 1901, the object of which was to compel the railroad company to obliterate their grade crossings and move their station. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says he is going to save the Government of the United States $600,000; but I have taken occasion to investigate the value of this property, and if you take the original cost of all the property owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., or the Realty Co., which is a holding company of the Baltimore & Ohio, and compute 6 per cent interest on it, the value of its property will amount to $1,638,961.88. The amount of the award is $1,731,927, which is only $92,965.12 in excess of the original cost and 6 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POST. Yes; but I hope the gentleman will make it brief, because I have not much time.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman include interest for all this time, nearly 100 years?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. While the railroad company owned and occupied and used the property?

Mr. POST. That is true; and you must allow something for the increment, the increase in value.

Mr. SIMS. I did not so understand it. I understood that it only allowed interest from the time when they ceased to use the property.

Mr. POST. Oh, no; this resolution is to allow them 6 per cent interest on the original cost.

In the debate of July 13, 1914, on Senate joint resolution 129 it was argued that the properties of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. included in said condemnation proceedings were acquired and held for speculative purposes.

This argument may be refuted by the acts and records of Congress itself. The squares and parts of squares owned by the said railroad company in said area of condemnation are 632, 681, 680, 682, 683, 684, and 721.

Square 632 was acquired under authority of the act of Congress of 1833, authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, under its Maryland charter, to extend its lines within the District of Columbia, and this square, with the approval of Congress and of the District government, was occupied by said company as a passenger station, and continued to be so occupied until compelled by Congress to abandon the station and to go into a union station, as provided under the act of Congress of February 28, 1903.

Square 681 was also acquired under congressional warrant in 1870 for a freight station, and was used as a freight station and yards until Congress by said act of February 28, 1903, compelled its abandonment in the latter part of 1907.

The remaining squares included in said condemnation, to wit, squares 680, 682, 683, 684, and 721, were acquired in anticipation and under the provisions of the act of February 12, 1901, which was enacted by Congress for the primary purpose of eliminating grade crossings in the District of Columbia and to provide more comfortable and attractive station facilities. This act required the Baltimore & Ohio to construct new terminals along lines stated and defined in said act and located south of the present Union Station, and included the very lands concerned in this condemnation proceeding.

The abolition of grade crossings, which had been considered in both Houses of Congress for many years prior to 1901, culminated in the act referred to, and when the location, even prior to the passage of the act, became fixed, the company begun in 1898 to purchase the property which it would be compelled under said act to acquire.

Almost immediately after the property required for location under the act of 1901 had been acquired, the movement to bring the railway companies entering Washington into a Union Station and terminals was inaugurated by the chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia and others, and this movement resulted in the passage of the act of February 28, 1903, locating the present Union Station and terminals within the area specified in said act, and this rendered inapplicable for railroad purposes squares 632—which was the site of the old Baltimore & Ohio depot—681—which was occupied by its freight facilities—and all of the property acquired under the act of 1901 in 680, 682, 683, 684, and 721.

A small segment of the property involved and contained in one of the squares enumerated, being 721, was acquired under the Union Station act of February 28, 1903.

So that there is not a foot of Baltimore & Ohio property involved in these condemnation proceedings that was purchased speculatively or that was purchased without the warrant of Congress, and most of it was purchased under compulsory legislation by Congress.

But it is argued that this property, being purchased from 1898 to 1903, has been held, although not needed for the requirements of the Union Station act, until now for speculative purposes. This argument is as unfounded and as unjustifiable as the statement of a purchase for speculative purposes.

When the Union Station act of 1903 was passed, and until 1908, when the Union Station and terminals and approaches had been completed, all of the property, not only that included in the Union Station area but adjoining it, and particularly the property now in question, was in such condition as to make any sale or disposition thereof impossible. A new grade had to be established; large fills had to be made; new streets had to be laid out approaching the Plaza; the Plaza itself had to be completed, and, as stated, such conditions existed as to render any sale or thought of sale impracticable.

By reference to the records of Congress it will be shown that in 1909 and 1910 the purpose to acquire this property began to be agitated, and this agitation resulted in the declaration by Congress, in the act of June 26, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 738), to ultimately acquire all of the certain squares therein enumerated, including the squares covered by the condemnation proceedings now under consideration, for the enlargement of the Capitol grounds, and so forth.

When this act was passed it was impossible for anyone to make a sale of that property, shadowed by the declared purpose of Congress, as stated in the act referred to.

A part of this property was acquired under the authority of the act of 1833, and used, so long as Congress permitted its use, by the company for its old station and freight facilities. The rest of the property was acquired for the location under the act of Congress of 1901, and its use for railroad purposes prevented by the passage of the act of Congress of 1903. The building of the Union Station and terminal, ordained by Congress, prevented a sale until by the declared purpose of Congress to acquire this property a sale was made impossible.

It was claimed also in argument that the awards made for the railroad property were excessive. These awards were fixed by a commission authorized by Congress and appointed by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and composed of men of recognized fairness, integrity, and ability, and a comparison will show that the awards made to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad for its property are no greater, but in many instances less, than the awards made to the owners of private property in the same area.

It was argued, again, that the Baltimore & Ohio at one time agreed to accept a lesser price for this property, and a statement made by Representative Tawney in a debate, when the act of June 26, 1910, was being considered, that the Baltimore & Ohio people agreed to take the original cost plus 6 per cent.

In further proof of an agreement to take a lesser sum for this property, a letter of George E. Hamilton, addressed to Maj. John Biddle on April 10, 1902, is referred to. This letter was written prior to the passage of the Union Station bill of February 28, 1903, and when the District Commissioners—the plan and purpose of said bill of 1903 being under discussion in the Senate committee—desired to furnish approximately the cost to the District of the Plaza and approaches to the Plaza, provided in said bill to be acquired and made at the cost of the District. The company furnished the commissioners with the cost price of those squares in which some property would be needed for the Plaza and street approaches.

There had been a tacit understanding between Mr. Loree, then president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and the District Commissioners, that the company would convey to the District of Columbia such of its property as was required for the Plaza and street approaches under the bill at about its cost to the company.

The letter of Mr. Hamilton, written in 1902, did not place a price on all the holdings of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. within the area now being considered and condemned, but simply stated the price to be charged for the small portions of this large area desired by the District, and these portions to be used for Plaza and street approaches to the Union Station, both uses increasing the value of the remaining holdings of the company, and even if it could be tortured into an offer for the entire holdings of the company, the offer was not accepted, and the Government instituted its condemnation proceedings many years later.

To show that even the District did not construe this as a continuing offer, in its further dealings and ultimate purchase from the railroad company for Plaza and street approaches to the Union Station, cost, interest, and taxes paid were the three elements considered and combined in final valuations.

Since 1902 the railroad company has paid to the District large sums of money as the annual taxes on these squares and lots. The taxes for the year ending June 30, 1914, on the railroad holdings within the condemnation area amounted to $18,000.

The next communication made by Col. Biddle on this subject was of date February 17, 1904, and his letter is as follows:

There will soon be available an appropriation which will allow the immediate purchase or condemnation of land for the Plaza and intersecting streets near the new Union Station It is understood by this office that a large percentage of the land needed is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Washington Terminal Co., and the Real Estate & Improvement Co. Will you kindly advise this office what steps will be necessary on its part to acquire this land? Will you make offers for all or parts of the following lots, viz: In square 680, lots 11 to 17; in square 681, lots 3 to 14; and in square 682, lots A, B, C, H, 6 to 9, and 11? Although other property will be needed east of First Street, it is not understood that your company owns any lots in this territory needed by the District.

Very respectfully,

JOHN BIDDLE,
Major, Corps of Engineer, United States Army,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

Mr. GEORGE E. HAMILTON,
Attorney, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.,
Washington, D. C.

The subject matter of this letter was considered, and on April 21, 1904, answered, as follows:

APRIL 21, 1904.

Maj. JOHN BIDDLE,
Engineer Commissioner.

DEAR SIR: In your letter of the 17th of February, 1904, referring to the readiness of the District of Columbia to acquire by purchase or condemnation the land for Plaza and intersecting streets near the Union Station, you request to be advised what steps will be necessary on the part of the District to acquire land so needed and now owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and further, that the company, if it desires to sell, will name the price of lots 11 to 17, in square 680, hereafter referred to for convenience as parcel No. 1; lots from 3 to 14, in square 681, hereafter referred to as parcel No. 2; and lots A, B, C, 6 to 9, and 11, in square 682, hereafter referred to as parcel No. 3.

Parcel No. 1 was purchased by the company on December 8, 1898, for the sum of $100,000, and is unimproved property. The company will sell the property included in this parcel to the District for the sum of $100,000, with interest at 6 per cent, from December 8, 1898, to the date of conveyance to the District, and with taxes paid by the company during the same period. This will make the total purchase price of this property about $135,000.

Parcel No. 2 was purchased by the company as far back as 1870 at the average cost of 80 cents per foot, and some of this property was unused until recent years. The company thinks that it would be only reasonable to hold this property at $1.50 per foot, which would be very little more than the average paid by the company for property similarly located in that neighborhood and purchased in 1898–99, with some allowance for carrying charges.

Early in 1902 we suggested that this property might be sold at $1.40, but because of the two years that have passed we think that $1.50 should now be paid The aggregate footage of lots in this parcel, referred to in your letter of the 17th of February, is 120,431, which at $1.50 would make $180,646.50.

In parcel 3, lots A, B, and C are unimproved, and were purchased October 23, 1899, at $4,796.50. These lots are now offered for the purchase price, with interest at 6 per cent from April 23, 1899, and taxes for the same period, which would amount to about $6,350.

Of the same parcel lots H, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 11 were purchased at various periods from 1898 to 1902, at the aggregate cost of $20,050; and as these properties are supposed to have been rented, we omit taxes and interest, thus making the consideration for all lots in this parcel described by the District about $26,400.

In regard to the foregoing, the figures named are approximate only, as it is impossible to calculate the interest until the negotiation is completed.

The Union Depot act, in section 5, authorizes the District Commissioners to sell or equitably exchange any portion of existing public space abandoned by reason of the adjustment of streets as an approach to the plaza or circle at Massachusetts Avenue, and the company would be willing to exchange, foot for foot, property owned by it for the portions of existing streets when such abandoned parts adjoin the property of the company not needed by the District.

If it should happen that only a part of any of the lots included in the foregoing parcels should be needed by the District, the company is willing to sell such parts, provided the remaining parts are not rendered unavailable.

Yours, very truly, GEORGE E. HAMILTON.

On July 26, 1904, the following communication from the commissioners, signed by William Tindall, secretary, was made:

JULY 26, 1904.

Mr. GEORGE E. HAMILTON,
Attorney at Law, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 19th instant, I am directed by the commissioners to submit the following proposition in regard to the purchase and transfer of land within the proposed lines of the Plaza and streets leading to the new Union Railroad Station.

Two blue prints are inclosed showing, in red, property that it is now desired to purchase under the following terms:

First. That the railroad company retain the parts of lots 15, 16, 17, in square 680, marked in black.

Second. That the parts of the streets E and F, marked in green, be exchanged for parts of lots 14, 15, 16, and 17, in square 680, the portion exchanged being equal in surface measurement.

Third. That the District pay for lots 11, 12, 13, and the small residue of lot 14, in square 680, the sum of $52,652.70, or at the rate of $2.70 per foot. This is based on the price quoted by you and 6 per cent interest to the present date, together with all taxes since December, 1899.

Fourth. That the lots (with improvements) H, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 11, in square 682, be accepted at the prices paid by the railroad.

Fifth. That portions of lots 13 and 14, in square 681, be accepted at the price of $1.50 per foot, as offered by you, and that lots A, B, C, and parts of 18 and 19, in square 682, marked in red, be accepted at the price paid by the Baltimore & Ohio, plus 6 per cent interest from date of purchase and plus the amount of taxes from date of purchase to the present date.

The above is submitted with the condition that any compensation shall be waived for damage arising from changes of grade in front or along any new frontages created by reason of this exchange or purchase, and that you file a written assent to that effect and also to the oral agreement already made by Mr. Loree waiving claims for damages to property belonging to the railroad by reason of changes of grade in connection with the terminal work.

Very respectfully, WILLIAM TINDALL, Secretary.

This letter was formally acknowledged on July 28, 1904, and on August 20, 1904, answered as follows:

AUGUST 20, 1904.

To the honorable COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

GENTLEMEN: In further reply to your letter of July 26, containing proposition for the exchange and purchase of properties within the Plaza area, I am directed by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to say that the general lines of the proposition made by you are satisfactory.

The company wishes, however, to call your attention to the fact that in order to square out their holdings in the exchanges it is desirable for them to own the segments of lots 18, 19, and 20, in square 680, lying between the north line of E Street as it now exists and the south line of the new street which cuts through said square 680. These parts of the lots named are small, and I have no doubt that you will be willing to exchange the same, the company to give an equal number of feet in said square 680 for the parts of lots 18, 19, and 20, as above described.

Between the measurements of the District and the company with regard to the areas of properties exchanged there is some difference, but these differences can be adjusted by survey of the property, and the transaction will, of course, be governed by the exact measurements according to such survey.

With these suggestions assented to, the company will accept the proposition of the commissioners, provided that the remaining property owned by the company and desired by the District within said area will be purchased on like terms.

Referring to the question of damages, I am authorized by the company to state that any oral agreement or understanding made or entered into by and between the District Commissioners and Mr. Loree will be regarded by the company, and that at the time of the transfer of the properties herein referred to a waiver for damages for changes of grade in front or along any new frontages created by reason of this exchange or purchase will be filed with the commissioners.

The interest, taxes, etc., to be computed to the date of the transfer.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE E. HAMILTON,
Division Counsel.

On November 18, 1904, the following communication was made by Col. Biddle:

NOVEMBER 18, 1904.

Mr. GEORGE E. HAMILTON,
Division Counsel, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Century Building, City.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of November 17 regarding the memorandum of agreement sent you with my letter of November 14, in which you state that the agreement is satisfactory in substance except the last item as to lots 18 and 19, square 682, where the price is fixed at 90 cents, which price you think should be 92½ cents, which is the price you state was paid by you for the property, I would state that the price of 90 cents was obtained from a memorandum showing the acreage price of several lots including 18 and 19, and this office agrees with you that the price should be 92½ cents.

Very respectfully,

JOHN BIDDLE,
Major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

On June 14, 1905, the negotiations indicated in the foregoing letters culminated in the following order of the commissioners and acceptance by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.:

JUNE 14, 1905.

Ordered, That the order of December 20, 1904, relative to the exchange and purchase of properties with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is hereby modified to read as follows:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia hereby agree to the following exchanges and purchase of properties with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., viz:

First. The District agrees to convey to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. a part of F Street within the following metes and bounds * * * containing 5,703.76 square feet. Also a part of E Street within the following metes and bounds * * * containing 17,300.4 square feet.

Second. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. agrees to deed to the District of Columbia all of lots 11, 12, 13, and 14 and parts of lots 15, 16, and 17, in square 680, in the city of Washington, D. C., as included within the following metes and bounds * * * containing 42,575.37 square feet, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to be paid at the rate of $2.70 per square foot for 19,571.21 square feet of the land described in the above metes and bounds, and the remainder of said area, 23,004.16 square feet, to be in exchange for the 23,004.16 square feet contained in that portion of E Street and F Street to be conveyed to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., as set forth in paragraph 1.

Third. That the District of Columbia pay to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. for all those parts of lots 13 and 14, in square 681, in the city of Washington, D. C., contained within the following metes and bounds, * * * containing 9,772 square feet, at the rate of $1.50 per square foot.

Fourth. That the District of Columbia pay to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. for lots A, B, and C, in square 682, in the city of Washington, D. C., containing 3,332 square feet, the sum of $4,796.50, with interest at 6 per cent from October 31, 1899, to date of transfer, together with taxes between said dates. Also parts of lots 18 and 19, in said square, included within the following metes and bounds * * * containing 1,711.89 square feet of ground, at the rate of 92½ cents per square foot, with interest at 6 per cent from November 23, 1898, to date of transfer, together with taxes between said dates.

It is understood in the above agreement that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. shall pay all taxes on squares 680 and 681 up to December 1, 1904, the taxes on all other lots affected by this agreement being paid as cited above.

The auditor of the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to cause papers of transfer in above cases to be prepared, it being understood that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. shall furnish good and sufficient title; and if it can not be done as to any particular lot, the agreement shall apply to such lots as a clear and sufficient title can be given.

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
HENRY L. WEST,
CHESTER HARDING, Acting,
Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The above agreement is accepted on behalf of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.

HUGH L. BOND, Jr.,
Second Vice President and General Attorney.

All of these are on record in the office of the District Commissioners and may be seen; and from this negotiation, of record as aforesaid, it appears that all of the property required by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for Plaza and approaches, was based upon the understanding between Mr. Loree and the District Commissioners that the company would sell for about what it stood the company in cost, carrying cost of taxes and interest, and where opportunity afforded the foot for foot exchange between the District and the company was made; and, further, that taxes and interest were not charged on property for which the company, from the time of purchase to the time of sale to the District, received in rents sufficient amount to cover taxes and interest thereon.

This agreement between Mr. Loree and the District government was made, no doubt, on the ground that the improvements to be made by the District would help the project of making the Union Station a monumental structure, and would also increase the value of the remaining property owned by the company and its availability for sale.

The conditions and reasons that entered into this negotiation with the District are not in any wise applicable to the present condemnation proceedings or the purpose of the Government to acquire this property. The District was taking only a small part of these squares, and by taking it would make what remained more valuable for sale.

It will thus be seen from the voluminous corresopndence passing between the railroad company and the representatives of the District of Columbia that the offer on the part of the railroad company contemplated only ground now included in the Union Station Plaza, and in the streets and approaches to the same; that it could not in the very nature of things have included the blocks and squares now sought to be acquired. Upon this offer the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, bases his whole argument. If mistaken in this respect, then his argument fails. The old Roman maxim, "Falsus in Uno, falsus in Omnibus," is applicable to his situation.

He has sought to gain converts to his resolution upon the assertion that he is attempting to save the Government $600,000 from the rapacious maws of a soulless corporation. Anyone giving the subject careful consideration will soon discover that he is just as much mistaken in this respect as he is in regard to the alleged offer on the part of the railroad company. I doubt seriously whether any of the property of the company was appraised far from its real value by the commissioners in the condemnation proceedings. In proof of this I herewith append a comparison of valuation for taxation of the company's property and the award made by the condemnation commission. The assessors' valuation in gross exceeds the awards by $44,120.

Comparison of valuation for taxation and awards of condemnation commission, plaza proceedings.

	Assessors' valuation.	Award.
Square 632 (Baltimore & Ohio)	$360,969	$294,829
Square 681 and connections (Baltimore & Ohio)	763,513	725,932
Square 682 (Baltimore & Ohio)	160,671	239,933
	1,285,153	1,260,685

In other words, the tax assessors valued the property in these three squares belonging to the Baltimore & Ohio $24,468 more than the amount awarded by the commission.

Without desiring to cumber the RECORD, I have selected the first four parcels in each of the squares under consideration, except squares 633 and 680, where the division and combination of parcels make comparison difficult, and find the following:

Mr. JOHNSON, the gentleman from Kentucky, seems to be obsessed with the notion that everybody connected with the former condemnation proceedings were imbued with ulterior motives. In his speech upon this question delivered in the House on July 13 last he not only impugned the railroad officials, the condemnation commissioners, the commission appointed under the act of June 25, 1910, the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, but took a rap at ex-President Taft and members of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the House, as well as the gentleman from Ohio. In this position I do not concur. I believe in the honesty and integrity of humanity in general; that President Taft and all the officials who were connected with or had anything to do with not only the enactment of the law by Congress of June 25, 1910, in which the Congress declared its avowed purpose to ultimately acquire all of this property, but that the Government officials connected with its acquisition and the commission constituted by Congress for that purpose acted in the utmost good faith toward all concerned. In conclusion let me say, no matter which of the two resolutions under consideration may be ultimately approved, it is my hope and earnest wish that the unfortunate victims of this congressional action whose property has been rendered unproductive, and who have been subject to burdensome taxes and the payment of heavy interest for a period now of over four years, may speedily be relieved from the unfortunate circumstances in which we find them, a situation of our making without their consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, regardless of the researches made into the value of this property by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] the plain, naked fact remains that with 6 per cent interest added to the prices which the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. paid for the land a net saving to the Federal Government of nearly $600,000 may be made if the original resolution be adopted.

The passage of this substitute would permit the bringing about of the condition which existed when the President was compelled to reject this original proposition. If the substitute should be adopted, that condition can again be presented to the President, and he ought not again to be confronted with that situation and again be compelled to hold off the individual property owners, if he should think best to do so, while the value of the Baltimore & Ohio property was being ascertained.

You can say all you please about this proposition. All those who are seeking to get this $600,000 for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad can scratch their nails off, but this is one transaction that can not be covered up, and in favor of fairness and equity to the United States, once in the history of this Congress, I hope that this substitute will be voted down.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I can not agree with the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that there would be any two awards pending at all. The history of the legislation, so far as the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. is concerned, is that that railroad company appealed from the decision of the court sustaining the motion of the representative of the Government to dismiss the proceedings, and in the statement that the appeal is still pending the gentleman is correct. I think that a commission of officials holding office under this administration would certainly not proceed to a second condemnation of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. property while that case was pending in the courts. They do not have to proceed with the condemnation; they could do it or not. Then, Mr. Chairman, if that dismissal is sustained we will be in the attitude of having no condemnation and only the right to purchase, because another condemnation could not be had. I am not standing here as the champion of any railroad company or any other corporations, but I have not lost faith in officials in this country. I believe that the three men named as commissioners in the Post resolution could be trusted to do right between the Government and any individual or corporation. The commissioners do not even select the jury. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] goes into extended details in his resolution as to who shall be the jurors and who shall not. A jury that will be selected by the marshal must, under the Post resolution, be composed of disinterested people, just like the chairman's State requires the jury shall be that tries ad quod damnum proceedings, just as substantially every State requires; and to go on and signify that they shall be this or that, when the general term that they shall be disinterested and qualified persons is all that your legislature or mine has ever sought to demand, seems to me is simply a work of supererogation. It does not frighten me to say that there shall be two awards pending, because that thing will never happen. Those commissioners never will say that we are going to have another condemnation proceeding and another award when an award is already pendente lite in the courts of the country, and I think that is a scarecrow conjured up in the fertile imagination of the able and distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask for information only—I do not want to make a speech upon this subject—do both propositions require that we must take all this property or none?

Mr. BURNETT. It does not. That is the very purpose of both the propositions—to segregate them and allow settlement for one without settlement for the other.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the proposition advocated by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], to be that we can take these individual pieces of property at a sum not exceeding the award, without passing on the other, letting the other alone. Now, at a time like this, when we are levying war taxes and when some portions of our country are almost ruined by a war for which they are in no way responsible, why is it necessary to appropriate millions of dollars to buy a railroad company's property at all, at any price? The property is going to stay there. We are taking it simply to further beautify the most beautiful city in the United States. Why not let it go and take our chances hereafter as to further enhancement of value and pay individual people for their property, because they will be hurt if it is not done. I do not understand why it is, when we have to levy war taxes in order that the Government may run at all, that we are under any obligations to buy the property of any railroad company to beautify this or any other city.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. POST. The gentleman has not given the resolution consideration.

Mr. SIMS. I am asking for information.

Mr. POST. It is not necessary to have a condemnation proceeding in order to get all of this isolated property.

Mr. SIMS. That which belongs to the individuals?

Mr. POST. This is not an original proposition at all.

Mr. SIMS. But as I understand the gentleman's proposition is that we will go ahead and acquire this railroad property.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no.

Mr. POST. It does not require them to do it.

Mr. SIMS. But it permits the commission to do it.

Mr. POST. The gentleman is a lawyer and he understands this, that while this resolution provides for condemnation proceedings, if Congress passes the resolution, nevertheless if this commission should undertake to condemn the property under this proceeding, it would be met with the proposition that the court already has jurisdiction over the matter at the present time, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. having a suit now pending.

Mr. SIMS. But it could dismiss the appeal and give the commission jurisdiction.

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly it can. I do not think it is necessary in order to take care of these individuals who are hurt that we should also make it incumbent to undertake possibly the paying of the award of the court for this railroad property or purchasing it in any way. We can cease to further beautify for a few years at least until we cease to further tax the people, in order that the Government may run at all, in extraordinary amounts and at extraordinary rates, made necessary by the European war. Besides, the property may be worth less in the future than it is now. I do not understand why it should be incumbent upon this Congress to pay the original cost of property with 6 per cent interest which has been owned nearly a hundred years and occupied by the railroad company all of that time and used for its business.

Mr. POST. But that is the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SIMS. I understand that; but even after calculating the interest upon this property, giving them interest from the time they acquired it, nearly 100 years ago, it still makes the amount of the payment $600,000 less than this jury has awarded them. The gentleman from Kentucky, I understand, accepts the proposition in lieu of the award as made, not because he advocates giving them interest for a hundred years, or nearly so, at 6 per cent, but because to do so is a great saving to the Government rather than to accept this award, which is $600,000 more than the interest on the property that they have had the use of all of these many years, and the accretions in value of that property that have been brought about by the improvement and growth of the city, due to the millions of dollars of appropriations by Congress out of the people's pockets both in Nation and city.

Let us wash our hands of this whole railroad proposition and settle the other matter as to individual awards, and wait to beautify that ground until taxes can be collected under a normal rate and not at a time when we are having to increase them on account of a foreign war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. POST) there were—ayes 17, noes 30.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for tellers. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Six gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution as amended, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WINGO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 331 and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 5614) to provide for the appointment of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and of consuls be taken from the Speaker's table and passed. SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect on the day of its approval by the President, when all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know just what this bill does.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. This bill, Mr. Speaker, provides that the secretaries to embassies and legations and the appointment of consuls shall be appointment to classes and not to posts. That is the principal purpose of the bill, and it rearranges the secretaries and consuls into classes so that when an appointment is made it is to a class, and that appointment is confirmed by the Senate, and then, if the President desires to transfer a consul or a secretary of an embassy or legation from one post to another in the same class he can do so without having to send the nomination to the Senate for confirmation, and at this particular time the State Department is very anxious that this bill should become a law, because in some posts in Europe the secretaries are not very much overburdened with work, and at other posts the work is greater than the force authorized by law to be sent there now can do, and there are some other——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does this increase the cost of the Diplomatic and Consular Service?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I think it will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The estimate is it will increase the cost of the Consular Service about $31,000 and the secretaries of the Diplomatic Service about $19,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I heard some reference in the reading of the bill about detailing some of these secretaries to the State Department at Washington.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There is a provision of that kind. The State Department frequently has one or two—sometimes more—secretaries in the State Department to give information to the department about a particular section of the world about which it is anxious to acquire information, and under the present system when those secretaries are brought from their posts to the State Department here they have to take the position of a clerk in the State Department and get only the salary of a clerk instead of the salary of a secretary, which is not fair, and there is a provision which permits the State Department to detail these secretaries to the State Department at the salary the secretary was getting as secretary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not it provide he may remain there about four years?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Not exceeding three years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And an additional year after that.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Two years and an additional year after that, if it is thought absolutely necessary to keep him there. Then there is a further provision in reference to secretaries and consuls, that when they come to this country and it is desirable, in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce, to have them go about the country and interview boards of trade and confer with business men that their allowance and expenses can be paid. The Senate passed this bill unanimously, and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs reported it unanimously, and the State Department, I will say, is exceedingly anxious that this bill pass now, so that the congested work at posts like Paris, London, and Berlin can be relieved by the transfer of secretaries from places where the work is not so great at this time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just stated that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs reported this bill unanimously. Of course the gentleman did not refer to this print of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I referred to a similar bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman referred to House bill 18654. Is that the same?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether it is the same?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. There will be a few little changes in it.

Mr. MANN. I want to know what they are. We have no print of this bill. As far as I know, it has never been printed.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It is practically the same. There is a difference of the date when the bill will take effect, and one of the classes of consuls is put at $4,500 in the Senate bill, whereas the House bill had it $5,000, and it ought to be $5,000; and there are one or two amendments which I will offer.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman will remember that I spoke to him at one time in reference to what effect this would have on the appropriations we have already made. We make appropriation for certain posts at certain salaries now. That is carried in the Diplomatic appropriation act. Now, what effect will the passage of this bill have in connection with the appropriations already made? There are no appropriations made for these places?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. After I had the conversation with the gentleman from Illinois I conferred with one of the Assistant Secretaries of State, and we agreed upon an amendment that would leave available all the appropriations that have been made up to this time for the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. MANN. Is that amendment incorporated in the Senate bill?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. No; I was going to offer it. I have it here in my hand.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] had expected to offer an amendment or so to this bill, as I understand from him, probably along the same lines as certain sections of the bill formerly introduced by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that those are what are known as the civil-service provisions of the bill as I originally introduced it, and we found that the bill could not become law with those provisions in it. And while the Committee on Foreign Affairs has a number of gentlemen on it who were strongly in favor of the civil-service principle, among them Mr. LINTHICUM, of Maryland, and Mr. COOPER, of Wisconsin, and others, they found that the bill would not become a law in any shape if it were insisted that those provisions be kept in it, and so I introduced another bill leaving those provisions out in order that the State Department might get the benefit of being able to transfer these secretaries and consuls at this time, when they are particularly needed. And I hope for that reason, in the interest of the public service and the foreign service, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will not offer his amendments at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, can I get the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] into this? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Union Calendar bill. If consent is given, it may require the House to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider it. I do not know how long it would take, or whether any agreement can be made. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas expects to bring in a rule immediately?

Mr. HENRY. I am waiting now. I understood this would take only a few moments.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I would like to have unanimous consent to this, that as soon as the gentleman from Texas gets through with the matters provided for in the rule this bill be in order and we take it up by unanimous consent then.

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POU. Reserving the right to object, there is one other rule to follow the rule the gentleman from Texas has.

Mr. MANN. Supposing the gentleman, then, asks unanimous consent that this bill be treated as a privileged bill, with the right to take it up——

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that the gentleman make that request later. In the meantime we will have an opportunity to examine it. I would like to see the amendments that are to be proposed.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I can show the gentleman the amendments in two minutes. They are simply to provide that the appropriation that has been made for the Diplomatic and Consular Service shall be still available. That is one amendment. The other amendment is simply to change the date at which this bill shall go into effect. Another amendment is to change $4,500 to $5,000. The Senate made a mistake as to a class of consuls and put them in a $4,500 class when they belong in the $5,000 class. It is a bill that the State Department has been urging for weeks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that I shall object, but I hope the gentleman will make his request after the disposition of the rule.

Mr. MOORE. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will not press his unanimous-consent request now. There are some questions about this bill that some of us will want to look into.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. All right, Mr. Speaker; I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Texas how many rules he has?

Mr. HENRY. Only one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. HENRY. There is another rule to follow, but the gentleman from North Carolina will present that, and I now present the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 656 (H. Rept. 1199).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider S. 6398 and S. 6505 in the order enumerated; that said bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and shall be the continuing order of the House until disposed of; that there shall be not exceeding one hour's general debate on each bill and not exceeding 30 minutes on each bill for amendment under the five-minute rule, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bills. At the conclusion of the debate on all said bills each bill, with amendments thereto, shall be voted upon separately, and the previous question shall be considered as separately ordered on each bill with amendments to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit on each of said bills: Provided, That it shall be in order for the House to consider the following amendment to S. 6398, which said amendment shall not be subject to any point of order under the general rules of the House, to wit:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and in State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, the sum of $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The said Secretary shall make such deposits under the terms of this act and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him to carry out this act. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the securities he is now authorized or required by law to exact of the banks in which the funds of the United States are deposited, is authorized and hereby directed to accept as security for the deposits directed to be made in this act cotton warehouse and tobacco warehouse receipts, where the cotton or tobacco thereby represented has been fully insured, at a valuation that represents the fair market value of the cotton or tobacco covered by such receipts. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same, under reasonable terms and conditions, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or the owners of lands upon which same was produced during the year 1914, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the terms and conditions under which these deposits shall be loaned by the banks that accept the same.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and said notes shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from the date of their issuance and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States or its equivalent on January 1, 1916; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not require the repayment of any deposit made under the provisions of this act prior to December 31, 1915.

"SEC. 6. That when the deposits herein authorized are called in by the Secretary of the Treasury the same shall be and become a part of a special fund, to be kept and held separate and apart from the general funds of the Government, for the redemption and retirement at maturity of the Panama Canal bonds in such cases and to such extent as the proceeds of such bonds have been used to make the deposits herein provided."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, inasmuch as I see no member of the Committee on Rules on his side at present, how much time he would like to have for the discussion of the special rule?

Mr. MANN. Say half an hour on a side.

Mr. HENRY. That will be entirely satisfactory to me. So, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas yields 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENRY. And I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered in order at the end of the hour.

Mr. MANN. I would not do that. Somebody might want to offer an amendment to it. I do not think I will do so.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will move the previous question at the end of the hour.

Mr. HOWARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Does that preclude offering amendments to this bill?

Mr. HENRY. Oh, no.

Mr. HOWARD. You mean on the rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia did not ask the Speaker, so the Speaker will not give him an answer.

Mr. HENRY. I did not ask the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] a question.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Did he answer it satisfactorily?

Mr. HOWARD. I asked the gentleman from Texas the question, and he said, "Oh, no." I presume he was answering it understandingly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for an hour, and announces that he will move the previous question when he gets ready.

Mr. MANN. That is, in an hour?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair knows; and he proposes to yield 30 minutes of it to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Georgia asked me if the bill will be open to amendment after the adoption of the rule, as I understood, and I said it would be open to amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. After the expiration of one hour?

Mr. HENRY. Yes. Does the gentleman want to amend the bill or the rule?

Mr. HOWARD. The bill.

Mr. HENRY. It will be open for amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all I wanted to know, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for one hour, one-half of which he announces he will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to ask some one in authority, either the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] or the Speaker, a question. This is an important matter here, and the question I want to ask is, Does the gentleman from Texas intend to proceed on that matter with the small number present?

Mr. HENRY. I intend to proceed for awhile.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is a great stickler for a quorum generally, and—

Mr. HENRY. I think I can see a quorum here to-day.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is inconsistent. He has held it up to us that a quorum is necessary for us to do business. Now I appeal to the gentleman: Has he fallen from grace? [Laughter.] Does he intend to go forward with this business without a quorum? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. I will say to the gentleman that I am trying to hasten the adjournment of this Congress.

Mr. DONOVAN. In an unparliamentary and illegal way, I will say, because under the rules we are not allowed to do business without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is out of order. If he wants to ask a question of anybody, that is all right.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have not got an answer yet, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. I think I see a quorum here.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman intend to proceed without a quorum?

Mr. HENRY. I think we have a quorum here.

Mr. DONOVAN. I insist upon an answer.

Mr. HENRY. I intend to proceed.

Mr. DONOVAN. Without a quorum? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. Yes; without a quorum.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall insist upon a quorum being present. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me that it is not necessary to separate the sheep from the goats, so we will let it run along as before.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifteen Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. KORBLY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KORBLY) there were—ayes 8, noes 67.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the rule is plain. I do not see how we could add any language to it that would make it any clearer.

It provides that immediately upon its adoption the House shall proceed to consider two Senate bills—one S. 6398 and the other S. 6505. These bills have passed the Senate. They have come to the House and have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that committee has reported them to the House and they are now on the calendar. The resolution further provides that there shall be 1 hour's general debate on each bill and 30 minutes' debate under the 5-minute rule on each one of the bills. It furthermore provides that it shall be in order to consider the amendment that is added, notwithstanding any point of order that may be made against it under the general rules of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman state how much time is given under the rule for the discussion of this most important amendment that the gentleman has referred to?

Mr. HENRY. I have just stated that there will be on the bill and all amendments that are offered one hour and a half of general debate and debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. The rule does not so provide.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, yes; it provides that there shall be that much discussion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HENRY. Just for this one question, because I do not want to detain the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not possible under the rule to withhold the offering of that amendment in which your side is most interested until the close of the 30 minutes for debate under the 5-minute rule, and thereby cut off any debate on it whatever?

Mr. HENRY. The rule speaks for itself.

Mr. STAFFORD The rule does not say anything on that.

Mr. HENRY. There is no difficulty about offering amendments and having 30 minutes' discussion.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the exact bill that I had hoped would come before the House, in the form in which it should have been worded. But the principle is in exact accord with all the bills

I have introduced on this subject. We have been undertaking to shape legislation on this question for two long months. Day and night, in season and out of season, individually I have been endeavoring to meet with my colleagues on both sides and see if we could not get on common ground in order to meet the great emergency that has arisen in the South.

The bill is the best proposition that the Committee on Rules could bring before you gentlemen for consideration. It does bring that important question before the membership of this House in order that it may be discussed and considered. We say to you and to our people that it is right that we should debate it and vote upon it, and we want to say to you on that side of the House that we are now confronted with the greatest problem that has come before our people since the close of the Civil War. Many of our people—farmers, bankers, merchants, and our railroads as well, besides other interests—are facing bankruptcy, and we think it is necessary for this great Government to come to the rescue of the South and aid us in this crisis. When you do it you preserve the business interests not only of the Southern States but of every State in this Union and contribute to the welfare of all of our people. I hope this special rule will be adopted. I trust that these matters can be debated thoroughly in this House, and that we can record our votes. We have been ready to aid the people in the other parts of this country when they were in distress and needed the assistance of the Federal Government. When a great fire swept from the face of the earth the town of Salem, Mass., those of us from the South stood ready to respond and go to the aid of those people. When San Francisco was stricken with the great earthquake and fire, all of the Representatives from the Southern States were ready to vote to send aid and succor to those distressed people. When the great flood swept along the Ohio Valley and brought ruin and destruction to the people there, our fellow citizens of the United States, we of the South were ready to go to the aid of those people. Aye, more than 10 years ago, when the far West was asking that the credit of this Government be extended to them in order that they might make their arid lands irrigable and establish homes for the people in all those great Western States, we went to their rescue and extended the credit of this great Government to the amount of more than $82,000,000, in order that they might have homes and firesides for their families. And to-day with this great crisis upon us, brought about by reason of the terrible struggle going on across the Atlantic Ocean, we must have aid, and must have it speedily, or ruin is facing the southern people.

I do not doubt the patriotism of any man on the floor of this House, whether he be Democrat or Republican. We are all Americans, and love that flag over the Speaker's head and will pay it the homage to which it is entitled from all American citizens. Gentlemen, this is not a partisan or political question. It is nonpartisan, and if there ever has been an occasion since the bloody conflict that occurred between our brothers of the North and the South when we should lay aside partisan and sectional feeling it is now, and I believe when you gentlemen understand this question as our southern people understand it you will come to our rescue as promptly and speedily as we have gone to others and as we will go to you in the years that are to come. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I realize that there is prospect of distress among the southern people on account of the cotton crop and the partial failure of the market. I realize that there is distress in other parts of the country because of the failure of people to realize the hopes that they may have had when they reaped the harvest, when they built their mills, when they planted their trees—failure, sometimes because their market is cut off in Europe, but more often because the market is cut off or partially destroyed in this country. If the Treasury of the United States is to be called upon to meet disaster to business, to meet the ruined hopes and the failure of men without work to get their daily bread, and all parts of this country are to be helped by the Treasury of the United States, no $250,000,000 in currency will meet the call. In other parts of the country they are going forward as fast as they can, and we hope that some time in the future their markets may be restored and that shops may be opened and that people may get work—yes, and that even perishable crops may find a market before they have perished and lost their value. But it would have to be a graver situation throughout the whole country than any that faces it now to have me cast my vote in favor of the proposition that is brought before Congress to-day.

The people of the North are not now insensible to what is going on in the South. A proposition has been made upon the part of the banks to raise a fund of $150,000,000 to be loaned out to the cotton planters of the South on crop security, and even wicked Wall Street comes forward with a proposition to contribute $50,000,000 toward this fund, to be expended and loaned for this purpose, and, as I understand it, $50,000,000 more are in sight from northern cities other than the city of New York; and the southern banks are willing and trying and expecting to raise $50,000,000 more. That is a transaction between people who are loaning their own money, a business transaction, far different than calling upon the bounty of the Government; far different our undertaking, being merely the trustees of the people's money, to take the money of the people and loan it to private individuals. No threatened disaster would induce me to vote for the proposition contained in this amendment—$250,000,000 of United States notes to be issued upon security——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Two hundred and fifty million dollars of United States notes to be issued, without additional security, upon a security already standing for notes amounting to $346,000,000 which have been standing for years, and these notes to bear interest. I can not vote for a proposition to increase these notes, to inflate the currency of the United States; we are getting far toward the limit of inflation of the currency of the banks. We are going too fast. Some day there must be a reckoning, and that reckoning will be far worse than if the people of the whole country to-day, having courage for the future, should gird up their loins and fight for the credit of the country and for the aid of private business or to help out their neighbors anywhere they may be. I am not going to say anything about the appeal which will meet me at home, or suggest even the appeals I have had to come out and help my own people if this is to be granted and this bounty is to go out to the people of any section. Mr. Speaker, I can not support any proposition of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not like the form of the rule, and yet I understand the situation, in what we hope to be the closing days of the session, when it may be necessary in the adoption of a rule to be a little more drastic than would ordinarily be the case. No one doubts that a great emergency does exist in the country; that men are suffering in many cases, either on account of economic legislation or the war. I shall not stop to discuss to which, in my opinion, the difficulties are attributable. A situation does exist in the cotton-raising States which I should think was unique in history. I do not recall in all my reading of history—and I have read a good deal—any case in all time which is like the present situation as to cotton, an article which can not be used at home, but which must be produced for the convenience of mankind. Without wool and cotton life would certainly be very different from what it is now, and the world is dependent on the production of this article for its comfort; and here comes a situation where, by reason of facts which are well known to us all, there is no price for cotton. The producer practically is without a market, and it is not possible, as I view it, for the world to consume the present cotton in existence without some aid being given to carry it over to future years. [Applause.] I do not like the rule, which I shall swallow, but because of the exigency of the case, the emergency which exists. I hope that this side of the House will vote for the rule and give us an opportunity to express ourselves upon at least one proposition. [Applause.] I will say frankly I can not vote for the amendment which will be offered. I am not willing to authorize the issuance of $250,000,000 of legal-tender currency and enter upon a program which in the end must inevitably mean such an inflation of legal-tender notes as will make them valueless. We have a gold reserve of $150,000,000 to protect three hundred and forty-odd million dollars of legal-tender notes which are issued by law, and every Congress has refused, during heated times as well as in cool blood, to increase the quantity of legal-tender notes. I hope that it never will be done. But whether the amendment shall be agreed to or not, whether this proposition now offered shall meet the situation or not, in the opinion of the majority, I think that certainly the human mind—and we pride ourselves upon living in the age when human thought is at its best—certainly the human mind ought to be able to search out and find a remedy for an acknowledged danger, to protect not only the South but the country from the inevitable result of great bankruptcies. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], or I will yield him five if he desires it.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I think three minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I am for the rule which is before us for several reasons. In the first place, its adoption will permit the enactment into law of two bills which have been passed by the Senate and favorably reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House—two bills whose enactment immediately is made necessary by the present financial condition of the country. I am for the rule, Mr. Speaker, also and especially because I believe the present acute situation throughout one-third of the United States needs and should receive governmental aid. [Applause.] In my student days, I recall, I learned one fundamental principle of economics. It was that any enterprise too large and too great for private control and one in which a large part of a people are interested can properly be intrusted to the Government as a legitimate object of governmental attention. The situation in the cotton-growing district of our country more than meets these requirements. The area primarily affected is very large, embracing one-third of our land. But this unprecedented situation affects not only the region where cotton is actually grown, but in a larger sense it affects our entire Nation. Directly, the cotton growers of the South are affected; indirectly, the cotton wearers and all inhabitants of the land are affected. Our country is one of diversified industries, and yet there is an essential reciprocal relation existing between the industries and between the several localities. Whatever affects one more or less affects all the others. But regardless of that, Mr. Speaker, this is one country, and whatever affects any part of it is the concern of all of us. While the people I represent are in the northernmost part of the Union and are not as immediately concerned as many of the people of the far South, nevertheless they are interested, and I know I voice their sentiments when I say something should be done by the Government for the relief of the distress in the South. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAINEY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that while we are at peace with the world, as we are, that nevertheless the cotton situation in the United States is precisely the same as if we were at war and our ports were blockaded. We have the product, a wonderful supply, but our market abroad has been curtailed as though by a blockade, the great crop is about harvested, but it can not be sold. It is here on our hands. The men who have raised it are not able to sell it. They must meet the expenses of production, with no chance to realize on their product. The world needs, we need, this industry to continue to be prosperous. Every person in our land would suffer if the South should cease the production of cotton. The South's interest is a nation's interest. It is our duty, as a legislative body for all the people, to respond justly and generously to the distressed cry from the great South. There is no patriotism in sectionalism. He who does not respond whenever need exists anywhere within the United States does not correctly reflect the spirit of our country. Therefore, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is the province of the Government, through this Congress, to take some action, and take it now, in order to relieve the situation and save a great and important industry in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this rule that is presented by the Rules Committee is as drastic a rule as was ever presented in the palmiest days of former Speaker Cannon. The Democratic Party is about to reverse itself in its position in criticism of the Republican Party for occasionally, on emergencies and exigencies such as this, bringing in a rule to meet the conditions. I recall two or three occasions when drastic rules were presented, one for the consideration of the famous Aldrich-Vreeland currency bill, which every Democrat on that side voted against, not only the rule but the bill itself, and subsequently reversed itself in this Congress by voting to continue the bill in force; next the postal savings-bank bill, which gave no latitude for amendment, and now here we have a rule under the guise of offering amendments, but which, in fact, does not permit amendment to the main proposition in controversy. The rule provides that there shall be but 30 minutes for amendments under the five-minute rule, and during that time an amendment may be presented to consider the Henry cotton-loan proposition. He may offer it at the very close of that half hour's discussion under the five-minute rule. That would not give any opportunity for amendment, but I recognize, as I recognized in Republican days, the need of passing such rules as this for the consideration of this proposition, and it is up to you now to concede by your votes on this rule that the Republicans were justified in passing in exigencies such rules as I have referred to.

I recognize that there is need for the consideration of Senate bill 6398, which the Committee on Banking and Currency has reported. That bill is designedly for the relief of the Southern States in meeting the emergency there. Instead of limiting the national banks in the issuance of the Vreeland emergency circulation to 30 per cent of the 125 per cent of the capital and surplus of the banks backed by commercial paper on which emergency circulation may be issued, it is extended to 100 per cent that may be issued on commercial paper. What is the purpose of that?

It is that the southern farmer may go to his local bank with his warehouse certificate and obtain a loan based on that warehouse certificate. The southern bank in turn can have emergency note circulation to 100 per cent of its capital and surplus, based upon that commercial paper. That will amount, I might say offhand, to a quarter billion dollars additional circulation that will be available to the Southern States for the use of the southern banks in floating and tiding over the southern cotton situation.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman know that he is in error in that, because the Secretary of the Treasury classes the warehouse receipts as securities and not as commercial paper? The gentleman is evidently in error there.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not intend to go into the details of the mechanism by which it might be brought about. A cotton farmer gives his note, and that note will be commercial paper, backed by a warehouse receipt.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman evidently did not understand my question.

Mr. STAFFORD. That commercial paper will be the support for the issuing of emergency bank notes under this Senate bill.

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, in the exercise of his authority given there, the Secretary of the Treasury has classified the paper as security, so that this act will not affect that class of paper at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether I am in error. The very purpose of the Senate bill is to give relief to the South in the manner I have indicated. But the Henry amendment proposes for the National Government, through the banks, to buy cotton to the amount of $250,000,000, for a loan to the producer at its fair value at 4 per cent is virtually its purchase.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question. I would scorn to make a party question of it, even were it in my power to do so. The southern cotton planters are in a desperate situation. The cultivation of cotton is a most peculiar business. The South exhausts itself every year in making its cotton crop. Every man who is familiar with the raising of cotton knows this to be true. The poor man invests his all in the crop, and when he gets 6 cents a pound for it instead of 12 cents a pound it can readily be seen that it means ruin to him.

There is another peculiarity about the business of raising cotton. There is not a great deal of profit in it. I do not know in my entire knowledge of a single man who has made a fortune out of the business of raising cotton. I do not know of a single man who has made as much as $100,000 out of the business of producing cotton. If he has made his fortune, it has been by the aid of some side line.

Now, when you are helping the South you are helping the whole country. As everybody knows, cotton brings in an enormous quantity of gold. The Committee on Rules, therefore, under these circumstances, felt justified in bringing in this somewhat unusual rule. We do not insist that the amendment we propose is perfect by any manner of means. We offer it as the best plan we could evolve for the time being to help our people in their distress, and if it does not do what we hope it will do we ask you not to criticize it; we ask you not to find fault with it, but we ask you to join with us and help us to frame some measure which will save that section of the country and the country at large from the ruinous loss which is bound to follow.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. BULKLEY. How many amendments could be offered to the proposed Henry amendment?

Mr. POU. The intention of the committee was to throw it open to amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Is it not a fact that if one amendment and an amendment to that and one substitute for that amendment were pending, that would satisfy all for the time being?

Mr. POU. The purpose was to offer the amendment that was printed in the rule and to throw that measure open to amendments generally. That was the spirit in which it was brought out, and I think that is the proper construction to be put upon the rule.

Mr. BULKLEY. You think there could be no limit to the number of amendments that could be offered under the rule?

Mr. POU. I am not sure about that. I can not say that; but our purpose was to throw it open.

Mr. HENRY. My purpose, I will say to the gentleman, was to throw it open to amendment; and if anyone asked unanimous consent to extend the discussion to two hours, so as to discuss it under the five-minute rule, I was in favor of doing that.

Mr. POU. That was the purpose.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule 15 minutes are allowed in which amendments can be offered by those who favor the amendment and 15 minutes in which amendments can be offered by those who oppose the amendment; that is three on a side. That is quite a small limit, so far as the number is concerned, to the amendments that could possibly be offered.

Mr. HENRY. We thought that six amendments were all that could possibly be offered.

Mr. MANN. Those who are in favor of the amendment probably will not offer any amendment, and there can be only three gentlemen recognized who are opposed to it, who could offer any amendment.

Mr. POU. The point I want to emphasize is this, and I say it in the utmost sincerity: I echo the sentiment of every man here and of my people and of the entire South when I say that we all feel there ought to be some way to meet this emergency. As has been said time and again here, it affects not only our people, but there is a whole pyramid of interests dependent upon the liquidation of this crop at a fair price, and whenever you knock out the bottom blocks of that pyramid the whole structure is bound to fall. There ought to be statesmanship enough in this House and in the other Chamber to do something in this hour of our people's desperate plight to relieve this situation, certainly to some extent, and it is in that spirit that we appeal to our Republican brethren and our Democratic brethren from every State in this Union.

If this bill will not prevent the dumping of this crop on the market at ruinous prices, then we ask you to help us write it so that it will accomplish that result. All our people ask is sufficient funds to enable them to take one-third of this crop off the market until normal conditions are restored. Now, Mr. Speaker, just one thing more. Let us hope that nobody is trying to gain any political advantage in this distressing situation. I would scorn to attempt such a thing. My people would look with scorn upon such attempt, for I tell you here and now that in my lifetime I have never seen my people in such a condition as they are to-day. They are a brave people. They have been to the brink of the river that is called ruin, and they have drunk to the very dregs of the cup of bitterness more than once, and they always come up smiling, and they will do it this time. But I tell you again no man has ever seen a parallel of the situation which confronts us to-day, for it has never existed. My people feel that they have a right to come to Congress and ask, not that you give them anything—they are not asking for a donation—but they do ask that the Government make a loan, every dollar of which will be returned, to enable them to tide over this temporary emergency. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the export statistics of cotton will afford some idea of the destruction of the foreign market.

In August, 1913, we exported 257,168 bales of cotton; in August, 1914, we exported 21,210; in September, 1913, we exported 930,312; in September, 1914, we exported 125,778.

It has been suggested that private capital will abundantly supply the needs of cotton producers. We have been told that certain gentlemen are at this time forming a pool to aid in liquidating the cotton crop. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust that this statement is true, for I have a fear—a very great fear—that pools have already been formed, not to put up the price of cotton to a point near the cost of production, but rather for the purpose of keeping the price down.

On yesterday I was told by a well-informed gentleman, who had just returned from a trip through the eastern cotton mills, that spinners are not buying cotton now for 6¼ cents because they confidently expect, as they told this gentleman, to be able to buy all the cotton they will need at 5 cents or even less.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, this great Government only is great enough and strong enough and rich enough to save these people from ruin. There are plenty of precedents. In years past the Government has time and again deposited money at this point or that point, with a condition expressed or implied as to how such deposits shall be used.

God forbid that any southern man should turn his back upon our people in this hour of threatened disaster. God forbid that any patriotic man in this Chamber should turn his back upon this people in this hour of impending ruin. This is not a sectional question. It is a great, broad, national question, which affects every interest in every State of the Union. The sale of the cotton crop at any price means gold for the American people. The sale of the cotton crop at a higher price means more gold for the American people. The gold that this crop will bring back is the very basis of the Nation's credit.

We appeal to you all—Democrats, Republicans, Progressives—we appeal to your Americanism to help put through this measure. If you will help us, a great people will rise up as one man to call this Congress blessed. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to state to the House that the rule, in the form in which it is presented, is not the rule that was asked for by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House; and while I am not authorized to speak specifically for the Banking and Currency Committee, I am quite sure that I am within the limitations of fact when I say that the Banking and Currency Committee would not have asked for the rule in the form in which it is presented to the House from the Committee on Rules.

I desire to say, furthermore, that there is no Member of this House who has greater anxiety for the situation in the South than have I.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. May I have one minute more?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. GLASS. As I shall point out in general debate, it is my firm judgment that we already have upon the statute book laws which, together with the bills proposed by the Banking and Currency Committee, are sufficient to remedy the situation in the South. I believe as sincerely as I ever believed anything in my life that if this House will simply pass the two proposed amendments to the Federal reserve act favorably reported nearly three weeks ago by the Banking and Currency Committee, the Federal reserve banking system can fully and thoroughly take care of the situation in the South.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I have only a minute, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. I will yield to the gentleman another minute. I want to say that the rule brings up those two bills for consideration and then makes it possible only to offer this other as an amendment; and if the amendment is defeated, your two bills will be considered, if the rule is adopted.

Mr. GLASS. I understand the gentleman from Texas yields me an additional minute.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. GLASS. In that minute I desire to say that never, at any time, have I feared to go upon record upon this proposition, and never, at any moment, was I unwilling to take a vote upon this or any kindred proposition. I think, however, that the best way to settle the matter is to permit us to amend the rule, and present the question to the House as the Banking and Currency Committee formally requested it should be presented, and that is to vote down the previous question and amend this rule by voting down the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, advocated by the gentleman from Texas. That will put everybody upon record. That will speedily determine the question here and leave nobody any longer in doubt as to what the temper and mind of this House is upon these various problems. Therefore I shall vote "no" upon ordering the previous question upon this rule.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, even though I desire that these two bills be enacted into law, I am unable, however, to bring myself to vote for the amendment proposed to be offered. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentlemen from the cotton States. I do not know that it will be of value to them, but it may be of some assistance in this matter. Everyone would be glad to vote for some legislation that would relieve the situation in the South. It affects the material prosperity of the entire country. The only question is what particular remedy will accomplish the desired purpose. It was suggested a short time ago that certain banks form a pool and raise $150,000,000 in gold, to be used in financing the situation relative to the cotton crop. Certain New York banks agreed to contribute $50,000,000 to that fund, upon a single condition, that the Federal Reserve Board should have control of its administration. The press of the country, either to-day or yesterday, makes the statement that the Federal Reserve Board has not the authority to control the disposition of the fund. Why not prepare an amendment which would give, either for a temporary period or for such emergencies, the Federal Reserve Board the authority it would need to manage and control such a fund, and let it care for the situation in that way?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the gentleman's information accurate in respect to the position of the New York banks?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is just a statement I saw in the press.

Mr. HARDWICK. I heard only this afternoon that one reason they would not subscribe to the pool was because they did not want to go in at 6 cents a pound.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know the reason other than as published; but if that statement be correct, it would be the part of wisdom, and I think everybody would be willing to unite in the adoption of such a provision that would extend such relief. A hundred and fifty million dollars in gold would be worth a great deal more than $250,000,000 of paper money unsecured by anything for which there is a ready market.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, more than a month ago I stood on the floor of this House and pleaded with the Members of Congress to give relief to the South without delay. To-day the same bill I tried to get before the House is proposed by the Rules Committee with an amendment. The distress of the South has grown worse from day to day. Since the day I tried to get action on the cotton bill the southern Members have been striving to agree upon a bill acceptable. This amended bill has in part been approved by the cotton conference, composed of Members of the House. This is not a perfect bill and should be amended, but not by propositions that can not pass both Houses and become a law. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to Members to forget their selfish interest in their own bills and now present a solid front for a measure that can be passed. Do not load down this bill with amendments containing cotton-tax legislation and limit of production. This Congress is not ready to enter the field of limiting agricultural production by taxing the product. This session is about to come to a close; soon there will not be a quorum, and I appeal to the southern Members to get together on this bill with proper amendments, and I believe we can pass a bill before we adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill should provide that when banks receive emergency deposits, to be used in loans to farmers, and such banks fail to so loan the deposits, the amount should be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury within 15 days. This is a time when banks should not expect to make the usual interest on loans.

Mr. Speaker, as an humble Member of this House, making no pretense to leadership and desiring no personal glory by the enactment of cotton legislation, one who would serve his country well, one who loves all sections of the Union, and one who loves far better still the red old hills of Georgia, I plead with you to hear the Macedonian cry of my people and help us before we adjourn. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal in what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] has just said—that these bills are in danger of being loaded down—but the vital amendment is different. I question whether under the rule there can be any amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas proposing a $250,000,000 loan. I question whether, even if we cared to go beyond cotton or tobacco, as proposed by him, we could introduce any other farm product seeking relief. There is distress in other sections of the country besides the South, for which relief might fairly be asked on similar terms, but they could not be considered under this amendment. It is made special to the South, although I doubt very much whether it is altogether the southern spirit that comes into the House now to ask for Government aid in the manner in which it is asked for in this amendment. It is a question whether there is not too much pride on the part of the southern people to come to the Congress of the United States asking for financial aid in commercial transactions, when similar aid would not be accorded to other business in other sections.

Mr. Speaker, there is a vast difference between a flood which devastates a city or a valley, as the result of which people ask for relief, and a commercial transaction involving profits and prices. The southern people went through one of the greatest periods of distress known to history during the Civil War. They suffered losses from which they have not yet fully recovered, but they never asked the Government for aid. The brave and heroic fight of the men and women who survived that great struggle put them again upon their feet.

In the present emergency, arising from a falling in the price of cotton, various remedies have been suggested. If the governors of the Southern States were to meet to-morrow and agree to call together in special session the various legislatures, it is possible they could come to an understanding that there should be no more than a certain limit of cotton planted or grown. That would be one way by which the price of cotton could be held to a rising scale. Nor do gentlemen who talk of the distress of the South seem to have given consideration to the possibilities of the South, with its magnificent soil and its splendid climate, in the raising of other commodities than cotton, which has been its great monopoly. In this respect the South is favored, but it has not availed itself of all its opportunities. It has relied exclusively upon cotton and the foreign market which brought back its foreign gold. That transaction, upon which the South had placed its dependence, was suddenly stopped by the European war.

The problem, therefore, is one of business and finance, such as affects other products that dare not come to Congress for relief. It is not a question of men applying for work or of the hungry appealing for bread; of houses washed away by flood or towns swept by fire; it is a question of financial distress, a question, in fact, whether cotton shall be held up to 12 cents or some other figure per pound. Just how we can vote for such a proposition I do not know. When some of us asked for protection to industries in this country against foreign competition there was a general outcry against it from the very Representatives who are now asking for direct appropriations for their special commodity. They denied protection by law to the very industries in this country that were extensive users of cotton. We were told, though we sought to buy more cotton and to use more cotton, that though our men needed work and our banks needed money our industries were "special interests" and should not be protected. Thus was disparaged one of the means by which such an emergency as has arisen in the South could have been obviated.

But now the opponents of the protective system are themselves asking protection, not for farm products generally, nor for industrial products which have suffered reductions in price and profits, but for cotton and tobacco only. The whole plan is a reversal of the Jeffersonian doctrine, so often repeated in Bryanistic utterance, of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." If we are to use the public funds to purchase cotton to keep up the price, what shall we say to the producers of other crops which are bitten by the frost or that otherwise contribute to the owner's losses? If the most fertile soil that God has given to this country has been used exclusively for the raising of cotton, which is now in trouble, may we not say to the southern planter, "If you will turn your attention to other crops"——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as a producer of cotton I sincerely hope that this rule will be adopted. Ninety days ago the South was happy and prosperous. To-day she is suffering. We do not ask you for a gift, but we ask you for a loan, with the very best security. We ask you to aid us to prevent bankruptcy and ruin over the Southland, and, Mr. Speaker, we ask you to help save this great Union nearly $1,000,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I believe his statement is absolutely correct to the extent that the committee would not have asked for this relief for the people of our part of the country, for ever since I have been a member of that committee that committee has not shown a tendency to do anything for the benefit of the farmers of the country. The Democratic Party in its platform, in its pledges to the people, and in the pledges of the President promised the people of this country a rural credit system that, if it had been enacted, would to a large extent have relieved the situation in the way of the emergency that now confronts us. Now, Mr. Speaker, I never expected that relief would be given to our people. I do not expect it now. I do not expect it when gentlemen coming from the South, chairmen of great committees, use their influence to keep relief from the South that the people of the South will ever get relief. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that only one more speech will be made on this side.

Mr. MANN. As I have only just one minute remaining, I yield that to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the deplorable condition of the cotton States and, in hopes that something may be brought about that will bring relief, I shall vote for this rule. [Applause.] One objection I have to the proposed amendment is that it includes only cotton and tobacco. The conditions that have been described as existing in the cotton States are general throughout the country. Only this afternoon I talked with one of the most prominent Democrats from the Pacific coast, and he told me that never before were industries in such condition in that section as they are to-day. Many of them are upon the very verge of bankruptcy. The people do not see any relief. Why should not the Government help them? If the industries of the South are to receive the paternal care of the Government, why not all?

I hope that after we take care of cotton and tobacco something will be done for the other industries of the country.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is a fair rule. It simply provides for the consideration of two Senate bills proposing amendment to our currency laws that have been favorably considered and reported with amendments by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, and that, in one of these bills, a certain amendment designed to relieve distressed conditions in one great part of our country, where 30,000,000 people reside, shall be considered. A fair and reasonable opportunity, Mr. Speaker, for amendment under the five-minute rule is allowed, when we consider the lateness of the session and the anxiety of the Members to return to their homes and to their districts.

Mr. BULKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. How many amendments is it possible to offer to the amendment which the committee proposes?

Mr. HARDWICK. Six; and there are not more than six different propositions to the amendment, if that many. There are six opportunities for amendment to this proposition, and that is fair and reasonable. There are not more than that number of propositions involved in it, if so many.

Now, if you will pardon me just a moment, I will say, first, to the gentleman that I am willing, if we can get unanimous consent, to throw it open further than that if it should be seriously thought that there is any necessity for further opportunity to amend.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent now to amend the rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will if there is any disposition in the House to regard it as necessary or desirable.

Mr. HENRY. Let me ask the gentleman, how many amendments are to be offered?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not know. I conceive that a great many more than six good amendments could be offered.

Mr. HENRY. In good faith, how many have you?

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to refer to several propositions that have been advanced to-day on this floor by gentlemen, some of whom favor and some of whom oppose this proposition. In the first place I deny, as emphatically as human language can be employed for that purpose, the proposition that there is any alms or charity or largess in this bill for the South or anybody in the South. We are simply proposing by this bill to do what we have done, both Republicans and Democrats, in many administrations through the Treasury policy. Not long ago we made a conditional deposit in the National Park Bank, of New York, of $400,000, and a conditional contract during this very administration that a million dollars more should be left there, on condition that that bank handle the notes of the State of Tennessee. [Applause.] Not long ago, during a Republican administration, when Mr. Roosevelt was President of these United States, we sent $150,000,000 to the banks of New York City on condition that those deposits should be employed in a certain way, to save threatened financial institutions in that great metropolis, as was disclosed in the Money Trust investigation. And I ask you, if we can send $150,000,000 to save the financial institutions in New York through the use of the deposit system, why have we not the right to send relief to 30,000,000 of our people in the South in that same way? We are not applying in this bill, so far as this branch of the question is concerned, a single principle that is new or a single practice that is untried. What we want to do is simply to express the conditions on which these deposits are to be made in terms of the statute rather than in terms of the Treasury order or Treasury policy. I think it has come to a pretty pass if it can be said on this floor or elsewhere in this Republic that the Congress of the United States, elected by the people, has not as much right to say where and on what terms the deposits of public money shall be made as the Treasury Department has. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. HARDWICK. Just for a moment.

Mr. GLASS. It is as to a question of fact. I would like my colleague to specify when this Government, under Mr. Roosevelt or under any other President, ever permitted $150,000,000 to be sent to New York in the manner in which he has stated.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was to relieve the panic of 1907. He sent this money—$150,000,000 at one time—to the great banks in New York City, and, I am informed, without charging them any interest; and, more than that, on the 29th day of September, 1914, speaking in the city of Cincinnati, the present Comptroller of the Currency, of this administration, boasted that within 60 days of the time at which he was speaking the Secretary of the Treasury had shipped $40,000,000 to be deposited in the Subtreasury in New York, there in turn to be put in the depositories of the Government in that city. Let me quote the exact words of Mr. Williams, in order that I may be accurate in this matter and that the House and country may understand exactly what happened according to Mr. Williams himself. Mr. Williams said:

> Responding promptly to urgent appeals, the Secretary of the Treasury went over to New York Sunday afternoon, August 2, and held a conference that night with a score or more of the presidents of the leading banks and trust companies of the metropolis. He heard their statements, analyzed the situation quickly, saw what was necessary to enable the banks to meet the demands upon them and to restore confidence, which had been so rocked by the world-shaking events of the week.

Again, Mr. Williams said:

> Anticipating the situation as it was laid before him at that conference, he (the Secretary) had that Sunday morning, before leaving Washington, directed the shipment by express to the Subtreasury at New York of $40,000,000, and the Treasury forces and the express companies at that moment were taxing their resources in hurrying the execution of the order.

Since the amendment of August 4, vitalizing the Vreeland-Aldrich bill, had not then been adopted, and since the Secretary of the Treasury sent this money by express to the Subtreasury at New York, I think it fair to assume, as I believe the fact was, that the funds in question, the $40,000,000 "expressed" in anticipation of the wants of the New York banks, was Government funds that were subsequently deposited in the New York banks that were Government depositories.

Now, I do not blame the Secretary of the Treasury for coming to the relief of these New York banks, whatever the method he employed of affording such relief; nor do I criticize him for "anticipating the situation" even in advance of that conference with the New York bankers. On the contrary, he is to be commended for the promptness and decision with which he met a situation and averted a calamity in one part of our great country at a most critical period——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I think if my friend will examine the RECORD he will find——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not yield to anyone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, gentlemen, all that we propose to do here is to say that in like manner the deposits of Government money shall be made in certain other sections of our country which need relief as much as any city or any section of this country has ever needed relief since the Government began. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And surely we have the right to demand by statute for our own people when they are in distress, to demand for our own section when it faces bankruptcy and ruin, as much as we gave freely to other cities and other sections of the country without the formality of any statutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is one new proposition, I admit, in this bill, and that relates to the method we employ to raise this money. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KORBLY] seems to be amused at the question. Surely the situation is too serious to warrant levity. If we have not the money in the Treasury, how are we going to raise the money necessary to deposit in these banks?

Mr. KORBLY. Take it away from the taxpayers.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think we can do it without doing that. We can issue United States notes with all the legal qualities of the outstanding notes that we now have, $346,000,000, and yet they will be notes that will not, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has suggested, be a menace to or a burden or a drain upon the gold reserve of this country. I can see difficulties in issuing any sort of notes that could be used immediately and presently to draw upon the gold reserve under existing conditions, and therefore this proposition is not framed that way.

The proposition here is to issue these notes, with these qualities, redeemable on the 1st of January, 1916, in United States coin or its equivalent. We will take them in the South—every one of them, and gladly. Everybody else in this country will take them. There will be no trouble about it. The credit of the Government has not sunk so low, has not fallen to a point where there is any trouble about that sort of a note, bearing 2 per cent interest, being readily acceptable anywhere in this country, for after 13 months they are redeemable in gold.

If the $346,000,000 of greenbacks and all the forms of currency that we now have that are redeemable, under the Treasury policy, in gold are held up by our present gold reserve; if every dollar of those forms of money can be bolstered up by this reserve, relatively small in amount, surely it will not be damaged or impaired by these $260,000,000 of notes, due in 13 months, and which can not become a charge on the gold reserve before January 1, 1916.

More than that, we have provided for the calling in before January 1, 1916, of every single deposit made under this bill, and the banks in which they are made will furnish the funds for the complete retirement of these notes by January 1, 1916. The depositories in the South will be liable to the Government just as banks in New York City were, just as those banks in the city of Dayton, Ohio, were liable. We do not ask you to send us money and not hold the Government depositories that receive it liable. We are not asking for a direct loan to our cotton planters. We simply ask you to deposit money which, if you do not want it yourselves, our people will take and be glad to get, in the depositories of the United States and require those depositories to pay it back before it can become a possible charge against the Treasury of the United States or the gold reserve. In other words, we ask you to lend to your own depositories, to the depositories of the United States, to the solvent banks of this great part of our country, your and our credit for 13 months, and during that period to deposit in our banks the public funds of the Government; and I say to you that a Government that has for years used its deposits of public money to move crops and to relieve distress and to avert panics in many other parts of our country under conditions that were not one-half so terrible and distressing as those now confronting the South, and would now hesitate for one moment to do so to save 30,000,000 people, would, in my humble judgment, fall far short of its duty and responsibility in the premises. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves the previous question on the resolution. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GLASS. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 39.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, automatically a roll call is ordered on the question.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question will vote "aye" and those opposed will vote "no."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GLASS. I made a motion to adjourn. Was it not in order to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GLASS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. Had not the Clerk commenced the calling of the roll?

The SPEAKER. No; he had not commenced the calling of the roll. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Virginia when he made the motion to adjourn. The question is, Shall the House adjourn?

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 76.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That point has already been made. The motion to adjourn is lost. The Clerk will call the roll on the ordering of the previous question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 72, answered "present" 7, not voting 248, as follows:

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as we lift our hearts to Thee we remember that Thou art the holy one of Israel; that Thou art the God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ and the God of our fathers. Thy name has been held with reverence by those who laid the foundations of this great Government. Thy name has been heard in all the councils of our State. We praise Thee for the protection Thou hast given to us, for raising up men into places of leadership and power, and for the spirit that has animated all the deliberations of Thy people. THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram addressed to him, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PINE BLUFF, ARK., October 20, 1914.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I beg to suggest that a reduction of the cotton trouble may be found in the prompt and vigorous use of the taxing power of the Federal Government. The key to the situation is a reliable assurance of, say, half a crop next year. The Census Bureau should be able to furnish information upon which to reckon a distributed crop of, say, 7,000,000 bales. A tax of one-tenth cent a pound on cotton to that extent should pay the cost of administration and a tax of 10 cents a pound on all cotton produced in excess of the amount allotted for production by each unit of person or stock so employed, with suitable punishment for attempts at evasion, should prevent much, if any, greater amount of cotton being raised. Kindly submit this suggestion to some of the friends of this movement.

C. R. BRECKENRIDGE.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Dallas, Tex., and of the Chesapeake Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, of Baltimore, Md., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ashley, Minn., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLAIM OF NORWAY.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the subject was referred, submitted a report (No. 824) accompanied by a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) providing an appropriation to indemnify Trygve Andersen, Sigurd Nilsen, and Arthur Rasmussen, of the crew of the Norwegian ship Ingrid, for losses caused by their arrest and detention in Hudson County, N. J., and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

MARY MACON HOWARD.

Mr. BRYAN. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7078) for the relief of Mary Macon Howard, and I submit a report (No. 823) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not desire to object to the request of the Senator from Texas for unanimous consent, but I am very hopeful that we shall go to the calendar this morning, and I hope that we may have some assistance from the other side of the Chamber to take up unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I agree with the Senator. This bill will take only a few moments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Secretary will read the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mary Macon Howard, out of funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,095, as compensation to her for the loss of her husband, John Simpson Howard Howard, who, on the 10th day of February, 1913, while in the discharge of his official duties as a mounted inspector of the United States customs service in Presidio County, Tex., was assassinated by Mexican bandits.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 6669) granting an increase of pension to Annie E. Yelton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that I introduced a bill on yesterday, being the bill S. 6660, but a very important item was omitted. I reintroduce the bill to-day in its perfected form and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 6671) confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD (by request):

A bill (S. 6670) enabling postal savings banks to lend money on cotton.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, unless the Senator from Texas prefers another reference.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I had indicated that the bill should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the reference, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that I introduce the bill at the request of Mr. Charles B. Metcalf, of San Antonio, Tex., one of the prominent farmers of that section.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) to create a cotton commission, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the joint resolution will take the course indicated by the Senator from Tennessee.

THE TELEPOST.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 479), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from the contingent fund of the Senate to defray the expenses of the committee appointed by Senate resolution 405 to investigate and report upon the merits of the telepost and similar systems of rapid telegraphy, all payments to be made on vouchers approved by the chairman of the said committee.

THE NATIONAL CREDIT (S. DOC. NO. 609).

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the address of John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, before the annual convention of the Indiana Bankers' Association at Indianapolis, Ind., September 29, 1914.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from Tennessee will be complied with. The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, showing the geographical distribution of the funds expended by the Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year 1914 and those to be expended by the department during the fiscal year 1915. I wish to have the letter and the tabular statement printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 11, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In accordance with my promise on the occasion of your recent visit to the department, I am sending you herewith a statement showing the geographic distribution of the funds expended by the Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year 1914, and also of the funds proposed to be expended during the present fiscal year. Of course you realize that this statement is only an approximation, as it is difficult to separate our expenditures according to States or divisions.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

SUGAR-BEET SEED.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the condition in which the domestic sugar industry is at the present time is heightened somewhat by the difficulty which our beet-sugar producers find in obtaining the seed of the sugar beet. I have a very interesting dissertation upon that subject and would like to have it read for the information of the Senate. It is not very long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan presents a communication which he asks may be read at the desk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let the Secretary read, beginning at the point where I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

An intelligent reply to your inquiry concerning beet seed is rather difficult within the limits of an ordinary letter, still I may be able to give you some ideas on the question, and will enlarge on these the next time I have the pleasure of conversation with you.

An attempt is being made at the present time to raise some beet seed in one of our Western States. The difficulty connected with this attempt is threefold.

First, it requires a very large capital to raise beet seed in a scientific way, which is the only way in which the seed can be successfully produced. The five leading seed firms in Germany each has invested somewhere from $5,000,000 to $20,000,000 in their operations. These firms produce probably 85 per cent of all seed raised in Germany.

Second, this industry requires an immense amount of hand labor. In Germany they pay from 35 cents to 45 cents per day for this labor. You know what it costs in America.

Third, to produce a reliable commercial beet seed requires eight years, and such seed would be worthless if there was no one in this country to buy it. The fiscal policy of the United States is not such as to induce capital to embark in an enterprise in the face of the existing law providing for free sugar in 1916.

I visited four of the five large beet-seed producers in Germany. Two of the five are located near Magdeburg, two near Quedlinburg, and one at Nordhausen. Two of them make an exclusive business of raising beet seed, the beets being rotated with other crops. Two of these concerns also have extensive estates in Russia, where they raise beet seed, though they do not ship any of the Russian seed to America. Each of these concerns tills in Germany from 8,000 to 15,000 acres of land, which land is valued at from $400 to $500 per acre. All four of the concerns visited maintain scientific laboratories for testing beets and beet seed. They also have extensive drying plants for drying seed, many thrashing machines, and very large warehouses.

Some idea of the care taken in selection of the original mother beets can be gathered from the following:

Heinrich Mette, one of the large seed raisers, last season had 1,440,000 beets on 50 acres of land. These beets were all carefully inspected when harvested, and two-thirds of them rejected by visual examination as not being suitable for mother beets. This left approximately 500,000 beets that stood the first test. These 500,000 beets were next subjected to examination by polariscope, and subsquently their surface was examined with microscopes. After being subjected to these scientific tests there were only 875 beets remaining out of the 500,000. These 875 beets selected from the original 1,440,000 are the mother beets.

On another plantation visited I found that the per cent of mother beets was practically the same. On an acre there are some 30,000 beets, and this second concern obtained from these 30,000 beets only 6 beets to the acre.

Every one of these mother beets is carefully photographed, and its description recorded so carefully that it would be distinguished from every other beet just as effectually as one man's thumb prints distinguish him from another individual. These mother beets were last spring set out in families of four, each family being so segregated that it would be kept by itself. This made about 220 families out of the 875 mother beets raised by Mette that were producing seed this year. Some of these families prove worthless. This process of rejection and selection will be continued four generations, or eight years, before seed is placed on the market as a commercial seed. In other words, it takes eight years to produce commercial seed according to the scientific plans followed in the production of such seed in Germany.

You will readily see that if there had been no scientific test of these beets and a visual examination had been solely depended upon to select the mother beets, there would have been 500,000 mother beets out of the original 1,440,000 rather than 875. I fear that in the attempt now being made to raise seed in the United States those who are engaged in the business are depending solely upon visual examination of the beets to select the mother beets from which the seed is to be produced, thus getting seed in two years instead of eight years.

The scientific plan outlined above is the one followed by all of the leading beet-seed concerns in Germany, and it is because of this plan they have been able to increase the sugar content and purity of beets in a very marked degree during the last 50 years. I might say that these leading German firms engaged in the production of beet seed have been in the business all the way from 60 years to 125 years, and the present condition of perfection is the result of scientific labor of several generations of careful, painstaking endeavor.

Trusting that the above will give you some idea of the way in which beet seed is raised in Europe and why it is not possible to engage in this business at the present time in the United States, I am,

Yours, respectfully,

F. R. HATHAWAY, Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the letter just read refers to efforts and experiments now being conducted in one of the Western States, looking to the production of sugar-beet seed. I am very happy to state that those efforts, now in progress in the State of Montana, are being rewarded in a most encouraging way. The prospects are that in the very near future we shall be relieved from the absolute dependence under which we now rest to Germany for our sugar-beet seed.

I might say in this connection, too, because some reference has been made to the character of the experiments that are now being conducted in this country, that those being prosecuted in my State are under the direction of Prof. Mendelson, perhaps as eminent a scientist as there is connected with the production of beet sugar in any country. He is himself a product of one of the German universities, and studied the business in all its phases in that country. He makes frequent visits to Germany, visits the beet-sugar fields in that country and in neighboring countries, and is thoroughly informed about all the discoverics in relation to the propagation of sugar-beet seed.

I am very happy to say that the results of the present year are of a most gratifying character and warrant the very highest hopes for the future.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to state in connection with the very interesting and instructive letter which has just been read that as early as 1902 in my State I called attention to the fact that the weak spot in the beet-sugar industry of the United States consisted in its absolute dependence upon a foreign country for its seed. I also pointed out the consequences to that industry in the event its supply of beet seed should be cut off either through a trade war, through a prohibitory export duty, or through a general European conflict, which unfortunately is now upon us.

The letter states, and without any doubt correctly, that the scientific and successful propagation of beet seed requires a considerable number of years. That process, however, should have been begun long ago. If more attention had been given to the propagation of beet seed and less to the manufacture of fictitious capitalization and the earning of dividends upon it, the industry would not now be threatened with so serious an injury as it is threatened for the next year unless its supply of beet seed can be obtained from Germany as usual.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 375. Joint resolution correcting an error in House bill 15692, approved July 21, 1914 (Private, No. 95), was read twice by its title and refered to the Committee on Pensions.

STORAGE OF RAW SUGAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 472) submitted by Mr. THOMAS October 8 (calendar day, October 13), 1914, as follows:

Whereas it is announced that immense quantities of raw sugar are being held in storage in New York and Philadelphia in the expectation that Great Britain and France will be strong competitors for Cuban sugar in the near future, and that the price of raw sugar will reach such a figure that the refined product in January and February may go to 15 cents a pound, which is the equivalent of a consumption tax of 10 cents a pound upon a necessity of life aggregating more than $500,000,000 per annum; and

Whereas this purpose, if it exists, constitutes a violation of the laws, both of the Nation and the States, and should be both prevented and punished: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to make immediate investigation into the facts relating to the proposed engrossment of raw sugar as stated by the press, and report the result thereof to the Senate as soon as the same can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. The resolution just read was prompted by this article, which appeared in the New York World of October 13:

RAW SUGAR BEING STORED FOR EXPECTED WAR RISE—DESTRUCTION OF EUROPE'S BEET CROP WILL FORCE BUYING OF AMERICAN CANE PRODUCT.

NEW YORK, October 12, 1914.

Immense quantities of raw sugar are being held in storage in New York and Philadelphia, it is learned, in expectation that Great Britain and France will be strong competitors for the Cuban sugar cane the latter part of this year, and that the price of raw will go to such a figure that the refined product in January and February may go to 15 cents a pound.

A sugar broker said:

"There is a shortage of at least 7,000,000 tons of beet sugar due to the destruction of the European beet crop, and the countries that heretofore have obtained their sugar from this source must become bidders for the cane product which has in the past been purchased only by refiners of the United States.

"There is a comparatively large supply of raw in the hands of American refiners now, and demand has sunk to normal after the first scare due to the war, and there has been slight recession of prices. Last week raw was quoted at $5.02 per 100, and refined at $6.40 to $6.50. How long these figures will be maintained no one can say. The price will depend entirely upon the demand of Europe."

Records of the Bush Terminal Co. show that in August, 1913, there were 85,000 packages of Philippine and Hawaiian sugar received at their piers. In August of this year there were 566,000 packages, nearly all of it from Hawaii and the Philippines.

Mr. President, it appears that, owing to climatic conditions, the normal supply of sugar this year in Cuba will show a decrease of 500,000 tons or thereabouts, as compared with the output last year. The dispatches have also informed us that within the last fortnight the dealers in Great Britain have secured 900,000 tons of sugar from Java and other tropical sections outside of Cuba.

The shortage consequent upon the war is going to be enormous. Great Britain has exerted herself very effectively and summarily to prevent an extraordinary rise in the price of this necessity of life, and as a result the normal price of sugar to the consumer of Great Britain is comparatively very little more than it was before these conditions arose. Now, if it be true, as intimated in the article—and I do not know whether it be true or not—that the great concerns engaged in the refining of sugar are storing large quantities of raw sugar in order to corner the market and increase the price of this prime necessity of life to 15 cents or to 10 cents, or even to 8 cents a pound, the consequent tax upon the consumer of the country will be something enormous, when we consider that the average consumption of sugar is over 80 pounds per capita, in consequence of which a rise of a cent a pound means 80 cents annually to every man, woman, and child in the United States. The enormous and overwhelming profits that will ensue if this situation is permitted to go on, all of which come out of the pockets of the consumer of the country, who happen in this case to be all the people in the country, should be investigated and, if possible, stopped. As a consequence I introduced the resolution requesting the Secretary of Commerce to inquire into and report to the Senate whether the statements which appeared in the public press were well founded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado favorably consider an amendment to his resolution asking the Secretary of Commerce to investigate the effect of the reduction of the tariff on sugar with reference to the volume of its domestic production?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; Mr. President, I do not think that that is germane to this resolution of mine at all. Besides, it would needlessly prolong the investigation, and this corner might perfect itself before any report could be made. The effect of the reduction of the duties upon sugar has been very favorable to the consumer. It is the one thing in which the price of a necessity of life was reduced, and of which I am glad the consumer got the benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am quite sincere in my suggestion, because the facts are accumulating very rapidly that the hostile legislation against our domestic sugar production has resulted in a very sharp curtailment of the domestic product. I have been told of a number of instances where factories have been closed in anticipation of the removal of the duty on imported sugar under the recent tariff law. However, I am very glad that the Senator from Colorado has called attention to the power of the refiners to fix the price of sugar.

We have contended that the domestic sugar production—and by that expression I include the production in Louisiana as well as that in the various States where beet sugar has been produced—should be encouraged. The beet sugar, coming, as it does, refined from the factory where the beet is ground in its raw state, has tended to deprive the American Sugar Refining Co. of its monopoly in fixing the price of refined sugar, and the very fact that throughout our country there have been factories erected and vast sugar operations conducted tending to "bear" the price and to deprive the refining company of its monopoly in the American market is a sufficient testimonial to the wisdom of the Government's policy in maintaining protection upon that article of necessary use.

I think it was Mr. Wilson, the author of the Wilson tariff law and a former very prominent Democratic Member of Congress from West Virginia, who stated many times while he was in the House of Representatives and at the head of the Committee on Ways and Means that there was no product of our soil touched by American genius or labor that had a better right to the protection of this Government against foreign competition than our domestic sugar industry. Although Prof. Wilson was somewhat of a free trader, as his namesake, the present President of the United States, seems to have been, yet he did make that admission at the time he presented the Wilson bill to the House of Representatives, a measure which had the cordial support of the present Secretary of State; indeed, the present Secretary of State was one of the men who carried Prof. Wilson out of the House of Representatives upon his shoulder, as a testimonial of the high regard in which he was held by his colleagues who believed as he did regarding the principle of tariff reform.

So, Mr. President, I am very glad to see my honored friend from Colorado, in whose State the domestic sugar industry has thrived, and in whose State it gives very good evidence of soon languishing, as it does in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, move in this matter.

The stocks of our domestic sugar industry in Michigan fell from the time this assault was made upon it in the Underwood-Simmons bill from par to less than $18 a share; the whole industry has been discouraged and demoralized; and if we were as dependent now upon the foreign supply of sugar as we are dependent upon the supply of the seed from which the sugar beet is grown, we would, indeed, be in a most pitiable condition, and the price of our sugar would soar to limits not yet stated by my honorable friend from Colorado and not yet realized by the people of the United States.

I regard the assault made upon the domestic sugar industry of our country by the recent tariff law as a wicked and unjustifiable attack upon legitimate industry, which, if carried to its ultimate conclusion, will oblige us to depend upon a foreign supply for this great article of necessity.

Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the inquiry proposed by my friend the Senator from Colorado, but I am not willing to let the occasion pass without some observations which tend to show, at least to my own mind, that there are other causes than war for the arbitrary desire of the refining company to raise its price unnecessarily high at the present time, and those causes are directly attributable to the recent tariff legislation. The fact is that this industry is being ruthlessly exposed to foreign competition. This Congress did not have the courage to destroy this industry at one blow, but they arranged to cut off one of its arms the first year, one of its legs the next, and cut its heart out in 1916 as soon as the next presidential election is out of the way.

Now, Mr. President, I protest against this assault upon one of America's most promising and one of its most successful industries. In numerous States sugar factories have risen upon the enterprise and the genius of men whose sole desire was to diversify American production and to produce on our own soil a necessary article of consumption useful to our people, and it would have grown and developed until we could have produced all the sugar we consume in America, retaining this vast expenditure in our own circulating medium, had that industry received the care, attention, and solicitude from the American Congress which its merits demanded, while the duty collected through our customhouses would have relieved the Treasury of much of the strain it is now undergoing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into an extended discussion this morning upon the effect of the recent tariff law upon beet sugar. Neither shall I deny that some factories, ostensibly erected for the purpose of refining beet sugar, have closed since that law was enacted. I do not know what the conditions are with reference to these closures in other States so intimately as I do those in my own, but the factories which are closed in Colorado were, for the most part, factories which were built by the trust in certain places where they were not actually needed in order to prevent others from building them and coming into competition, while one or two were really sugar speculations pure and simple.

Neither, Mr. President, shall I deny the fact that the market value of the shares in all the sugar companies has sensibly depreciated, not in value, but in price. As a matter of fact, we all know—it is official knowledge now—that these institutions were capitalized in some instances for twice as much, and in others for more than twice as much, as the capital actually invested, and the manufactured shares commanded large sums in the market because of the enormous profits which this protected industry was able to obtain from the people. In my State not only was the tariff given by the Payne-Aldrich law added to the cost of production, but, in addition thereto, the freight charge from the Missouri River to Colorado, the latter tariff still being in active existence, and no man to-day can buy a hundred pounds of sugar at the factory door of any sugar factory in the State of Colorado as cheaply as he can get the same sugar at the Missouri River, plus the freight upon it from the Missouri River to the city of Denver and other common points.

Mr. President, it may be that great losses have come to the holders of stock in sugar companies in recent years, but it is not true that those who invested their capital in the erection of these concerns have lost any money, except possibly in occasional and isolated instances, for the amount of profit which these companies have made has much more than reimbursed the gentlemen engaged in this very lucrative and necessary pursuit for the amount of money originally invested; and, Mr. President, upon the assumption that an extraordinary profit of 3 cents per pound will be realized from the crop of 1914—which I think is within bounds—the amount of unexpected profit which these gentlemen will reap will be about two-thirds of the amount of actual capital invested in the business.

I merely wish to add before taking my seat that Mr. Henry T. Oxnard, one of the pioneers in this business, in a circular signed by himself and his partners, the Cuttings of New York, away back in 1899 declared that with beet sugar at 3 cents a pound a good profit could be made, and with sugar at 4 cents a pound an enormous profit could be made by mills engaged in extracting and refining it. He went further and stated that, even if sugar were placed upon a free-trade basis, being an agricultural product, we could compete as well with Germany in its production and manufacture as we could in any other agricultural product. Hence I do not think these gentlemen have suffered much nor that they will suffer much in carrying on their legitimate business as heretofore.

In my State the producer of the beet was compelled last January to accept 50 cents per ton less for his beets than the contract price of the preceding year, the argument being that the Underwood bill threatened the companies with a complete loss of profit, and as a consequence the grower of the beets should bear a part of the burden. More recently, through the demands of our State Democratic platform, the old scale has been restored, but justice requires that these gentlemen divide this extraordinary profit with the men who grow beets.

I have nothing further to say upon the subject at present, but I hope the resolution will be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

PAY OF DENTAL SURGEONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 475) submitted by Mr. TOWNSEND on October 8 (calendar day, October 16), 1914, as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be requested to construe the following statutes, to wit: Thirty-seventh Statute, page 344; Thirty-seventh Statute, page 903; and Thirty-fifth Statute, page 66: with reference to the pay and the authorized manner of making the appointments in the case of each of the several classes of officers who may base claims for pay from Government funds on the said statutes.

Mr. THORNTON. It seems to me it would be the proper course to refer that resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Senator very desirous for that to be done? If we are to have action at all, we must have it to-day.

Mr. THORNTON. I think the resolution ought to go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion to that effect?

Mr. THORNTON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It will be so referred.

DENTAL SURGEONS IN THE NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 476) introduced by Mr. TOWNSEND October 8 (calendar day, October 16), 1914, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to supply the Senate with the following information:

1. As to the number, pay, and date of his appointments of dental surgeons who were authorized by the act of August 22, 1912, to be appointed to the grade of "acting dental surgeon" for "temporary service" and whose appointment "shall have no force or effect except for the time the temporary appointee is in active service."

2. As to the number, pay, and date of his appointments of dental surgeons who were authorized by the act of August 22, 1912, to be appointed to the grade of "acting assistant dental surgeon" and who are serving a probational period with a view to their permanent appointment.

3. As to the number and date of appointment of dental surgeons whose nominations have been submitted to the Senate under the provision of the act of March 4, 1913, which provides that "no dental surgeon shall render service other than temporary service until his appointment shall have been confirmed by the Senate"; also the number of dental surgeons, if any, who have been ordered to render service since March 4, 1913, without their appointments having been confirmed by the Senate.

4. As to the number and date of orders of members of the Dental Reserve Corps who are now on active duty under that clause of the act of March 4, 1913, which provides that "so many of said appointees may be ordered to active duty as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary to the health and efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps."

5. As to the number and date of orders of members of the Dental Reserve Corps who are on active duty, or subject to orders to active duty, and under instruction with a view to their appointment as officers of permanent tenure in the carrying out of that proviso of the act of March 4, 1913, which provides "that Dental Corps officers of permanent tenure shall be appointed from the Dental Reserve Corps membership in accordance with the said provisions of the said act."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that a bill on this subject has passed the House of Representatives and is on the calendar. Am I not right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was very hopeful that we would reach that bill to-day. Under the circumstances I should like to have this resolution lie on the table, so that when we reach the bill it may take the place of the resolution.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I think it would be eminently proper to have that resolution also referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I ask that it may be so referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I have noticed in one of the newspapers published in Washington a statement to the effect that when the war-tax measure was being pressed to a final conclusion on last Saturday I had entered into an agreement with certain other Senators to vote to defeat the war-tax bill in the event that the cotton amendment should not be adopted, and that I was prevented from taking such a course through the influence of a certain member of the Cabinet.

I wish to say that the statement is absolutely untrue. I entered into no agreement to vote to defeat the war-revenue bill; and when the motion of my good friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] was made to indefinitely postpone the bill, and the Chair held that such a motion would be a final disposition of it if carried, I immediately announced to those about me that I could not support it. The statement that I was influenced by anybody in taking that action is entirely untrue.

I feel it due to myself, and also due to my colleagues, to make this statement. I did everything within my power for the cotton bond amendment, and no one regretted its defeat more than I.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have also noticed that my name was put in one of the Washington papers as being one of the eight southern Senators who, it was said, had combined to try to prevent the passage of the war-revenue bill unless the cotton amendment was agreed to; but as everybody here knew that my position was diametrically opposite to that, I did not consider it worthy of any attention.

THE PLAZA CASES.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be put upon its final passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 331. Is there objection?

Mr. ROOT. May the joint resolution be read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I am requested by the conferees who have in charge the war-tax bill to ask, at the proper time, for a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, in order that the conference report may be considered at an evening session. I simply desire to give notice that I shall make that motion. I understand that it is the desire of Senators to proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII, but with the understanding and agreement that nothing but unobjected bills are to be considered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Unobjected bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us have that understanding, or unanimous consent—that it is only unobjected bills that will be considered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose that might as well be the understanding, because plainly we could not get a quorum if we undertook to do anything else.

Mr. KERN. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the matter should take the form of a formal unanimous-consent agreement it would be necessary to call the roll. It can be done by common consent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, do I understand that unanimous consent has been given to proceed with the calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; for the consideration of unobjected bills. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 94) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to investigate the condition of trade in China, for the purpose of determining the desirability of establishing there a permanent exposition of the products of the United States of America, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. WARREN. Let that go over.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope the Senators will withdraw that objection. This matter has been on the calendar for a long time, and the appropriation which is required is very small. Its purpose is to extend our commercial relations with China. I think that just at this particular time it is quite opportune that this resolution should be passed, and unless there is serious objection I hope it will be.

Mr. WARREN. There has been quite serious objection by Senators who are not in the Chamber at the present time, and who desire to discuss the joint resolution. I therefore ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2425) to authorize the Roanoke River Development Co. to construct and maintain a dam across the Roanoke River in Mecklenburg County, in the State of Virginia, approximately 20 miles below the town of Clarksville, in said State, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3791) to provide for a permanent exhibit of the resources of the States of the Union in or near Washington, D. C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time for the convening of Congress and commencement of the terms of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) to create a special committee of five Senators to assist the Interstate Commerce Commission in investigating certain facts regarding the methods and practices of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BUILDING.

The bill (S. 6059) to provide for the erection, furnishing, and equipping of a building in the city of Washington, D. C., for the Department of Justice was announced as next in order.

Mr. KERN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. ROOT. Let me ask if I am correct in understanding that the bill is substantially the same as House bill 13870, which passed the House?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think the bill has passed the House. A similar bill was introduced in the House and the Senate—the bill prepared by the department.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to say about this bill that it appears to me to have been based upon insufficient information about the facts.

In 1910 Congress authorized the obtaining of designs and estimates for the construction of a building for the Department of State, one for the Department of Justice, and one for the Department of Commerce and Labor, upon the land which we had already purchased between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets and Pennsylvania Avenue and the Mall. Those designs were to be approved by a board consisting of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the heads of the respective executive departments. Under that statute an open public competition was held, to which the architects of the United States were invited. Great numbers of them came in and submitted plans and designs, and those designs were passed upon by the board created by the statute in regard to the Department of Justice Building, the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General. One of the plans was selected and the contract to be the architect for the building was awarded to the maker of the successful design. Since that time that successful competitor has been going on perfecting and working out the plans under his contract with the Government.

This bill authorizes the breaking of that contract with the Government and the ignoring of the rights of the successful competitor. It is a breach of faith by the Government of the United States, which was pledged to the competitors in that open public competition. The bill ought not to pass if we have any regard for the good faith of our Government. It provides that the same commission, except that the incumbents of the offices have changed, shall have "power and authority to obtain, through competition, under such conditions as the commission may prescribe, or from an architect specially selected by said commission," designs and plans for the building for the Department of Justice, and to go on and put up the building, shoving aside and ignoring the contract already made and the action of the Government of the United States under the authority of Congress selecting the design and constituting the successful competitor the architect.

I think it must be that the committee was not familiar with these facts when it reported the bill favorably.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that in accordance with the order under which we are now proceeding a single objection sends the bill over.

Mr. ROOT. I will not object to the Senator from Virginia proceeding.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that the committee reporting on this subject were better acquainted with the facts than is the Senator from New York, if the facts as stated by him are the full limit of his acquaintance with the matter.

Mr. ROOT. No; I know many other facts that I have not yet stated.

Mr. SWANSON. Congress authorized, as the Senator said, the construction of these buildings, and it made an appropriation for plans limiting the appropriation to the preparation of plans by the Government. I hope the Senator will listen.

Mr. ROOT. I am listening with great care.

Mr. SWANSON. For the preparation of the plans Congress provided so much money to be paid for the plans when submitted for approval. The plans were submitted, they were approved, and the architect has been paid what he was entitled to receive for his plans.

Now, when the time came, the architect desired to have a contract by which he should be paid the usual fee for construction in addition to his plans. That has never been authorized. It was not held by the department in its advertising or implied that the architect who would prepare the plans which would be accepted would have the right of construction with the fees involved in it. The department never had any authority to make a contract to pay the architect's fees of 5 per cent for construction.

If I recollect right, the architect has already been paid $49,000. He and those who are cooperating with him have for years prevented any bill from passing for the construction of a building for the Department of Justice here unless the bill would compel the Government to employ him as the architect and pay him the usual fee for construction.

The department has insisted, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have insisted, that the entire contract made with this architect has been complied with. The contract was entered into and all the money that he is entitled to under that contract for the adoption and acceptance of his plan will be paid. He is entitled to that; but there is nothing in the law or the authorization requiring them to employ him to construct the building. There might, and possibly will be, some modifications in the plan. All I have to say is that if the Senator wishes to take the responsibility of saying that this great needed improvement shall not be made unless the Government will make a contract it is under no obligation to make and has not agreed to make, to pay him the fee for supervising this work, which can possibly be done by the Supervising Architect's office, thus saving that money to the Government, the responsibility is with the Senator and not with me.

There is nothing in this bill that will prohibit the Government from employing this architect if his plans are finally carried out and if it desires to employ an architect to supervise the work. There is nothing here that would exclude the employment of that architect. The Government has not violated any contract with him. If the Senator will read all the documents I put in here about a month ago, the correspondence, the advertisement for bids, the law, and the letter from the department explaining this matter, he will clearly see that these are the facts.

This bill was prepared by the department and introduced cotemporaneously in the House and the Senate as the plan the department wishes to follow in connection with the erection of the building for the Department of Justice.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire the name of the architect.

Mr. SWANSON. I forget the name. I have not the papers here.

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. Of course, if the Senator insists I shall have to submit, but I will say that the passage of this bill is very earnestly desired by the Interior Department and very strongly urged by it.

Mr. WHITE. I will state that the Senator from Colorado has many objections concerning the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 9270) for the relief of John M. Gray was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that that bill go over.

FRANK KINSEY HILL.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed Senate bill 6138, for the relief of Frank Kinsey Hill, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 6138 was passed.

Mr. THORNTON. I will state the reason for the motion. There are several retired officers who are in exactly the same situation. We have refused to pass any of the others, and this was done without the notice of a single member of the Naval Affairs Committee. I had never heard of that bill. It never came before me. For that reason it is not fair that this officer should receive the benefit of the bill without the other officers having an opportunity to have their cases also considered

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think this is an act of justice to Capt. Hill, and while I am as deeply interested in the bill regarding the restoration to active service of Capt. Gibbons as I could possibly be in any matter of a personal nature—he is my boyhood friend, and has not a single black mark against him from the time he entered the Naval Academy until he returned on the dreadnought Utah to New York Harbor after the Vera Cruz assignment—I had very much hoped that the Senator from Louisiana had consented to allow the case of Capt. Hill to pass. I certainly should make no point on it. I think the retirement of Capt. Hill and Capt. Gibbons reflects no credit upon this Government, and weakens the Navy. I do not wish to embarrass the Senator from Louisiana in any way.

Mr. THORNTON. It is not possible for the Senator from Michigan to embarrass the Senator from Louisiana by anything in connection with this case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can at least embarrass him to the extent of not permitting this bill to be reconsidered, if that is any embarrassment. The case can not be reconsidered unless the Senate so votes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the case of Capt. Hill is on all fours with that of Capt. Gibbons, I certainly hope the bill may remain as it is, as passed; and I hope that at some other time we will do likewise with the bill for the relief of Capt. Gibbons.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think there is a misunderstanding in the Senate in connection with these officers selected for retirement by the "plucking board."

There are four cases of eminent officers, almost the best officers in the Navy, recognized as officers of distinguished service, and a majority of the committee have reported to the Senate that they should be put in active service. The "plucking board" did great service when the naval service was loaded down with inefficient and old men, and the department could not discriminate as to who should and who should not be retired. Consequently, the "plucking board" was established to retire so many officers a year of a certain rank. It is entirely compulsory. It is not left discretionary. I think 15 officers, or at least a certain number of officers of a certain rank, must be retired each year. The question is, who shall be retired?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I believe they deduct from that number those who may voluntarily retire; do they not?

Mr. SWANSON. Those who voluntarily retire; yes.

Mr. WARREN. And then they have to make up the balance of the number. As the Senator says, they are forced to do it.

Mr. SWANSON. They are forced to do it. When these officers are retired they are retired on full pay, at tremendous expense to the Government, and some of them are the very best officers in the Navy. Take Capt. Rust, who was retired. Capt. Rust has written two books which are authorities on navigation in the Navy. He has one of the most illustrious and splendid records in the Navy; yet he is retired, and his information, his learning, his knowledge and efficiency can no longer be utilized by the Navy.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, is it not a fact that many of these officers are retired in the prime of life?

Mr. SWANSON. It is. Now, when these officers are retired a great many of them never ask to be reinstated. A great many of them prefer to be retired and get full pay and do nothing rather than to be in the Government service. The officers who come and ask to be reinstated are men who love the Navy, who have given their lives to the service of the Navy, who desire to continue to serve the Navy, and practically to serve it without pay.

What do these four distinguished naval officers ask? The privilege of serving the United States Government in active service practically without charging anything for their service. Capt. Gibbons, Capt. Hill, Capt. Rust, and Admiral Veeder are four as distinguished, as competent, and as capable officers as we possess. They are retired on full pay. The Government can not utilize their experience, can not get the benefit of the vast sum of money that it has spent to make them efficient officers. The only benefit that accrues is that young officers can be promoted more rapidly—young officers who have not the experience, the ability, or the capacity that these four illustrious officers have.

These men come to Congress and ask what? They ask us to give them the privilege of continuing in the active service of the United States Government without paying them practically a cent for their service. The very fact that they are anxious to serve the Government on exactly the basis of their rank when retired, the fact that they are willing to do it without compensation, alone shows that they are men who are fond of the Navy, men of capacity, and men desirous of being in the service of the Government. To continue this system of retiring officers capable of efficient service each year simply in order that promotion may be more rapid is an injustice to the Government, an injustice to the service, and an injustice to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to add to his very convincing argument the statement that the Navy is short of officers. We lack a full complement of officers to man the vessels which now constitute the American Navy. It seems to me that fact ought to be given consideration, especially in view of the disinterested offer of these gentlemen to serve their country hereafter, if they can be permitted to do it, as retired officers without pay.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. With great respect to the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Louisiana, for both of whom I have the highest respect, I make the point of order that by unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to call the calendar on unobjected bills; that there are only six or eight bills left on the calendar; and that we must finish them before a motion to reconsider something that has been done can be taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair agrees with the Senator from Montana this far: The Chair made an error in submitting the question at the present time. He should have asked the Senator from Louisiana to enter the motion, to be taken up when we had completed the call of the calendar in pursuance of the unanimous agreement.

Mr. MYERS. I think we ought to finish the calendar first. Then Senators can stay here all day, if they want to, and debate this motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. BRYAN. If it can not be taken up to-day, it does not lose its place?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will go over. This completes the calendar.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain interviews and resolutions on the cotton situation: First, an interview with Walter Clark, president of the Mississippi Division of the Southern Cotton Association; second, a resolution adopted at a conference of the governors of the cotton-growing States held at Memphis October 17, 1914; and, third, a letter from ex-Gov. Noel, of Mississippi, upon the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from Tennessee will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW OF WALTER CLARK, PRESIDENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI DIVISION OF THE SOUTHERN COTTON ASSOCIATION.

I returned from Texas after a week spent in discussing the question of no acreage, and I want to say that after it, a vote being taken, 90 per cent of all the people immediately signed petitions to their representatives in the legislature, directing them to support a bill to prohibit the growing of cotton next year. All of the other gentlemen who went into other parts of Texas have had the same experience. Messrs. Noel, Jordan, and Sherrard are at Austin, and hope to get the matter before the legislature at an early period. However, the metropolitan press in Texas, as here, continues to say that such a step is unconstitutional, impossible, etc.

Now our efforts have stopped nothing else. Everything has been done that can be done, and cotton continues to decline. I feel, however, that a speculative demand will now appear and absorb all cotton offered at present prices. This, however, will not help us. If we part with this crop at such ruinous prices half our people will be bankrupt.

WAR TO LAST LONG.

There is one thing above all others that is affecting the price of cotton—the uncertainty of next year's crop. This removed, and in unmistakable terms, by legislative enactment, an immediate advance is inevitable. Now, should every southern legislature immediately pass prohibitory laws no unreasonable advance should be expected. Trade conditions do not justify any abnormal prices. I do believe that the crop would average 12 or 15 cents. It is silly now to talk about an early ending of the war. All authorities now agree that the war will last indefinitely, and, with half the world at war, and moratoriums declared in all important countries of the world, we have now enough cotton to supply the demands of spinners for two years.

I owned a brickyard for 20 years; I went through the hard times of 1892, 1893, 1897, 1898, 1904, and 1905, and during all that period I never in my life sold a brick below the cost of production. I never even reduced the price. When my product was not taken I simply closed down, and there is not a manufacturing plant of any kind anywhere in the world that does not do the same thing, and why the farmer sacrifices what he has and goes and makes more to be sacrificed, I have never yet been able to understand. For the first time we have an opportunity to eliminate the boll weevil without cost to anyone. This means more than a dozen cotton crops to Mississippi and all the eastern cotton-growing States, and should be taken advantage of at this time.

LEGISLATION LATER.

Now, as to Gov. Brewer's refusal to call the Legislature of Mississippi together, there is no necessity for such a move at this time. A legislative session is expensive and not necessary until either South Carolina or Texas agrees to act. Should either of these States take this action I know Gov. Brewer well enough to say that he will call a special session of the Mississippi Legislature if the people desire it.

In the meanwhile I would urge upon the people of Mississippi to meet in their respective counties at 10 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday, October 20, to perfect their organizations and sign petitions to the governor, requesting him to call a special session of the legislature. Send these petitions to me, and at the proper time I will present them to Gov. Brewer.

At a conference of the governors of the cotton-growing States held at Memphis on October 11, 1914, in which Governors G. W. Hays, of Arkansas; Earl Brewer, of Mississippi; L. E. Hall, of Louisiana, and Blease, of South Carolina, participated in person, and Governors Craig, of North Carolina, and Hooper, of Tennessee, through representatives, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas the governors of a majority of the cotton growing States of the Union are unavoidably absent and we have no authority to bind them or their States in any manner: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we approve the effort of bankers in the United States to form the $150,000,000 syndicate to take care of the surplus cotton crop of 1914.

And that we urge our people to curtail the cotton crop of 1915 as much as possible and not less than 50 per cent reduction. We urge upon the Federal Government and its officers the necessity of furnishing all the financial aid in marketing this crop that is possible.

We urge that earnest efforts be made not only to decrease cotton acreage but to develop proper marketing facilities for the diversified crops made necessary by present conditions.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY,
Washington, D. C., October 21, 1914.

Hon. LUKE LEA,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just read in the Times-Picayune, of New Orleans, a letter on the cotton situation, from Mr. Newman, advocating the elimination of the cotton crop of 1915 in order to restore equilibrium between supply and demand, and thereby also to necessitate rotation and diversification of crops, larger cattle breeding, with increased fertility of soil, and extirpation or minimization of the boll weevil, root rot, and other pests that can only perpetuate themselves through annual planting of cotton.

The county of Holmes, my place of birth and residence, in a meeting called to consider the cotton question on September 19, 1914, largely attended by farmers, supply men, and bankers, unanimously declared for that policy, to be enforced by State or Federal legislation, or both. A regularly called and organized State convention of cotton growers and allied interests, held at Jackson, Miss., on September 22, by an almost unanimous vote adopted the same policy. At the southern cotton convention held in New Orleans September 29–30 practically the same doctrine was unanimously affirmed. The Texas delegation to that convention arranged a series of appointments for last week covering about 80 counties, including those that raised the most cotton. By their invitation I spoke at 12 or 14 of these appointments. By votes taken at these meetings there was almost a unanimous expression obtained in favor of elimination by law of the 1915 cotton crop. The question of total elimination or reduction to a very small fraction is being now considered by called sessions of the Legislatures of Texas and South Carolina, and efforts are being made to have called sessions in all the cotton growing States. It is the opinion of the attorney general of Texas and his able associates that under the police power the States have unquestionable authority to eliminate or reduce cotton production by law.

I attach to this letter a summary of the argument made by me in Texas and which was indorsed by every cotton grower, with one exception, in the meetings I addressed, so far as it affects the Federal power and duty in this great emergency.

Very respectfully,

E. F. NOEL.

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT OF E. F. NOEL, OF MISSISSIPPI, IN ADVOCACY OF A LAW ELIMINATING THE 1915 COTTON CROP IN THE SOUTH AND MADE AN EXHIBIT TO HIS LETTER, WHICH IS ATTACHED.

The condition of the cotton growers of the South, especially where it subordinates, as in many sections, all else, is exceedingly critical. After all expenses, most of it on borrowed capital, had been incurred, on a basis of $65 a bale, the price suddenly dropped to about $30 a bale, with unmistakable indications, unless some early and radical action be taken, of descending to indefinitely lower levels. Hopes of relief from the Federal and State Governments, of improved warehouse and loan facilities, the withholding of cotton from the market wherever possible, the buy-a-bale, increased consumption, and other well-intended movements partially arrested the oncoming of a catastrophe, threatening ruin to hundreds of thousands of cotton farmers and many of their creditors. Except in the United States legalized suspension of debt collections have been provided for by every important nation, including China and South American Republics. Even here millionaires and other dealers of cotton, through cotton exchanges, have somehow obtained relief or respite.

Cotton growers are probably the only large class whose medium of payment has been suddenly robbed, through no fault of theirs, of more than half of its value, who have been left to weather the storm without governmental help.

European Governments, including those yet neutral, suddenly ordered from the ranks of producers of food millions and millions of men, leaving their harvests ungathered and their families and others so utterly impoverished that the primal question is now, and for a year or two may be, how to obtain enough food to sustain life. These unfortunates constitute the bulk of the consumers of cotton goods. Under their desperate straits old clothes will be worn for years, but fresh food is a vital, daily necessity.

It is not merely the stoppage of more than half of the world's spindles, but the disappearance of about half of the world's cotton consumption demands which has dragged down the price of cotton to one-half of its cost of production, threatening widespread bankruptcy.

One of the fundamental economic laws declares that when there is a known surplus of any commodity there is no other limit to its downward plunge below the cost of production but the need of the seller and the greed of the buyer. Another economic maxim proclaims the duty of every man and country to produce those things for which there is a demand, that will not only pay the cost of production but also yield a margin of profit.

It was foreign warring Governments which dislocated normal conditions by unexpectedly taking human millions from food production, thus creating such immediate and imperative necessity that cotton farmers shall immediately turn to grain and stock production or else encounter ruin. Inertia and rural conservatism are too great to leave this matter wholly to individual initiative.

Governments are created to establish and enforce rules of human conduct along lines of individual and public welfare, and have no other right or excuse for existence. With us such rules, through our delegated law-making officials, are self-imposed, and are but the crystallization of majority opinion. Official action can not be expressed otherwise than through the controlling hand of law. Kindly words or altruistic sentiments are not governmental functions.

Wholly in the interest of western dairymen, and at the expense of southern cotton growers, cottonseed oil, through Federal taxing power, was practically outlawed as a substitute for butter, though cheaper and about as healthy and nutritious. The United States Supreme Court, in the McCray case (195 U. S., 27), reannounced, in upholding that law, the previously well-settled rule that such prohibitive legislation is clearly constitutional.

The Federal imposition of a prohibitive tax on all cotton of the 1915 crop, ginned or manufactured, would at once restore the economic equilibrium between the world's supply and demand by limiting the present supply to the next two years' demand, and would insure to producers the cost of reproduction. It would also give to cotton such an immediate loan and sale value as to make its financing easy; would enforce the much-to-be desired policy of crop rotation and diversification, enlarged live-stock breeding, with consequent increased soil fertility, home living, and financial independence, besides minimizing or extirpating boll weevil and other pests that can only reproduce themselves annually through cotton plants. Even legal reduction by a prohibitive tax on all cotton grown, if over a fixed percentage of all cultivated lands be devoted to cotton, would do much toward relieving the present distressed situation. In the South all concede the advantage and practical necessity of reducing cotton cultivation 50 per cent or more, but some insist that this reduction should be voluntary. If so left, the value of the present crop would be destroyed and the southern farmers be disabled, most of them, from paying their present obligations in full and of farming at all next year, except in a feeble way, because the world would not believe in the reduction until after next year's planting season. If such reduction be enforced by law, the only means of obtaining uniform concerted action, the situation would be at once clarified and all would know what to do and what to expect. Immediate arrangements would be made in the South, on large scale, for planting and harvesting grain and for providing foodstuffs for themselves and for others.

During the Civil War, in December, 1863, when moral suasion had failed to have the desired effect, when the need was, as now, for sudden change of agricultural activity from cotton to foodstuffs, that result was not wholly left to individuals, but was forced by a practically prohibitive tax imposed in Mississippi and in most, if not all, of the other cotton States. That occurred in the hour of strong views of personal and property rights, but was made to meet, as is the proposed legal reduction or elimination of cotton, war emergencies.

The objection, coming chiefly from cities, that such legislation is paternalistic and invades personal and property rights, overlooks the fact that all laws abridge liberty, in the interest of individual and public welfare, with a view of making it easier to take right roads and harder to go otherwise, and that the trend of population is toward large cities, where exists the greatest limitation on personal and property rights.

While the cotton States, through the exercise of their police power, could eliminate or reduce cotton production, but few of the legislatures are in session, and uniformity and concert of action is difficult to obtain.

Without State or Federal relief the 1914 crop will not bring to its producers half the outlay it entailed, and will leave them so crippled that very little cotton or other crops will be produced in 1915. If such calamity confronted the North or West, quick congressional action would follow, such as came to the dairymen. Relief should not be withheld nor denied because the direct injury and loss falls alone on the South, even though some of our statesmen now, as in the past, entertain strong views on the right and power of Governments to aid individuals. All departments of government, Federal, State, and municipal, are but agencies chosen by the people to legally direct affairs for the benefit of the people. Partisan and sectional alignments should sink from view in face of such disaster as now threatens the cotton-growing South, and helpful legislation along constitutional and economic lines should be quickly enacted, thus providing not a mere sectional but a national benefaction.

JENNIE L. MAGINN.

Mr. SHIVELY. From the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 375) correcting an error in House bill 15692, approved July 21, 1914 (Private, No. 95), I report it back favorably without amendment and ask for its present consideration.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 21, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, for the good Thou hast woven into our being, which is ever striving to lift us out of the animal into the divine, that the desert places may blossom as the rose and satisfy the longings of the soul; discourage every selfish ambition, encourage every laudable desire; that the good may triumph and evil die; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. In the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Journal be approved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the Journal be approved.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS BEFORE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the address of the President of the United States before the American Bar Association on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the address of the President of the United States made before the American Bar Association on yesterday in the city of Washington. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is the address before the American Bar Association?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is printed in the Senate proceedings; however, I will not object. I gave notice yesterday I should object to all requests, but I withdraw that notice and I will not object.

Mr. BAILEY. If it has been printed, then I do not care to have it duplicated.

Mr. MANN. It was printed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his request?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

CORRECTING CERTAIN ERRORS IN PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 361, amended by the Senate, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 361 and consider the Senate amendments at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution by title and read the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to correct errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

The title was amended to conform to the text.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the situation brought about in the cotton States by the European war, including a letter and a plan to protect the 1914 crop as now in operation in Georgia that does not call on the Treasury for help.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of cotton, among other things setting forth a plan already in successful operation in Georgia. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR] makes the same request as to the cotton situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the proceedings under the rule providing for Calendar Wednesday to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to dispense with the business on Calendar Wednesday in order to-day.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the business in order on Calendar Wednesday was dispensed with for to-day.

JUDGE EMORY SPEER.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WEBB. I desire simply to ask for the adoption of the Report No. 1176, House Calendar 207, being the final report on House resolution 234, providing for an investigation of the conduct of Judge Emory Speer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to call up the report from the Judiciary Committee touching the conduct of Judge Emory Speer, of Georgia.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what action he proposes to take, if any?

Mr. WEBB. That no further proceedings be had under the resolution. I desire to state that it is a privileged report, anyhow, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there a resolution?

Mr. WEBB. No; I ask for the adoption of the report which carries the resolution that no further proceedings be had under House resolution 234.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves that the report be adopted. The Clerk will report it by title. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. WEBB. It is a unanimous report; yes, sir. The report is very brief. It does not cover more than half a page, and I would suggest it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought it was very long, because he happened to be looking at the book.

Mr. WEBB. No; it is contained on the first page.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany House resolution 234:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration House resolution 234, to authorize the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into and concerning the official conduct of Emory Speer, United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia, beg to report to the House of Representatives that a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, consisting of Representatives WEBB, FITZHENRY, and VOLSTEAD, was appointed to take testimony in the investigation of the behavior of Judge Emory Speer, United States judge for the southern district of Georgia, and that the subcommittee sat in the cities of Macon and Savannah, Ga., and examined numerous witnesses touching their knowledge of the alleged misbehavior of Judge Speer. The subcommittee made a report to the Committee on the Judiciary, which report is herewith submitted, setting forth in detail the charges against said judge and the evidence adduced under each charge, and concluding their report with a recommendation that no further proceedings be had with reference to House resolution 234.

The Committee on the Judiciary considered the evidence and the report and came to the conclusion that no further proceedings should be had with reference to said resolution, and the Committee on the Judiciary beg to report the same to the House and recommend that no further proceedings be had with reference to said resolution.

The question was taken, and the report was agreed to.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged resolution (No. 656) which I sent to the Clerk's desk yesterday and upon which I moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 643) for the consideration of various bills, having considered the same, beg to report the following resolution (No. 656) in lieu thereof, and recommend that it be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 45.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw that request and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-one Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 95, answered "present" 10, not voting 202, as follows:

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay" on this proposition, but I find I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DOUGHTON, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. HAMLIN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, who is in conference; but as I voted the same way that he voted last night on the roll call, I shall let my vote stand. I think it proper to make the statement.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 121, nays 95, answered "present" 10—a quorum. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WINGO. Before that is done, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request. I do this at the request of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I ask unanimous consent that the rule be amended by inserting, after the word "enumerated," in line 3, the words "and H. R. 15038." That is a bill that should have been included in the rule. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] asks unanimous consent that the resolution be amended by inserting, after the word "enumerated," the words "and H. R. 15038."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, as one or two have asked me what it is, I will explain that it simply adds these words to the present law. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. The present law authorizes member banks to discount acceptances which are based upon importation and exportation of goods to 50 per cent of their capital stock and surplus. This act proposes to amend that by adding these words to that part of the law "except by authority of the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as said board may prescribe." In other words, it allows the Federal Reserve Board in these member banks to go beyond that limit. It is necessary that certain banks in Chicago and New York that deal in foreign acceptances may come into the system. This would permit them to come in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It gives more latitude to the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to this resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WINGO. I will suggest, if the Speaker will permit me, that my request was that the rule be considered amended to that extent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to ask one question.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be reported at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "enumerated," in line 3 of the rule, insert the words "and H. R. 15038."

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question for his own guidance. This rule provides there shall be an hour and 30 minutes' debate on each one of the bills that is named in the rule. Now, does this request include an hour and a half for this bill, too?

Mr. WINGO. It would do that. There is no question about the effect of it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wanted to have an understanding. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] settles the whole thing by objecting.

Mr. HENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will wait until the motion is put on the adoption of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the rule.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks for a division. Those in favor of the adoption of this rule will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-six gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed to the adoption of this rule will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-four gentlemen vote in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 86 and the noes are 44, and the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to modify the resolution to this extent, that there be one hour for general debate additional to what is already allowed, to be equally divided between the proponents of the amendment to the Senate bill 6398—the first one mentioned—and those opposed to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to modify the rule, so that on Senate bill 6398 there shall be two hours of general debate instead of one, one-half to be controlled by——

Mr. HENRY. That I shall control 30 minutes of the time and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Who is to control 30 minutes?

Mr. HENRY. I will leave that to the Speaker. I will not make that request. The friends or proponents of the amendment to have 30 minutes and those opposed the other 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman fom Texas asks unanimous consent that the rule be so modified as to extend the general debate on Senate bill 6398 and the accompanying amendment to two hours instead of one, and that half of that increased hour, or added hour, be controlled by the friends or proponents of the amendment and the other half by the opponents thereof.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asked that this additional time be consumed in the discussion not of the bill but of the proposed amendment.

Mr. HENRY. That was the desire. That is the only reason why I put it that way.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; but I understood the Speaker, in putting the motion, to make this hour usable either on the bill or on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and I supposed that those who oppose the gentleman's amendment would prefer that that time be confined exclusively to the discussion of the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that the hour additional on Senate bill 6398 be devoted to the discussion of the amendment thereto, which is incorporated in the rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire how the division of the other hour on this same bill is to be made?

Mr. HENRY. That is to be divided by the Speaker between those who favor the original bill—Senate bill 6398—and those who oppose it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why not make your division of two hours into an hour on a side, on either side, without undertaking to give only an hour to the discussion of the cotton amendment instead of two hours?

Mr. HENRY. If there is no objection, then I will ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] be permitted to control half of that time in favor of the Senate bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let him control an hour of the time and you control the other, or some one else.

Mr. HENRY. There is only an hour on both sides at first, to start with, and this additional hour——

Mr. SHERLEY. That makes two hours. What is the good in dividing the time up into half an hour on a side on the cotton amendment? Why not divide the whole two hours into an hour on a side

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas will permit, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate on the Senate bill 6398 and the amendment thereto, proposed by the Committee on Rules, shall be extended from one hour to two hours, and that of the two hours of general debate thus provided the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] shall control one hour and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] the other hour.

The SPEAKER. This is in lieu of the other request?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that we shall want some time on this side.

Mr. HENRY. I will give the gentleman time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On which side is the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. We shall want time not by grace, but by right. I suggest if there is going to be an extension of time for debate, it shall be an extension of time for debate under the five-minute rule, affording an enlarged right for amendment under the five-minute rule. If the gentleman wants to do that, I have no objection.

Mr. HENRY. I think the gentleman is quite right about that, and I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he make the request that the time for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule be extended from 30 minutes to an hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I did not catch that on account of the noise.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the time for debate under the five-minute rule on the bill be extended from 30 minutes to an hour and 30 minutes instead of general debate.

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, this is a vital question that we are considering here, a very serious question, and I do not think it can be discussed in half an hour to a side; and I do not think the time ought to be divided up so that no Member of the House will have more than five minutes in which to debate a problem of this nature, and unless we can agree to an additional hour for general debate, to be controlled in such a way that we may have an intelligent discussion of the proposition, I shall object to any more addition of time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate under the five-minute rule on the first bill to be considered be extended from 30 minutes to an hour and 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the debate under the five-minute rule on the Senate bill 6398 be extended from 30 minutes to 1 hour and 30 minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] objects.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, then, that the general debate be extended for one hour on the first-enumerated bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Put the two requests together.

The SPEAKER. Does that mean the bill itself, or the bill with amendments? The Chair wants to know.

Mr. HENRY. It means the bill with amendments—the bill S. 6398 and the amendments thereto—the time to be extended from one hour to two hours.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Would it be in order, under the rules of the House, to discuss the amendment before it was offered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that technically it would not.

Mr. HENRY. I think it would.

Mr. MANN. It would not.

Mr. HARDWICK. It would be, unless some gentleman objected to it.

Mr. MANN. I would rather have time for real debate than for hot air.

Mr. HENRY. The request was to discuss the bill and the proposed amendment—to extend general debate for the purpose of discussing the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. Has this rule ever been printed?

Mr. MANN. Printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY. The rule was printed in the RECORD this morning.

The SPEAKER. Then everybody is informed of what is in that amendment. If not, it is their own fault.

Mr. MANN. Nobody can tell what is in it after reading it.

The SPEAKER. That may be. The Chair does not know. The Chair would be inclined to rule that Members could talk about an amendment that was incorporated in a rule adopted by the House and printed in the RECORD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the time on the bill S. 6398 and the amendments thereto be extended from one hour to two. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman might put the two requests together.

Mr. HOUSTON. Put both requests together.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I submit one more request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 30 minutes for general debate and 30 minutes for debate under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the general debate on Senate bill 6398——

Mr. HARDWICK. And the amendment.

Mr. HENRY. And the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to ask 30 minutes on the bill and 30 on the amendment.

Mr. HENRY. The point was that I wanted the debate also to apply to the amendment in the general debate as well as under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate on Senate bill 6398 and the amendment contained in the rule be extended 30 minutes. That would make 2 hours altogether on it.

Mr. HENRY. That would make two hours and a half, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes on the bill and thirty minutes on the amendment?

Mr. MANN. That would make an hour and a half for general debate and an hour under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HENRY. Yes; two hours and a half altogether.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. When the bill comes before the House, of course the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is entitled to recognition first. I do not remember what the rule provides as to division of time. He would ordinarily have control of one hour's time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not under the rule.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule he could not have more than 30 minutes, because the time is divided equally between the friends and the opponents of the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. Who will be recognized in opposition to the bill?

Mr. HENRY. Anyone opposed to the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. No; I am asking the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be disposed to recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. MANN. He is in favor of the bill.

Mr. HENRY. He is in favor of Senate bill 6398.

Mr. MANN. Who would be recognized in opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HENRY. I am opposed to the bill until it is amended.

Mr. MANN. I am opposed to the bill whether it is amended or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] was opposed to the bill.

Mr. HENRY. I hope you will get the time.

Mr. MANN. I am not willing to extend the time if gentlemen on that side of the House are to control it all.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Illinois says he is opposed to the Senate bill whether it is amended or not. I think he would be entitled to recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] as the proponent of the bill to dispose of the time on that side and the gentleman from Illinois as the opponent of it to dispose of the time on that side.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to be informed, when will an amendment to this amendment be in order? Will it be under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. Yes; there is no amendment in order until you get to the five-minute rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. One more parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. How will the Chair be governed in determining who is to be recognized for the offering of amendments to this proposed amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize anybody who has an amendment to offer. Of course the Chair supposes that the friends of this amendment which is incorporated in the rule have their understanding about who will offer that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is the general desire of Members to get away from here as soon as possible, and therefore I object to the request for the extension of time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield a minute, I desire to ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment now, so that it may be pending during the general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to offer the amendment at this time, so that it may be pending. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill 6398 and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act approved May 30, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the national banking laws," as heretofore amended in an act approved August 4, 1914, is hereby further amended so that the words "that no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 30 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus" is amended to read as follows: "That no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 75 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus."

SEC. 2. That the provisions and benefits of the act approved May 30, 1908, known as the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, and the amendments thereto, are hereby extended to all State banks and trust companies having a capital stock of not less than $25,000 and a surplus of 20 per cent. Said banks and trust companies shall be required to pay upon notes so issued the tax provided for in said act as amended, and said notes shall not be subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes." The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing provision.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 4 and 5, strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred."

Page 2: Strike out all of section 2 and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 5202, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to contingent liabilities incurred by national banking associations by reason of membership in currency associations organized under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, as amended."

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDWICK to Senate bill 6398:

Add the following at the end of section 2:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and in State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, the sum of $250,000,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The said Secretary shall make such deposits under the terms of this act and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him to carry out this act. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the securities he is now authorized or required by law to exact of the banks in which the funds of the United States are deposited, is authorized and hereby directed to accept as security for the deposits directed to be made in this act cotton warehouse and tobacco warehouse receipts, where the cotton or tobacco thereby represented has been fully insured, at a valuation that represents the fair market value of the cotton or tobacco covered by such receipts. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same, under reasonable terms and conditions, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or the owners of lands upon which the same was produced during the year 1914, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the terms and conditions under which these deposits shall be loaned by the banks that accept the same.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and said notes shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from the date of their issuance and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States or its equivalent on January 1, 1916; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not require the repayment of any deposit made under the provisions of this act prior to December 31, 1915.

"SEC. 6. That when the deposits herein authorized are called in by the Secretary of the Treasury the same shall be and become a part of a special fund, to be kept and held separate and apart from the general funds of the Government, for the redemption and retirement at maturity of the Panama Canal bonds in such cases and to such extent as the proceeds of such bonds have been used to make the deposits herein provided."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I am going to venture to ask unanimous consent again that the time for general debate on this particular Senate bill be extended for one hour, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other half by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The measure is of such vital importance that we should have time to at least explain the meaning of the bill and the possibilities of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate on Senate bill 6398 be extended one hour, which would make two hours of general debate upon that bill, 30 minutes of that time to be controlled by himself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state how much time for general debate on the different bills there is to be used; how much altogether?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on each one of these bills there is to be an hour of general debate, and 30 minutes under the five-minute rule on each one, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] now asks unanimous consent to extend the time for general debate on this one bill—Senate bill 6398—for one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the other half by himself.

Mr. DONOVAN. That will make four hours altogether?

The SPEAKER. It will make three hours of general debate on the two bills and 30 minutes under the five-minute rule on each bill, which will make altogether four hours of debate.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. BULKLEY].

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 6398 as originally introduced was a very simple proposition, providing for the liberalization of the requirements of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act with respect to the issuance of emergency currency. It is believed by the Treasury Department and by the Federal Reserve Board and by the Banking and Currency Committees of both the Senate and the House that some liberalization of those requirements would be desirable at this time. There are three reasons why an exceptional amount of currency is now needed, two of them being unusual reasons. The first reason is that it is crop-moving time, and at that season there is always a large amount of currency required for circulation. In the second place, an exceptional emergency has arisen because of the European war, necessitating considerable gold exports and requiring currency to take the place of the gold needed for export. In the third place, the unsettled conditions and fear arising out of the war have resulted in a certain amount of private hoarding of currency, and this should be offset by the issue of emergency currency. Many banks do not own enough bonds which are available under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as security for emergency currency to get as much currency as they would like to issue to meet this emergency. As we have now come to appreciate that commercial paper is the very highest and most liquid form of security, and as we have recognized that in passing the Federal reserve act, making commercial paper the basis of our future note issues, it is inconsistent to maintain the restriction imposed by the Aldrich-Vreeland Act on the availability of commercial paper as security for note issues.

The amount of emergency currency that banks may issue under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as amended by the act of August 4, 1914, is 125 per cent of their unimpaired capital and surplus, but only an amount equal to 30 per cent of unimpaired capital and surplus may be issued against commercial paper. This bill proposes to increase the amount that may be secured by commercial paper from 30 per cent of the capital and surplus of the issuing banks to 100 per cent. The Senate bill provided for an increase to 75 per cent, and the House committee proposes an amendment increasing this to 100 per cent. One hundred per cent of the capital and surplus is the amount that is asked for by the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board, and we believe that the adoption of 75 per cent in the Senate was due to a misapprehension.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman please tell us what is commercial paper as defined by the Treasury Department under the Federal reserve act, and also under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act?

Mr. BULKLEY. Commercial paper is that arising out of a commercial transaction; that is to say, out of a live transaction not involving any fixed investment—a transaction with respect to the production or movement of goods on their way to consumption. The reason why it is exceptionally good security is that at the end of a certain time the goods on which it is based are to be consumed, and therefore must be paid for. Thus, commercial paper is the most liquid security there is, because it has to be paid when the goods are consumed.

This bill, simple as it was in its original form, has been made the vehicle for an attempt to finance the much-discussed cotton situation. In the Senate that attempt was manifested in the addition of section 2, an amendment adopted by the Senate providing for the extension of the privileges of issuing emergency currency to State banks and trust companies. The amendment is important and far-reaching, but I think is not going to be insisted upon now, because it is recognized that the need in the financing of the cotton situation is not so much an addition to the supply of currency as it is a market for the cotton.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have an impression confirmed. This amendment to the Aldrich-Vreeland bill will terminate on June 30, 1915, will it not?

Mr. BULKLEY. The whole Aldrich-Vreeland law and all amendments will expire by limitation on the 30th of June, 1915.

The Treasury Department prepared a memorandum stating its objections to section 2 of the Senate bill, which the House committee proposes to strike out. These objections are set forth in full in the committee report, and my time is so short I shall not have a chance even to enumerate them. The most important objection is that the provision opens the way to inflation. It is estimated that section 2 of the Senate bill would make possible the issuance of an additional $1,600,000,000 of emergency currency, all made redeemable in gold at the Treasury, forthwith, and no adequate means provided for its redemption.

Another objection is that the section would make an unfair discrimination against the national banks, because in towns of more than 3,000 inhabitants national banks can not be organized with a capital as low as $25,000; yet this section would allow State banks of that capitalization to get the benefits of the Aldrich-Vreeland law.

It is not clear that the amendment would require currency associations organized under the Aldrich-Vreeland law to accept State banks as members, but such is the natural and almost necessary construction. This would involve an unfairness in that banks which become members of any currency association become liable for notes issued by all members of the association, and the double liability of stockholders of national banks would not be matched by the State institutions.

A very serious practical objection to section 2 as an emergency relief measure lies in the fact that it would be impossible to prepare the plates to make the currency for the State banks within the time the emergency is likely to exist. Indeed, it is not possible to state that all of these plates could be prepared even before the act expires by its own terms on the 30th of June, 1915.

The other amendment proposed by the committee is to amend section 5202 of the Revised Statutes. That section now provides:

> No national banking association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:
>
> First. Notes of circulation.
>
> Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.
>
> Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association or due thereto.
>
> Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserve profits.
> Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

Now, banks issuing emergency currency under the terms of the Aldrich-Vreeland law are required to guarantee all emergency notes issued by all members of their own association. They therefore assume a contingent liability for the obligation of the other banks in the association, and the inhibition of section 5202, if strictly applied, would practically prevent banks from joining these associations and taking out any emergency currency at all. This question has never come up and has never been ruled upon, yet it is certainly desirable to make it clear once for all that that inhibition does not apply to the contingent liability incurred by banks joining these associations.

I turn now to the question presented by the amendment reported from the Rules Committee and by the rule made in order on this bill. This amendment is one of a number of proposals made during the past few weeks for the relief of the cotton situation.

What is the cotton situation? The market of one of our greatest agricultural products is in a state of complete demoralization. The great European war resulted in the closing of mills and stopping of commerce to such an extent as seriously to impair the market for cotton and greatly to depress its price. What then? Prompt action on the part of the spinners to take advantage of the low price? Not at all. The low price and unsettled condition of the market served to create such uncertainty that spinners were afraid to buy, lest cotton might go still lower. The low price caused fear and hesitation. These caused still lower prices, which, in turn, seemed to justify and intensify the fear and hesitation. A crop which a few weeks ago was reasonably supposed to be worth a billion dollars is worth at to-day's nominal prices perhaps one-half that amount. I say nominal prices because just now there is no substantial demand at any price.

A loss of one-half the value of a year's labor is one that must be serious to anyone. Even if such a loss were due to the negligence or other fault of the loser, it would be hard to bear. If it were due to errors of business judgment, it would be hard to bear. If the loss could be foreseen, it would be hard to bear. But this year the cotton farmer was guilty of no negligence, having produced a splendid and bountiful crop. He was guilty of no error of business judgment in producing what the experience of years has shown to be a common necessity of the world. Yet he is now confronted with a loss which he could by no possibility have either foreseen or averted. His plight must appeal to our sympathy.

But it is doubtful whether sympathy alone, if nothing else were involved, should compel our action. It is seldom, indeed, that a great Government can take cognizance of individual misfortune, and sympathy in the business reverses of individuals or groups of individuals is an unsafe basis for legislation by Congress.

In the case before us, however, the aggregate of individual losses is so great as to constitute a national calamity. If cotton does not get some support, our national loss in the price of that part of the crop raised for export will be as much as the cost of the Panama Canal. Does anyone believe that such a great economic loss can be absorbed in one year by a few Southern States? Of course it can not. Every State and every section of our country will suffer through the business failures and diminished purchasing power of the Southern States unless this extraordinary situation can be met.

The situation is unprecedented, and therefore we must not be surprised if unprecedented proposals are made for its relief. Under the present circumstances we must not condemn a proposition merely because it is unprecedented.

But in a matter of so great importance we must carefully scrutinize relief measures, and we must reject those which are not adapted to meet the real needs of the situation and those which are contaminated with financial unsoundness.

Propositions have been made to increase the circulation, though it must be clear that circulation will be adequately provided for by existing law and the bill now under consideration as reported by the committee. The existing law, with the amendment now proposed by the committee, is amply liberal to meet currency needs, and yet contains abundant safeguards against inflation. Inflation seems to have no terrors for some Members of this body who, in their proper anxiety to relieve a desperate situation, seem willing to take chances with the integrity of our circulating medium. They argue that since one hundred and fifty millions of gold reserve will support three hundred and fifty millions of notes, therefore the same reserve will support six hundred or seven hundred millions. The fallacy must be apparent, and especially so in the light of the experience of 1893, when the inadequacy of reserves caused a run on the Treasury and sent gold to a premium. Time available does not permit an enumeration of the dangers of inflation or of casting any doubt on the integrity of the American dollar. Any risk of that sort is too great a price to pay even to relieve our distressed friends in the South or to save half a billion dollars. We can not risk a breakdown of our whole financial structure, for that would vastly spread the distress and multiply the economic loss.

Now, this amendment proposes to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to issue two hundred and fifty millions of legal-tender notes without increasing the gold reserve which supports them. It is true the notes proposed are not immediately redeemable in gold, and it seems that the proponents of this amendment are very properly willing to admit that it would be a dangerous proposition to make them so immediately redeemable. But by the terms of this provision they are redeemable on and after January 1, 1916. The day of reckoning is delayed only a few months. Then what? Since the proposed deposits can not be recalled before December 31, 1915, there must follow necessarily either repudiation or a bond issue. And who knows how a bond issue would fare in such a market as may develop after another year of European war? Meantime the inflation could begin. The proposed legal-tender notes would be reserve money for banks, and as such would provide the basis for expansion, which would make more difficult the adjustments on the day of reckoning; or these notes might displace gold as bank reserves, drive it out of the country, and make it trebly difficult to secure when sorely needed in 1916. The attempt of the authors of this proposition to avoid the evils of inflation is absolutely ineffective.

But there is an option given the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the situation in another way—by the issue of bonds, bonds to the amount of $250,000,000.

The President of the United States came to this Hall a few weeks ago to ask that $100,000,000 be raised by additional taxation. Well knowing the unpopularity of any new tax, well knowing that Panama bonds have already been authorized to an amount much greater than that now required, he none the less had the courage to analyze and to face the actual situation. "To sell bonds would be to make a most untimely and unjustifiable demand on the money market." Those were his words. Do you who propose this bond sale intend deliberately to repudiate his sound judgment? When he has refused to sell one hundred millions of bonds to meet the necessities of the Government and assigned as a reason that it would be an untimely demand on the money market, do you seriously propose to sell bonds to the amount of two hundred and fifty millions to give a relief which at best could be given only by taking a very liberal view of the functions of the Federal Government? If you could pass such a bill, what would be its fate when it should be presented to the President for his approval? In all seriousness, could he consistently perform his duty otherwise than by vetoing it? And a veto would end the hope of the needed and legitimate relief which the committee bill will afford.

Mr. Speaker, our duty is plain in the premises. There is a great emergency which, in my candid judgment, ought to be relieved by Federal aid. But the method proposed offers to the Secretary of the Treasury a choice between inflation and fiatism on the one hand, and on the other hand demoralization of the money market and the Government credit, for such would be the result of attempting a bond sale two and one-half times as large as one which the administration has repudiated as being too great under the present conditions. We must have the courage and patriotism to vote down such a proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. How does the gentleman think this bill here will aid the cotton situation?

Mr. BULKLEY. The bill that we propose?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I endeavored to explain that the bill was not designed to meet the cotton situation. I do not think that it does meet it. I think that we ought to meet the cotton situation in some other way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am speaking about the bill which the gentleman's committee reported.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am speaking about the bill we reported. It was not designed to meet that situation. It was designed to liberalize existing provisions for the issue of emergency currency.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood him to say that this bill as reported would in a measure relieve the situation.

Mr. BULKLEY. It will in a measure; but it will not meet fully the situation, and it is not pretended nor presumed that it does. I said that it would adequately take care of what is needed by way of circulating medium, and I contend that the question that confronts the cotton growers is not one of a circulating medium, but the lack of a market.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Does the gentleman from Illinois desire recognition? The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] control the time.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] desires to proceed or not.

Mr. GLASS. I would rather that the gentleman from Illinois would use some of his time.

Mr. MANN. I yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas, also.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, that gives me 20 minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. After I have proceeded for five minutes, I wish the Speaker would notify me.

Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to refer to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. That amendment is in strict accord with the Democratic traditions of more than 100 years. It provides for the issuance of United States notes. It provides for the issuance and sale of Panama Canal bonds. There have been two theories in this country about the issuance of currency—one that the banks should issue all the currency, and the other that the Government itself should issue it. When the Federal reserve act was passed we abandoned the theory that the banks should issue any of the currency, and that act, in section 16, provides that the United States notes hereafter to be issued shall be called "Federal reserve notes," and shall be the obligations of the Government of the United States, and shall be payable in gold. Therefore Congress has said that hereafter all paper money shall be issued by the Government and not by corporations and banks, as heretofore.

What is the Democratic faith as expressed in their platforms on that question? Let me read this part of the platform of 1896, which was not only the fundamental faith of our party in that year, but has been the doctrine of the Democratic Party since the first platform on the subject was written in New York in the early part of the century. It says:

> Congress alone has the power to coin and issue money, and President Jackson declared that this power could not be delegated to corporations or individuals. We therefore denounce the issuance of notes intended to circulate as money by national banks as in derogation of the Constitution, and we demand that all paper which is made a legal tender for public and private debts, or which is receivable for dues to the United States, shall be issued by the Government of the United States, and shall be redeemable in coin.

It is the sovereign function of this Government to coin gold and silver and to issue paper money redeemable in coin, or in gold, if you please.

Therefore this bill proposed by the gentleman from Georgia is bottomed on that plank of the Democratic platform. It is founded on numerous platforms that our party has adopted. It proposes nothing new and untried, but travels the beaten paths a century old. Therefore we are within our rights when we call upon this Government to exercise its sovereign functions and issue $250,000,000 of "United States notes with all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding," and to deposit those notes—the currency of the people—in the National and State banks of States in order that they may be loaned to the distressed growers of cotton and tobacco on terms fixed by this Government.

Gentlemen, is there any objection to a proposition of that sort? It can be defended anywhere. If I had the time I could elaborate on those propositions, but it is not necessary. I say to this House that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, having utterly failed to get the currency to the American people, and the Federal Reserve Board, which is being most tardily organized, having failed to respond to the needs of the people, it is the duty of the Representatives in Congress to supply an adequate amount of currency as provided in this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The five minutes have expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I feel very doubtful about this amendment to the Vreeland-Aldrich Act allowing banks to take out emergency currency on commercial paper alone equal to the amount of their capital and surplus. I opposed it in committee, if I remember rightly, on the ground that the emergency currency is a taxed currency, and that it is taxed to promote its retirement on the theory that most of it is bond secured.

By amendment passed soon after the outbreak of the European war, on August 4, the amount of emergency currency that can be issued was increased to 125 per cent of capital and surplus of banks, raising the limit from $500,000,000 to about $1,500,000,000, but it is evident that that amendment was unnecessary, as less than $400,000,000 has so far been taken out. Southern banks have not taken out all they have security for under the act as it is at present. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has stated that they could call for $151,000,000 more. When the amendment of August 4 was passed, the Secretary of the Treasury was unwise enough to tell the cotton farmers that there would be an abundance of currency for everybody, and that cotton farmers would have full relief from it. Now, nothing of the sort has happened. As a matter of fact, additional currency sent to southern banks will not stay there but comes back to New York, and that is because of a natural economic law. Business is dull in the cotton sections of the South, just as it is in some of the northern towns, where factories have been closed and men are out of work because of the tariff reduction, and where business is dull less currency is required than before, and not more currency. Neither the increase of emergency currency provided in this bill nor the issue of $250,000,000 of greenbacks provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas can do the cotton farmers any good. These propositions merely raise false hopes, and so hurt instead of helping the cotton farmers. The banks have already loaned all they can safely loan on cotton under present conditions. There is only one thing to do for cotton, and that is to provide a market for it, get somebody to buy it, so that it can become again good security.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I can not do more than to tell you something about the actual situation as it is in the South. Some of the gentlemen on the other side want to know why it is that the present emergency currency that is being issued can not do this work. The principal reason is that down South, gentlemen, we have no banking system for the producers. This money that goes into the national banks under the emergency-currency system does not go to the producers of cotton. These producers are all indebted for advances in making their crop. They have got to dispose and will dispose of their crops within the next 60 days. Their necessities are such that they can not keep it longer. Unless they can get relief now, it will be too late, and they will have to give up their crops for not exceeding one-half of what it took to raise those very crops.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why is it that the money does not go to these people?

Mr. McKELLAR. For the reason that I will explain to you more carefully. They have not a banking system, because in all of the Southern States they have an exemption of $1,000 and a homestead exemption of another $1,000 on real estate. Therefore you gentlemen can see that the small farmer or producer can not make bankable paper. In addition, the majority of banks in our section are State banks, which are not entitled under the law, and who do not receive, any of this emergency currency.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I regret I can not yield, because I have but three minutes. He can not make bankable paper. He can put up his cotton, where he owns the cotton, under the terms of this bill; and if such a bill as this is passed, it will offer great relief to him.

Now, gentlemen, are we violating any precedent here? Why, we are doing the same thing in this bill for the actual producers of cotton that the Secretary of the Treasury is now undertaking himself to do through the national banks. We are not departing from any established precedent. The Secretary of the Treasury is directing the national banks of the South to lend out money on this same kind of security and under exactly the same conditions that we are directing it to be done in this bill.

Now, what does it do? This bill merely enlarges the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury; it enlarges his ability to meet the situation. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] has just said, and every man who has spoken here has said, that it is a situation that has to be met and that our National Government ought to meet. Now, we people of the South have agreed upon a measure of relief, and we ask you, our friends from all over this country, to stand by us in this legislation.

The substance of this bill is that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered either to issue $250,000,000 of Treasury notes or sell $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, or both, and he is directed to deposit the notes or proceeds of the bonds in national or State banks in the cotton and tobacco producing States, to be loaned out to producers of cotton and tobacco in such a manner as will aid them, and in precisely such a manner as the Government of this country is now doing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if this bill should pass that there is no question of fiat money raised here. There is no question of inflation presented in this bill. It is true that the Secretary is authorized to increase the currency by $250,000,000, but he is only given a discretion in the bill to do so, and if he thinks there ought not to be any increase in the currency of the country he can issue the bonds instead, or, in his discretion, he may do both. The passage of this bill would not affect our financial system in the slightest. There is no change of any kind, nature, or description in our financial policy proposed. If the Secretary of the Treasury issues the Treasury notes it is no more than what we have done before. There are three hundred and forty-six millions of Treasury notes now outstanding, yet they are absolutely good. On the other hand, if he concludes to issue the bonds, as I believe he will should the bill be passed, it will only be what has been done many times before. Why, there is a bill in this House now, the Alexander shipping bill, which has been approved by our Democratic administration, which would authorize a sale of some of these very Panama Canal bonds. So that, I say, in so far as this feature of the bill is concerned, there is no change of governmental policy. There is no departure from precedent in it.

But it is claimed that the banks are directed to loan the money to the producers upon cotton as security; that this would be constituting a departure from the established financial policy of the Government. In this, Mr. Speaker, I submit that our opponents are in error. Time and again has this Government even lent money directly to its citizens. Time and again has this Congress in times of emergency, sometimes great emergency and sometimes small emergency, lent money to its citizens. Even more than that; in many instances we have given our citizens money to tide them over after great disaster. We appropriated money for them in Cuba in 1897. We appropriated money for them in the great earthquake in California. We have appropriated money for the flood sufferers along the Mississippi and Ohio. We have appropriated money for the Salem, Mass., fire sufferers, and but recently, as we all know, we have appropriated three and a half million dollars and lent it out to those of our citizens who were traveling abroad, without taking any security for it; and yet, in so far as actual suffering is concerned, those citizens traveling in foreign countries have not suffered as much as the southern cotton growers have since this war began. In addition to that, we have appropriated money and sent it to Italy to relieve those in distress. We have sent money to Mexico and, I believe, to China to relieve suffering and distress. But gentlemen may claim that these appropriations were gifts and are not parallel cases. If that be so, then I will submit parallel cases. A bank is just as much an individual under the law as a private citizen, and it is the fixed policy of this Government to lend money to banks in times of emergency. In 1907 the Government came to the rescue of the stock-and-bond market in New York by lending the banks some forty-two millions of dollars to tide these commercial enterprises over.

Only in 1913 the present Secretary of the Treasury most wisely extended this policy by lending large sums of money to banks in the farming States to lend out for crop-moving purposes. Only recently this same splendid Secretary of the Treasury has directed national banks, to which banks he has lent the Government's money, to lend that money out to farmers upon warehouse receipts of cotton as security. The truth is that the Secretary of the Treasury has taken the lead in extending this sound and effective financial policy of the Government, giving this aid where it is most needed to promote the commercial interests of the country. But under the law he has no power to do more. We should give him greater power.

The provisions in this bill are in direct line with the present policy of the Secretary of the Treasury in this regard. It simply goes one step farther and gives more authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to do for certain industries in a larger and more complete and a more effective manner just what he has been doing for all industries all during his tenure of office and more recently for these same industries. The Secretary has no power now under existing law to extend specific relief to the cotton producers of the South in this great emergency. This bill simply gives him the power to extend a larger measure of relief in this emergency to these people. Is there any danger about it? Not the slightest. The national banks under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury are now making loans on cotton. This bill provides that these same national banks, as well as State banks, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury shall simply enlarge their business by lending this specific sum appropriated in the bill to cotton producers for their relief in this emergency. Unless these banks fail to do their duty, unless they fail to take proper collateral and make safe loans, and I believe that no one will say that any such thing will occur, then it is impossible for injury to come. I do not believe there is a gentleman from the cotton States in this House, or elsewhere for that matter, who will believe for a moment this Government will lose a single, solitary cent by making the loans to the banks to be in turn made to producers of cotton as provided in this bill.

So that, Mr. Speaker, I submit to this House that this bill is directly in line with the financial policy of this Government. It is abundantly upheld by precedents. There is no departure from established policy. There would be no inflation of the currency. There would be no change in system, but it will simply be an enlargement of our present policy.

I was astonished on Friday when I listened to the argument of my friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I followed Mr. GLASS in his currency legislation. He was my leader. He is an able and splendid man. The legislation proposed by him is great legislation. His arguments in favor of it were among the best arguments that I have heard in this House since I have been a Member here. Feeling this way toward Mr. GLASS, I could not but be astonished at the reasons he proposed on last Friday for his opposition to this legislation. He said that it had been tried by the Confederate States and it had proven a failure, and that we were inviting the United States Government to do just what the southern Confederacy was unable to do.

Mr. Speaker, the southern Confederacy had a constitution exactly like the United States Constitution, with a few trivial differences, and that was a failure because the Southern States failed. Will the gentleman say because the constitution of this southern Confederacy failed that we should not uphold our Constitution, which is just like it? Not only the financial policy of the southern Confederacy failed, but every other policy of the Confederacy failed because that Government itself failed, and to me the precedent relied on by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia is wholly and absolutely without any point at all. The Confederacy had a commander in chief of the army, one of the most gallant military chieftains the world ever knew, and he failed. Would the gentleman from Virginia be opposed to having a commander in chief of an army because the Confederate commander in chief had failed? The Confederacy had a congress, and it failed. Would the gentleman from Virginia desire to abolish the American Congress because the Confederate congress of like kind and character failed? These questions surely answer themselves.

Again, the gentleman from Virginia placed his objection on the ground that it would bring about a depreciated currency. My answer to that is that the gentleman from Virginia must not have read the bill. As I have said heretofore, he is too able and keen sighted a statesman to have read the bill and not to have known that under the present administration there could be no inflation of the currency in carrying out its provisions.

Mr. Speaker, in considering the cotton question I have been astonished at two different political situations about it. One is the apparent willingness on the part of many of our northern friends to aid us in this time of great emergency. The other remarkable phase of the situation is that a number of our own southern Congressmen and Senators should take the antagonistic position that they do. A number of them now find that for the banks to lend the cotton producers this money by the Government upon a perfect security along lines precisely the same that are now being pursued by the Government is an awful thing, and yet many of those same gentlemen only a few weeks ago voted to lend three millions and a half dollars to those of our pleasure-loving citizens who were traveling abroad and who needed money without taking the slightest security from them, and in addition to that furnished a battleship to take the gold to them.

I want to say to my southern friends who take this view of it that I do not know what the people of your districts may think, but I believe that the people of my district feel that this is a question that only the United States Government can solve; that this is a question that the United States Government is empowered, under the Constitution, to solve; and that this is a question that their own Representatives in Congress ought to solve for the protection and benefit of the distressed people of our southern country. We are here to legislate for the general welfare of our whole country.

We have no right to attempt to put upon others the work which we are sent here to do. This is a national problem, not a State problem. This sure is a public calamity, not a private misfortune.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word or two about this unfortunate situation.

A system of indirect relief through banks does not provide for the producer of cotton. In my judgment, it is the duty of Congress to provide adequate banking facilities for the producers of all of our crops. It ought to be one of the highest functions of Government to see that the producers of all crops have such banking facilities that they may get adequate money and supplies for producing their crops at a reasonable rate of interest, and for the purpose of performing the most important function of life, and that is to produce the necessary means of existence out of the soil for all of our people. The Government has not yet done so. If this war continues, within a period of two months there will practically be no cotton in the hands of the original producer. It will have been taken by the merchants at these ruinous prices in payment of their debts, or it will have been sold by the farmer to obtain the necessities of life, and when the change comes and the price goes up, as necessarily it must upon the close of this war, the merchant who is able to get banking facilities to tide him over will get all the increase, while the farmer, the man who produced it, will not have gotten even the cost of production. This situation has caused and will cause the keenest distress to the farmers. It will cause bankruptcy and ruin to many of them. He does not ask and we do not ask for him any charity. He does not ask and we do not ask for him that the Government shall give him a price regardless of its market value. He is not a mendicant, and we are not applying to Congress on that ground, but we merely ask that the Government of the United States will do him the simple justice to provide him loans, upon his giving ample security therefor, so that he may take care of his crop until these conditions change, which conditions have been brought about through no fault of his own. It violates no principle of government. What is government for unless it is to protect its citizens in the time of disaster or misfortune?

If any of our citizens on the coast should be threatened by a foreign foe, would we hesitate in using all the forces of the Government to protect that city? If American citizens are threatened, the forces of the Government are there to protect them. It is the highest function of government to protect each and every one of its citizens in their lives, liberty, and property, and in asking that this measure pass we are merely asking for the cotton producer just what many other citizens in times of emergency ought to have the right to ask. It is the highest function of government to supply an adequate currency system to meet all emergencies.

Some gentlemen say that if we do this for cotton that we ought to do it for copper, and for lumber, and for canned goods, naval stores, and various other commodities. I do not believe that any reasonable gentleman has any such view as that. Cotton is in a different shape from any of those commodities. Corn and wheat and cattle and hogs are in a nearly similar attitude. If wheat was in a distressed condition or if corn was in a distressed condition, or cattle and pork, there would be an analogy; but to say there is an analogy between cotton and canned goods, where the exportation of cotton amounts to one-fourth of all our exportations and canned goods about one-fourth thousandth of all our exportations, to my mind, is ridiculous and not worthy of consideration.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment ought to be adopted, and I sincerely trust it will be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, some of our northern brethren in both parties do not understand our condition, or they have but little sympathy with us. I can not understand why anyone here would oppose this bill. It provides for the issuing of additional currency. It will not take out of circulation a single dollar now working in other sections of the country, but it will provide the money necessary to help the producers of cotton out of a very distressing condition. Will Members here withhold this measure of relief from us? If the banks can not or will not respond to our call, and if the Congress refuses to grant us relief, we will be forced to call upon the States to do the thing that will relieve us, and that is to pass a stay law suspending the payment of all debts for a stated period of time. We shall regret to have to do this, but we do not propose to permit the conditions created by a foreign war to rob the producers of cotton and impoverish the farmers of the South. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As a last resort we shall employ the powers of these cotton States to save our people from bankruptcy and ruin. We do not propose to sell this crop at the present price. Make up your minds to that. If necessary, I shall appeal to every State that produces cotton to join a movement for a stay law. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in addition to all that has been written and stated on the floor of this House about the condition of the southern cotton grower at this time I desire to quote from a letter written by a North Carolina journalist, in which he says:

"By October 2, 1913, the American mills had taken 598,668 bales and the exporters 1,238,848, which together, at $60 a bale, brought the planters $110,250,960, enabling them to pay the pickers and to settle their pressing obligations to the merchants and banks, and putting $100,000,000 into circulation, to the relief of the local banks.

"This year, to October 2, the takings were: By northern mills, 173,424 bales; southern mills, 147,613 bales; for export, 149,109 bales; making a total of 470,146 bales. At 8 cents, or $40 a bale, this brought the planters $18,805,840.

"More than 3,000,000 bales had been picked and ginned by that date, at an expense of $10 a bale. The cost to the planters was $30,000,000. It is apparent that the sales have not enabled the planters to pay the pickers. The picking has to some extent increased the debt of the planters, unless the buy-a-bale movement has supplied the deficit.

"Picking is now in progress at its maximum, costing more than $1,000,000 a day. It must be paid for or the cotton on the fields will be damaged—perhaps lost.

"The American mills are probably to continue their close buying, and the situation in Great Britain offers no hope of change. The consumption, as stated in the Liverpool market, for the week ended September 18 was only 29,651 bales, while the consumption from September 1 to September 18 in 1913 was 441,252 bales.

"The stock at Liverpool September 18 is given at 854,770 bales, rather more than a month's supply under normal conditions and nearly four months' supply at the present rate of consumption. We may not, therefore, expect any great demand for export at present. Evidently the banks and merchants in the South will have to make other advances to the planters for some time yet, instead of being now put in funds by the payment of existing debts. If it be said that the planters should not hold their cotton, but should sell it and pay their debts, in response the question may be asked, To whom are they to sell it?

"The mills will not buy; the exporters are not in the market; and a reduction of the price to 6 cents will avail nothing."

The pending amendment is offered in order to relieve this condition. It provides for $250,000,000 of notes bearing 2 per cent interest, or for the sale of $250,000,000 of Panama bonds, the money to be deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury in the State and National banks of the South upon the condition that it be loaned to the producers of cotton and tobacco at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent. While nearly every Member of this House realizes the condition in which the people of the South find themselves to-day, and a large number are willing to admit that it has become a national question demanding action by the Federal Government, some oppose this bill on the ground, first, that the issuance of notes would amount to a dangerous inflation of the currency; second, that Panama bonds could not be sold; third, that the Government has no right to deposit money in banks upon condition.

To-day the Government has in circulation $346,000,000 of notes. This amount of greenbacks, together with all the forms of currency that we now have redeemable under the Treasury's policy in gold, are based upon our present gold reserve, and it is difficult to understand why this issue would seriously injure or impair our financial system. These notes under the terms of the amendment would be redeemable on the 1st of January, 1916, in United States coin or its equivalent, and they can not become a charge or a burden upon the gold reserve before that date. The proposition is certainly in accord with the Democratic doctrine as expressed in the platform of the party time and again. In the Democratic platform of 1896 it is stated:

Congress alone has the power to coin and issue money, and President Jackson declared that this power could not be delegated to corporations or individuals. We therefore denounce the issuance of notes intended to circulate as money by national banks as in derogation of the Constitution, and we demand that all paper which is made a legal tender for public and private debts, or which is receivable for dues to the United States shall be issued by the Government of the United States and shall be redeemable in coin.

The objection that Panama bonds at this time could not find a market is not a valid one. I am unwilling to admit that the bonds issued by this Government will not prove attractive to investors. But even if this should be true, then this bill provides for the issuance of notes.

There is less ground for the objection that there is no precedent for the deposit of money by the Secretary of the Treasury in banks upon condition that it be used for specific purposes. Before the Money Trust committee Mr. Cortelyou, Secretary of the Treasury in the Roosevelt Cabinet, swore that in 1907, when a financial panic threatened the country and a most serious condition existed in the city of New York among the bankers and brokers, realizing the necessity for the exercise of extraordinary remedies, he deposited in the banks of New York City within four days the sum of $42,000,000. Referring to this deposit, I heard him testify as follows:

Mr. CORTELYOU. I do not recall just what amount was deposited. My stipulation was that the first $10,000,000 deposited after I arrived here should go to the trust companies.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CORTELYOU. I could only deal with national banks.
Mr. UNTERMYER. I know. It all went into the national banks?
Mr. CORTELYOU. Oh, yes.
Mr. UNTERMYER. That $36,000,000 added to the $6,000,000 that had been previously deposited by the Treasury on the 22d of October made a total of $42,000,000 that were deposited by you in certain national banks within four or five days?
Mr. CORTELYOU. I think so; yes, sir.
Mr. UNTERMYER. The money that was used to help out the Trust Co. of America, then, was part of the money that you had put here for that purpose—the purpose of helping out the trust companies?
Mr. CORTELYOU. I think so. (See p. 448, Money Trust investigation.)

On the day that these deposits were made call money was 120 per cent, and the Government exacted no interest from the banks in which the money was deposited. At that time there was upon the statute books the law, so frequently quoted by Mr. McAdoo, directing the Secretary of the Treasury in making deposits of public money to endeavor to distribute it is equally as possible between the sections. In making these deposits Mr. Cortelyou knew that he would subject himself to criticism on the ground that he was favoring the banks in which the deposits were made; he knew that it would be depositing in the banks of New York City more money than should be deposited there in proportion to that deposited elsewhere; but he also knew that it was the only way in which he could save the banks of that city in the crisis, and he made the deposits and stopped the panic. This was a deposit based upon the condition that it should be used for specific purposes. Again, on the 29th of September, 1914, the present Comptroller of the Currency, speaking in the city of Cincinnati, stated that within 60 days of the time at which he was speaking the Secretary of the Treasury had shipped $40,000,000 to the Subtreasury in New York to be deposited in the depositories of the Government in that city. He stated:

Responding promptly to urgent appeals, the Secretary of the Treasury went over to New York Sunday afternoon, August 2, and held a conference that night with a score or more of the presidents of the leading banks and trust companies of the metropolis. He heard their statements, analyzed the situation quickly, saw what was necessary to enable the banks to meet the demands upon them and to restore confidence, which had been so rocked by the world-shaking events of the week.

Again, Mr. Williams said:

Anticipating the situation as it was laid before him at that conference, he (the Secretary) had that Sunday morning before leaving Washington directed the shipment by express to the Subtreasury at New York of $40,000,000, and the Treasury forces and the express companies at that moment were taxing their resources in hurrying the execution of the order.

Since the amendment of August 4 to the Aldrich-Vreeland bill had not then been adopted, it can not be stated that the money referred to by the comptroller was an emergency issued under that act. Not long ago the Secretary of the Treasury deposited $400,000 in the National Park Bank of New York upon the condition that that amount and a deposit of a million dollars which it already had should be retained by that bank if it should handle the notes of the State of Tennessee. When the Ohio flood came, something like a year ago, and a run was made upon the banks of Dayton, the Secretary of the Treasury announced that he would deposit $2,000,000 of currency in the Dayton banks, and that he would accept commercial paper as the basis of this currency and not confine it to bonds—a stretch of the law—and upon that announcement he sent $180,000 to the Dayton banks, and this rendered it unnecessary to send the $2,000,000, since this action stopped the run on the banks and saved them from a crash.

I know that it is argued that the emergency currency issued under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act is sufficient to aid the South in the present crisis. I know it is also true that southern banks have not secured all the currency they are entitled to and could secure if they wished, but at the same time it must be realized that this emergency currency will not afford the relief necessary under the circumstances. When the Aldrich-Vreeland amendment was adopted I hoped that it would be all that was necessary, but at that time no man could anticipate the condition now existing in the South. It has proven entirely inadequate and ineffective. As a rule, the national banks of the South are located in the cities, and do not have a large clientele among the farmers. The banks patronized by the farmers in the rural districts are State banks, and the only way in which they can participate in the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency is through their national-bank correspondents.

The tax that is levied upon the Aldrich-Vreeland currency makes it necessary for the national banks of the city to charge their customer banks in the country at least 6 per cent for the money they borrow. It is estimated that the cost of handling money by a bank under these circumstances is from 1½ to 2 per cent, and consequently the State bank must add at least this amount to the 6 per cent which it pays to its city correspondent. It is readily seen that by the time this money reaches the farmer its rate of interest is almost prohibitive for the purpose of holding cotton. In addition to this the banks understand that this currency now issued may find its way into the hands of a bank having obligations to meet in New York, and when it is shipped to New York for that purpose it will soon find its way to the Treasury, and the Treasury must then call upon the bank for which the currency was issued to redeem it in legal money. For this reason local banks hesitate to make loans for any length of time based upon the receipt of this currency. The notes provided for in this bill would circulate until January 1, 1916, and would enable the bankers of the South to relieve the condition now existing there. I realize that this is asking to depart from ordinary methods in our fiscal affairs, but the situation demands extraordinary methods, and our Government has never hesitated to apply such methods when necessary. The distinguished leader of the minority, though opposed to this amendment, has expressed the belief that the situation presented was one demanding assistance from the National Government, and the same view is expressed by Senator BORAH, of Idaho, and many others. When we appropriated $500,000,000 for the war-risk insurance bureau it was a departure from ordinary measures, but one fully justified under the circumstances. When we appropriated $1,000,000 to assist stranded citizens of this country who were abroad when war was declared in returning to their homes, even though the money advanced to them was to be refunded to the Treasury, it was a departure from the ordinary to the extraordinary, but fully justified by the circumstances.

The appropriation of $30,000,000 dollars to build a railroad in Alaska to open up the great resources of that country was certainly a departure from ordinary methods. Likewise was it a departure to appropriate money to aid those who were left homeless and in want by the great fire at Salem, Mass., some months ago. I do not say that the people of the South are homeless or are in danger of starvation, neither do I ask for a gift to them from the United States Government, but in view of the fact that without any warning, or without any carelessness or bad management on their part, the market for the only crop grown in the South has been destroyed and the bankers and the merchants as well as the farmers of the South face bankruptcy, this Government should lend to them its credit until January, 1916. We ask for this loan of its credit, giving as security therefor warehouse receipts for cotton, a commodity recognized the world over as being as good as gold. This is not a wildcat scheme, nor is it a violation of any sound economic principle. It is a safe, sane way of giving relief to 30,000,000 people whose failure will affect thousands of people in the North, East, and West.

It is estimated that the foreign mills will require during the coming year about 4,000,000 bales of cotton. If this cotton be sold for one-half its normal price, our country will lose $150,000,000 in gold. Sir George Paish, a representative of the English Government and special advisor to the English chancellor of the exchequer, now in this country for the purpose of endeavoring to arrange for the collection of our indebtedness to English interests, suggests that the American debits in England are some $200,000,000 to $250,000,000. As he has stated in the press, this is due to the fact that we have been exporting little cotton, which commodity has always served to maintain the balance of trade in our favor.

The assurance at this time that the cotton crop will be financed by the Government will result in immediate purchases by mills here and abroad, and with the increased value of our exports we will be enabled to discharge our indebtedness to England without making further drafts upon the gold of this Nation. This is the international aspect of the situation. By all men it is conceded that the continuance of the present conditions will affect the business interests of the entire Nation. The merchants of New England will be injured by the loss of business of a section constituting one-fourth of the Union. It is estimated that to-day the Southern States owe to the Eastern, Middle, and some of the Western States between three and four hundred million dollars growing out of the production of this cotton crop. Shall this debt be discharged? If by this bill the credit of the Nation is loaned to us for 13 months normal conditions will be restored and this debt paid in full, but if this assistance is not granted us I am unable to see how this obligation can be met. The small farmer of the South borrows money with which he makes his crop, and in order to make this crop he has given a mortgage upon all he possesses. In many cases he has borrowed from the merchants, and he will now find that his cotton can not settle his debt and that he must give up his cattle, hogs, and his agricultural implements. If he can not pay his merchant, certainly that merchant can not pay for his goods purchased from the North. The question is whether we shall, under the plan set forth in this bill, which will not cost the Government a cent, save these people and enable the South to discharge its obligations to other sections of the country.

We are daily reminded that out of the present situation much good will come to the South; that just as the Postmaster General has arranged to use only cotton strings in the Postal Department, which will consume about 4,800 bales, and cotton bags are to be substituted for burlap, the domestic consumption of cotton goods will be materially increased. This is encouraging to the people of the South, but it affords little comfort to them at this time, when they see no way out of their present difficulties.

It is urged that it is not the function of the Government to render to us the assistance we ask. We have long since departed from the strict exercise of governmental functions. It can not be contended that it is a function of the Government to engage in the running of steamship lines, and yet that is practically what is now urged upon us by the administration in the pending bill. We have expended much money in farm demonstration work, teaching the farmers how to produce more cotton per acre, and we have expended much money, very properly, to prevent the destruction of the crops by the boll weevil and other insects, and yet it is contended that it is no function of the Government to aid them in marketing the crop at this time, and that such assistance would set a dangerous precedent for the future.

There can be no doubt that little cotton will be produced next year. It is possible that the States, by legislative enactment, will require reduction of acreage; but even if this is not done, surely it must be realized that the farmer who is holding cotton will not be foolish enough to plant more when he is unable to sell that which he has on hand. Again, even if he wished to, he will be unable to secure the money with which to make a crop. Before another crop is produced the price of this crop will have materially increased, and I want the man who, with his family, has toiled to produce this crop to get the benefit of that price. He has had nothing to do with bringing about this condition of affairs, he could not have anticipated it, and this Government should not permit him to be forced to turn his cotton over to speculators who seek to purchase it at 4 or 5 cents per pound so they, with their superior sources of credit, can hold it for the higher price that is bound to come. If this is not a governmental function, then our Government fails to answer the purpose which every American citizen believes it was intended to serve.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAINEY). The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is recognized.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted me it will be impossible to make an argument in support of the bill, as I would like to do, or to discuss the situation confronting the South. I tried yesterday and to-day to get sufficient time to discuss in detail the cotton situation, but was unable to do so. The great crisis that confronts our people was caused by the European war, and is not a sectional one, but is national in scope—yea, international, for the people of the entire world are interested in the production of cotton; for while other sections feed the world, we largely clothe it. If we can not get a fair price for our product, we can not purchase from other sections; therefore the business of the entire country is involved. Two-thirds of the cotton raised in the United States is exported to Europe, and it alone keeps the balance of trade in favor of the United States. It more than any American product protects the gold preserved in your Treasury, and to-day New York bankers are concerned as to how they shall protect obligations due in England and prevent a drain being made on our gold reserve. Under normal conditions when cotton is being exported it settles all balances in trade and furnishes a medium of international exchange. Sir George Paish, a representative of the English Government, is to-day in Washington conferring with our Treasury officials and members of the Reserve Board to provide some measure of settling balances between this country and England. He frankly stated that if cotton was moving it would take care of the difference and make the trade balance in our favor; so you can readily see how important it is for the whole Nation to try to help the South out of its financial distress and provide a market for cotton.

Sir George Paish frankly stated that England was financially able to buy cotton and its factories were ready to run on full time, but they were not in the market, as they were waiting to see if cotton would go lower. Mr. Speaker, it is human nature to desire to purchase the product of another at the lowest price possible. It is to the interest of the English people to buy raw cotton as cheap as possible, but in my judgment it is the duty of a great Government like ours to protect its citizens. We ask you to furnish us financial aid to enable us to hold our cotton off the market until conditions become normal, so the producers can get the value of it.

We export about 10,000,000 bales of cotton to Europe. For the last 10 years the average price of cotton has been about 12 cents a pound, or $60 per bale. Under normal conditions our 10,000,000 bales of cotton exported would be worth $600,000,000, but if our people are forced to sell it at the prevailing price of 6 cents it will only bring $300,000,000, so it is plain that the three hundred millions of the wealth of the world that rightly belongs to southern people will be donated to the countries of Europe. Does not selfish instinct alone, if nothing else, dictate that this Government should take steps to protect its people and preserve for its citizens this three hundred millions instead of giving it to foreigners?

Mr. Speaker, our Government in times past has aided other sections of the country, and we demand the same consideration. The Government has placed millions of dollars of the people's money in the banks of New York to protect stock speculators. It has appropriated money for the sufferers from the Salem (Mass.) fire; it has appropriated money to relieve the distress in San Francisco caused by the earthquake; it has deposited money in the banks of Dayton, Ohio, to aid the flood sufferers; it has spent millions to irrigate the lands of the western farmers; and it has spent several millions this year to be sent abroad and loaned direct to globe-troting Americans. We appropriated thirty millions to build railroads in Alaska, and this administration favors selling Panama bonds to buy ships. Hence, Mr. Speaker, simple justice demands that my section be aided in this time of its distress. Mr. Speaker, some Members say they can not support our bill because it will establish a precedent. That, Mr. Speaker, is simply a subterfuge, for the instances above cited furnish abundant precedents for the legislation we are asking.

We are not asking a gratuity; we simply ask the Government to loan us its credit by placing Government funds in our banks to be loaned on cotton so as to enable us to hold our crops until the market for it is restored and the fearful European war is over and world conditions become normal. This is no new precedent; the Government has done this before, and not long ago the Government made a deposit of $1,400,000 in the Park National Bank, of New York, on condition it would loan it to the State of Tennessee.

Mr. Speaker, we are following precedents, and the bill which we have before the House simply asks that Government funds be placed in the banks of the South, both State and National, on condition that they loan the funds to the producer of cotton. I believe our bill is sound, but if not we are not specially wedded to it; we ask relief; this House has among its Members statesmen of ability; if the desire to aid is in the hearts of a majority of the Representatives, we can perfect the bill, if it needs amending. This is not a political question. The able leader of the minority, Mr. MANN, recognizes it is the duty of the Government in this crisis to aid the South, and I specially ask his colleagues and associates to come to our rescue. I have an abiding faith in the American people and their representatives. Gentlemen, I say to you that my beloved section has an impending storm hovering over it too great for the Southern States to weather. Therefore I appeal to you, the representatives of our great, rich, and powerful Nation to come to our rescue. You can save us if you will. Some gentlemen say it will be paternalistic for the Government to aid in this crisis. Mr. Speaker, I believe when a situation confronts 20,000,000 of our patriotic and industrious people, and they are unable to handle it, it is the duty of "a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people" to come to their relief. I appeal to you, my colleagues, to not let us appeal to you in vain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request as to my remarks on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to these requests?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen of the House have leave to print for five calendar days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House have leave to print for five calendar days.

Mr. HENRY. On this bill?

Mr. MANN. No; on anything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I object.

Mr. HENRY. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. KEATING. I do not object to the extension of remarks on this bill, but I will object to any general extension of remarks.

Mr. HENRY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will modify his request.

Mr. MANN. No; I will not, because ever since I have been a Member of the House this sort of leave has been granted. I do not care whether it is granted now or not; but the gentlemen specially interested in this bill are all from one section of the country, and if their colleagues refuse to let the rest of us have a chance to extend, why, it is unfair that they should ask for that privilege.

Mr. HENRY. I hope the gentleman from Colorado will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KEATING. I can not withdraw it. I have no objection to the extension of remarks on this bill, or to the granting of leave to extend specifically, but I am opposed to a blanket extension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise merely for the purpose of saying that many of our friends who know nothing of conditions in the South believe that we are excited and that the condition existing there is not as bad as we who live there know it is. The San Francisco fire never brought such destruction to the people of that stricken city as the war in Europe has brought upon my constituency and the constituencies of other Members from the South.

Mr. Speaker, when the city of Salem was swept by fire and its historic homes destroyed, the first name that was called on the roll call to aid those people was that of ABERCROMBIE, from Alabama, the first State on the roll of States, and he voted yea. Further down the roll, when my name was called, I cast my vote to aid those stricken people. When the rivers of Ohio submerged the lands in that State and the farmers of that magnificent Commonwealth asked for aid, we came to their relief. When San Francisco was laid low by the fire fiend, Congressmen from the South rallied to her rescue. The warm heart of the South has always responded when the distress sign has been given in any part of the Union, and I appeal to you, my countrymen, from the West and the North and the Middle West. I appeal to you as my countrymen to aid us in this our time of dire distress. Your people are our people, your country is our country, your flag is our flag, and your God is our God. We appeal to you in this our day of dire extremity. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House involves finance in a world-wide sense. The only power in this country great enough to avert the disaster which threatens the prosperity of 10 great States of the Union is the Federal Government. The cotton crop, which under normal conditions would have a value of over a billion dollars in gold, has suddenly dropped in price to a bankruptcy level. Yet when the great majority of Senators and Representatives of the cotton-growing States come to the National Government—the only agency competent to deal with such a crisis—we are met with hostility in some places, with apathy in others. We ask not that the Government suffer any loss in our behalf, or even run any risks. The Federal Government is asked not for charity, but for cooperation in loaning its credit to tide the South over the greatest crisis it has faced in 40 years. Instead of cooperation we are met with criticism. We ask for aid and are given arguments. Senators and Members from other sections—not all,

I am glad to say—accuse us of paternalism. They say that if the Government goes to the aid of cotton it must valorize all other industries adversely affected by the war. Such a statement assuredly reflects a narrow outlook, not only on the great emergency confronting us, but on our duties as Members of the United States Congress. We are here to represent our individual districts, it is true; but we are here primarily to legislate for the good of the United States of America. When a calamity threatens the whole country, it must be averted without regard to what particular section will most benefit by our action. It is an axiomatic truth, unnecessary for me to restate, that the country can not be prosperous unless the South is. When you legislate to save the money crop of the South you legislate in the interest of the North and East and West as well.

Cotton is a world commodity. Anything that affects it affects not only the whole of this country, but countries in Europe and Asia and Africa. It is for this reason that what is happening 4,000 miles away affects cotton so profoundly. Cotton has its ramifications in every civilized quarter of the globe. The industry can no more be characterized as local than can the effects resulting from its prosperity or adversity be localized. If the South has to sell cotton at less than the cost of production, then she will have no money available to buy the manufactures of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and the Middle West. In the end the rest of the country must share the hard times the South faces in the more immediate future. Newspapers all over the country—I would mention the Washington Post in particular—are calling upon Congress in patriotic editorials to come to the relief of the South, and thereby to the relief of the country.

It is cotton that insures the balance of trade in our favor. An eminent British financial expert recently estimated that the current indebtedness of the United States to Europe was between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000. He further states that—your cotton exports at this season would in normal times be the chief factor of payment of the large balance against you.

Cotton being practically unsalable, this indebtedness must be paid by an export of gold at a time when we can ill afford it. Ordinarily out of the present cotton crop it might be expected that exports would bring to this country over $600,000,000. The exports of cotton usually amount to 60 per cent of the crop; in other words, but for circumstances no man could foresee, 9,000,000 of the 16,000,000 bales raised this year would have found a ready market abroad. The world must have cotton, and the quantity in the grade it desires can be grown only in the Southern States of this country. It would be a greater calamity to the world at large than to the South were the cotton growers forced to stop the production of cotton.

Cotton can not be produced at less than 9½ cents a pound. Much of it is grown by small farmers and negroes, who have mortgaged their future to grow the present crop. They have done so this year in the same manner as they are obliged to do each year. If they receive less than what they have expended, plus a profit that will enable to them to live until next spring, they must of necessity forego planting another crop. They can not plant without credit, and that the banks will refuse to give. The smaller banks themselves are affected, the country storekeeper is involved, even the cotton manufacturers will not profit in the long run from 4 or 5 cent cotton. At present the manufacturers are afraid to buy, because they do not know at what cheaper price their competitors may shortly be able to get cotton. The fact that the manufacturer can get his raw material at one-third the usual price will only decrease his ultimate profits. By so much as the price of raw cotton has decreased, by so much has the buying capacity of the cotton growers of the 1914 crop shrunk for buying the manufactured products. Ordinarily the manufacturing industry of this country would absorb nearly 6,000,000 bales, or about 40 per cent of this year's crop. It has been estimated that American mills will increase their purchases of cotton, due to the increased demand which will be made for their finished products. Japan is also expected to lay in a supply of cotton sufficient for two years. It has been estimated that about 4,000,000 bales of the present crop will be exported, instead of 9,000,000 which would have found a market outside of this country. This leaves a surplus of over 5,000,000 bales, which, if left upon the market, will depress the price to a level that spells financial ruin.

The individual States are incapable of handling so vast a problem, and for this reason whatever action is taken must be uniform throughout all the cotton States to be effective. Action taken by one State, however drastic, would be nullified, unless the other States follow a similar plan. The problem is one that the National Government must solve. It has the power, and the States of the South have the right to ask for the exercise of that power. As regards the constitutional powers of Congress, I am not solicitous. After money has been collected and reached the United States Treasury it may be disposed of by Congress in any manner deemed of public benefit to the country. There is no precedent for this emergency, because the Government was never before confronted with a calamity of this particular nature. It has met other problems and solved them, and it will solve still other problems in the future as they are presented, and it has the ability to do so. What the cotton growers of the South are asking will not put so great a strain upon the constitutional powers of the Federal Government as has been done in times past. It is estimated that in the past Congress has made benefactions, pure and simple, amounting to over $150,000,000.

When a terrible earthquake visited San Francisco, Congress was prompt to appropriate $5,000,000 to relieve the inhabitants of that distressed city. When Salem, Mass., was almost wiped out by fire Congress quickly responded with an emergency appropriation to meet that need. The reason was that the spectacle of so much distress concentrated in one place aroused the sympathy not only of Congress but of the country. The country approved our action in relieving suffering in San Francisco and Salem, and I personally was glad to see it done. Yet when a hailstorm, the most destructive that ever visited South Carolina, completely wiped out all growing crops in an area 30 miles long by 4 to 6 miles wide in my district on July 6 last I was unable to get one cent from Congress to alleviate the suffering and want, which is being felt at this very moment by small farmers who lost their entire year's crop. Why was I unable to get an appropriation when a similar one had just been made for Salem? It was because the suffering was not of sufficient magnitude to impress itself upon Congress and the country generally. Both Congress and the American people are quick to relieve distress when they are convinced that it exists. Probably no other nation in the world is equal in generosity to the United States. For that reason I feel certain that if Congress could be convinced of the actual want which, if it does not exist now in the cotton belt, will in a few weeks make itself felt, Congress would go to the South's relief. It is possible by passing emergency legislation now to forestall the suffering which must otherwise come.

What the South asks is not charity. She asks merely to be treated as a constituent part of this country, having a right to all the protection the credit and unlimited resources of this Government can give her. She asks no more than has already been done for New York City. Since 1890, during financial stress and panics, hundreds of millions of Government money have been accorded to the banks of that city, $50,000,000 having been recently transferred from the Treasury to a syndicate of New York bankers in order to help the city of New York meet its maturing obligations abroad. In speaking of this transaction the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. John Skelton Williams, was quoted as saying:

A few weeks later—

After the outbreak of the war—

leading bankers from New York came to Washington to ask if the Government would lend its support in enabling New York City to raise, through a syndicate of bankers, the funds necessary to provide for the city's loans of $82,000,000 just maturing abroad. They were assured by the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government would cooperate by providing the banks with a further amount of currency, and would accept a fair proportion of New York City's new notes or bonds as the basis for such currency, in order to help the bankers carry out the plan for the funding of the city's floating indebtedness; and since that time the Treasury Department has actually furnished to the New York banks $50,000,000 of additional currency, making the total amount accorded to the banks of that city from the Treasury since August 1 more than $140,000,000.

The Government was willing to lend money to New York City upon its new notes or bonds in order not to avert a panic but merely to pay its ordinary debts. Yet when States having nearly one-third the country's population ask for a like accommodation upon security of cotton, which is the security for debts generally accepted by banks everywhere, the proposition is characterized as "wild." The Government refuses legislation that will permit or enable banks to lend money on good security, which would put the people of the South on an independent basis; whereas were the cotton crop entirely destroyed by some great calamity Congress would not hesitate to give away millions to alleviate the resulting distress.

The plan proposed, to lend $250,000,000 to retire temporarily 5,000,000 bales from the market, will cost the Government nothing. Furthermore, it will put the money directly in the hands of the small cotton grower, who is in such dire need of immediate funds. Unless the money is segregated and devoted to the relief of cotton alone, no good can be accomplished. I would direct attention to the way in which a similar cotton crisis in Egypt is being met. The United States consul at Cairo reported to the State Department that Egyptian banks which ordinarily import $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 in gold, being unable to obtain money to move the cotton crop, have made notes of the National Bank of Egypt legal tender of an equal value with gold. The national bank will also advance money to cotton growers on all cotton offered, and the cotton is to be stored as security. Plans are also on foot for reducing the area sown in cotton next year by about 60 per cent.

In answer to what has been claimed for the Aldrich-Vreeland Currency Act, it is true that currency may be issued by national banks under the terms of this law. But why is it not issued? Under the law if the currency when issued finds its way into the Treasury of the United States the bank issuing this currency is at once called on to redeem it in legal money. It is an easy matter for the enemies of currency so issued to secure large amounts of it and send it to the Treasury of the United States, well knowing that the bank issuing the notes will be called upon to redeem them.

The proposal of a $150,000,000 pool of capitalists to buy up 3,000,000 bales of cotton at current prices will not aid the small farmers. Current prices—now around 6 cents—are far below the cost of production, consequently the buying of cotton on such terms presents possibilities of benefit only to the capitalists composing the pool. The small farmer, being unable to borrow money, must sell no matter how low the current price may be, hence a pool such as the one above mentioned will prey upon his very necessities. Capital, particularly at a time of such financial stringency, is going into no pool through motives of altruism or for the welfare of the farmer. It is not to be expected that it should. "Financier" and "philanthropist" are not synonymous terms, at least not when it comes to participating in a business transaction. No pool of this character is going to help the South, and it is worse than cruelty to mislead the people with false hopes.

Let no man delude himself. The great financial institutions of this country are loaded with stocks and bonds on which they have made loans, in many instances at a higher rate of value than is the present market price of the stocks and bonds held as security for the payment of these loans. At the time the loans were made the market value of the security was ample. The European war came on; market values of stocks and bonds fell in price until now, in many instances, the great financial institutions of the country hold securities worth less than the debts for which they are pledged to secure payment. The stock and bond exchanges throughout this country, Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, and Russia closed down immediately on the declaration of war by Germany against Russia. If the price of cotton in the South remains at anything like the present level or falls a great deal lower, as it will do unless the powers of the Government are exercised, it can be stated with reasonable certainty that a financial crash will come in the South which will be felt throughout the country. While the South will be the first to suffer, it will not be the last and greatest sufferer, measured in dollars and cents. I firmly believe, Mr. Speaker, that legislation of the character embodied in the pending amendment—which amendment, by the way, contains practically nothing not contained in the bill H. R. 19004, introduced by me at the instance of the South Carolina delegation in Congress—is absolutely necessary.

The only material help to be had is from Congress. Unless the House agrees to take some action that will give real relief and bring the price of cotton to at least a cost-producing level, the South must face a recurrence of the hard times which I had hoped were forever banished from the land. Furthermore, it had best be realized now that if this specter stalks abroad in the South its devastations will spread until the effects are felt in every part of this great country. Not as a partisan but as an American I ask that Congress avert the national calamity which the breaking down of the cotton market threatens.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that a discussion of any bill for the relief of the cotton producers of the South would have been precipitated before the rush of the closing hours of this session, in order that we who represent this great section of our country might have had an opportunity to present the case of the cotton producers as it really exists.

The whole trouble in the South is attributable to one cause—lack of agricultural banking and warehouse facilities throughout the country. We are the only civilized nation on the earth that has attempted to mix commercial and agricultural banking. In our attempt to do this almost impossible thing one of the two pursuits must suffer at the hands of the other, and it occurs to me, as it does to all who are engaged in agricultural pursuits, that the farmer has been made the burden bearer of the commercial end of banking.

Commercial banks must necessarily keep their assets liquid by making short-time loans, so that at any moment they can meet the demand of their depositors and safeguard themselves against any business exigency that may arise. On the other hand, the farmer in the South can not utilize short-time loans to any advantage.

The paramount question to be solved by this country is the speedy establishment of rural credit banks providing for short and long time loans to our farmers. Mr. Speaker, for the last four years I have given much thought and study to the question of rural credits, and the product of this investigation culminated in the introduction of H. R. 12746, which I introduced on January 31, 1914. Day in and day out I have discussed the importance of rural credits with Members representing agricultural districts.

When the regional bank act was in the Democratic caucus I was then, as were other Members representing agricultural districts, insistent upon a companion bill being reported establishing along by the side of the regional-reserve system a rural credits system. At that time it was thought inadvisable to attempt so large a task. The situation in the South to-day demonstrates the wisdom and foresight of those of us who sought to relieve the agricultural interests of the country at that time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some Members from our beloved section, in their enthusiasm to bring about relief, have attempted to touch the sympathetic side of the membership of this House on account of our deplorable condition. In June of this year the farmers of the South and their little children were busily engaged in the broiling sun in the cotton fields, happy in their expectation that ere the chilling frosts would fall the usual flow of the "golden harvest" would fill the horn of plenty in our land; but without a day's warning, without an hour for preparation, the great civilized nations of Europe were thrown into a cataclysm unprecedented in the history of the world. To-day their soil is saturated with the blood of the best manhood of Europe, and those nations which have remained neutral stand dumfounded as they view the horrors of modern warfare.

The result of the European war has visited its greatest infliction upon the South, in that we have produced a normal crop of cotton to meet the demands of normal conditions, and to-day we have between 5,000,000 and 7,000,000 bales of cotton that can not be utilized, and that is in active competition with the actual amount of cotton that can be consumed by neutral European countries and by our own country.

In consequence of this fact, no spot market for cotton has been established, and before a spot market can be established fixing a price equal to the cost of production this surplus of cotton must be set aside for a definite period of not less than 12 months. The moment that this surplus is financed and set aside, the spinners of all nations who are in need of cotton will immediately seek their supply from that which is upon the market.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see what we have asked at the hands of the Government. Precedents are too numerous to burden the House in detail with the occasions upon which this Government has come to the rescue of those who were visited with flood, with famine and disaster; and, by way of parentheses, I may add that whenever any great section of this country was visited with misfortune, no section's Representatives responded more cordially in their aid than those from the glorious Southland.

This bill as amended, and upon which we will shortly be called to record our vote, is identical in principle with the bill I had the honor of introducing, known as House bill 19199, and which many Members from the South contended for in the caucus of southern Members as the bill which would give immediate relief to the southern cotton farmer and at the same time the Government would be safeguarded with all the requirements of security.

The reason the farmer of the South can not finance his surplus cotton has already been stated. The banks of the South, and especially the country banks, are heavily involved in loans already advanced to the farmers of the South to make this year's crop, and to further advance money to the cotton farmer with no hope of replenishing upon their assets that which they may advance would jeopardize their institutions, unless there was a market for cotton. The beneficent effect of this bill is this: It provides a fund of $250,000,000, which the State and national banks can apply for, which is a separate and distinct fund, to be loaned only to the producers of cotton under the same regulations and upon the same sort of security that is now provided under the Federal reserve act and under the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency currency act, except this fixes a rate of interest at a nominal cost to the farmer. In other words, to use a commonplace expression, the Government simply creates a "brazen" fund to take the place of the timid money now being held by the great banking institutions of the country.

Under the provisions of this bill there is absolutely no danger of inflation. There is absolutely no danger of any loss to the Government, and it gives to each and every farmer of the South an opportunity to warehouse his cotton, insure it in a reputable insurance company, put his warehouse receipt, accompanied by his policy of insurance upon the cotton, and secure a portion of the cost of production of that bale of cotton to tide him over to a day when the world may be at peace and prosperity again prevail throughout the land.

Mr. Speaker, I regret to see our friends on the other side of the aisle who represent the great manufacturing districts of the North opposing this bill of relief. And let me say in conclusion one word of warning to those who have been so unkind as to say that this was rank paternalism; that this was radical class legislation; that it was for the relief of the cotton-growing and tobacco-growing States only. Any such statements as these must emanate from the mind of him who has only superficially diagnosed the commercial situation throughout this country. Ah, Mr. Speaker, if this bill fails of passage, within 90 days from the day these words are heard upon this floor every fiber of the commercial fabric of this land will feel the distress and share it equally with the farmers of the South, their wives, and innocent little children. When the great farm-implement concerns in the South begin to cancel their orders in the East and Middle West, when the flow of gold that annually goes to the great East in payment of debts which amount to over $600,000,000 for money advanced to southern banks to make this crop are unpaid, then will you discover that the production of cotton is the real backbone of commercial life in the United States, and that cotton affects every man, woman, and child, from one end of this Republic to the other.

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped, after hearing the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] the other day, that the American spinners would rise to that height of American patriotism and go into the market for their usual supply of raw cotton. I had dreamed that the spindles of every cotton mill in this country would be whirling 24 hours a day in an effort to reach out to supply the foreign trade with our manufactured product afforded by the suspension of manufacturing operations abroad.

I had hoped that American mills would not seek to take advantage of a tariff wall higher than any ever built by Congress on account of the European catastrophe, but I fear from the attitude of these mills for the last 60 days that these hopes are but idle dreams. Surely they do not hope for a further depression in the price of cotton in the hands of the producer and that they will acquire their raw material at still lower prices than are being paid for the small amount of cotton that is now being purchased. And, Mr. Speaker, before I utter the sentence of admonition to those who are engaged in the production of cotton in my beloved State I hope that those who hear this statement will not believe that I utter it in a spirit of vindictiveness, but I consider it wholesome and necessary advice to give to those of my constituents who now stare squarely in the face financial ruin.

Farmers of the South: If the great Government which you have so valiantly supported and in whose behalf you have toiled to maintain the balance of trade between this country and foreign nations refuses to come to your relief in this, the darkest hour of your life since the Civil War, hold your cotton, establish by your own act a gradual market for your product, and if there shall be suffering, if there shall be destitution in this land, prepare yourselves to distribute this destitution equally among those who have profited by your prosperity and say unto yourselves, "The Southland shall not bear this burden alone and in silence." If the representatives of this great Nation can not solve this question for you, you hold the reins in your hands, and as your friend I advise you to guide your destiny in such manner as to avert financial ruin.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, something has been said here as to why it was that the southern bankers could not obtain a sufficient amount of currency under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act as amended at this session of Congress.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in many places in the South, where a large part of the market for cotton is daily had, we have only State banks. These State banks can not obtain any currency under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act. There are State banks in my section which have signified their intention to join the regional system, but they can not get emergency currency under existing law.

I had hoped that during the period of this great distress Congress would have suspended for a reasonable period the 10 per cent tax on State-bank circulation, with such safeguards as would have given our people at least some local relief. I am not unmindful of the fact, however, that the Government has given valuable aid, and I regret the criticism that has come from some quarters, especially of those of us who represent cotton constituencies.

In the midst of the distress of the South at this time it is useless to state that representatives in Congress generally, and those from the South in particular, are more than anxious to do everything in their power for the relief of this stricken section. Even if our hearts had grown callous, our selfishness would prompt us to exert every effort in its behalf. I have no patience with the criticism, therefore, that any one of us is unwilling to go to the limit in bringing forth some substantial remedy. I further assert that we are all willing to sink our pride of opinion in behalf of the general good. It is folly to say that a Member of Congress who represents a cotton constituency will turn a deaf ear to the plea of the very people upon whose votes he expects to remain here. Our future—social, political, and in every other respect—is absolutely interwoven with the good will, not to mention the happiness and prosperity, of these people. Hence, it is passing strange to me that anyone should make bold to find fault with any of us or even to suggest that we are indifferent to the situation. Naturally, we differ as to the best remedy. It is not to be forgotten, however, that since the crisis came measures of relief have been adopted by Congress and the executive branch of the Government. As soon as possible after this situation arose Congress amended the Vreeland-Aldrich Act so as to authorize a large increase of the circulating medium. In the administration of this act the Secretary of the Treasury announced that he would accept from national currency associations notes based upon cotton warehouse receipts, naval stores, and tobacco up to 75 per cent of the face value of the notes. Under this amended law the banks were authorized to obtain currency to the extent of 125 per cent of their capital and surplus.

In order to facilitate the movement of crops to foreign countries an act was passed admitting foreign-built ships engaged in the foreign trade to American registry; and this was followed by an act creating a war-risk insurance bureau. By means of the latter the Government undertook to indemnify cargoes of ocean freight from the risk of seizure by any of the powers engaged in war. It is apparent therefore that Congress and the Executive have, at least, taken important and far-reaching steps to relieve the situation so that the crops of the country may be handled, held, or exported, as the case may be.

It must be admitted that the outbreak of the war in Europe suddenly cut off more than half of the market in which cotton had been sold, and it can not be denied that no act of Congress can entirely reestablish this foreign market. It is universal history that any foreign war depresses the price of cotton and increases the value of foodstuffs. A people engaged in war must have food each day, but they postpone the purchase of clothing as long as possible. This condition can not, however, last always. The time will come when raiment must be had. How long that time will be no one can now foretell. What, then, is the present urgent need? The only answer is to hold as much of the cotton as is possible until normal conditions return. In order to do this the people must have cheap money, and by that I do not mean a debased currency, but a sufficient circulating medium to enable the holders of cotton or similar commodities to prevent the sacrifice of such products. Many are the suggestions by which this is proposed to be done. Let us see, however, what has already been done and what is proposed. In the State of Alabama alone the Government has regular deposits of $355,000, while crop funds to the extent of $917,500 have been placed with the banks, making a total of $1,272,500 of public funds in that State. Additional currency has been issued to the banks in that State to the extent of $4,196,690. Alabama, therefore, has already received in circulating medium through the operation of the Government $5,469,190, practically five and a half million dollars.

Of the $74,000,000 of Government funds on deposit in the banks of the country the South has $27,402,500, or more than one-third. Since the 1st of August there have been issued to the national banks in Southern States $68,000,000, and these banks may now, under the law, receive $151,000,000, in round numbers, of additional currency. The banks of the Southern States have received since this trouble began $68,000,000 in additional national bank notes, $11,337,000 in crop funds, and $16,065,000 in regular deposits, making a total of over $95,000,000. They can still obtain under the present law $150,000,000 more.

There is no possible chance to pass a law requiring the purchase and holding of cotton by the Government. Omitting any reference to the constitutionality or practicability of the proposition, the membership of Congress representing other interests could never be induced to vote for such a proposition. It is true that the Government has here and there expended money to relieve distressed conditions. These instances are rare and were, if not wrong, certainly of minor importance compared to the magnitude of handling the great staple product of the South.

The proposition now submitted as a compromise measure upon the cotton situation, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $250,000,000 of notes redeemable in gold, or to sell Panama bonds and use this money to tide over the stringency now existing in the South, seems to be a sound economic proposition. Certainly no objection can be made to it on the ground of inflation, since the Secretary of the Treasury has the discretion not to issue these notes if, in his opinion, the currency will be so inflated as to impair the equal value of our circulating medium, and to use the proceeds of the Panama bonds instead.

Afflictions sometimes come as blessings in disguise. Let us hope that our people will be enabled to hold a large part of the present cotton crop until normal market conditions return, that the acreage in cotton will be reduced to a large extent by the voluntary action of the people themselves, and that there will be a still greater increase in crop diversification throughout our southern section.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the patriotic action of a large wholesale house in my home city of Montgomery, Ala. The Hobbie Grocery Co. proposes that, if the farmers in a radius of 50 miles of that city will plant 5,000 acres in wheat, they will pay 7 cents more than the St. Louis price for the same and erect a flour mill with a capacity of 100,000 barrels a year. The soil and climate of the South is adapted to such a variety of products that no one need despair, even in the midst of these distressing times, and I venture the prediction that within a year the prosperity of the South will return and be greater than ever dreamed of before.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the condition of the South is growing more serious every day, and if something is not done to stem the tide, ere long it will not pay even to pick the cotton. A great many tenants are to-day leaving their fields white with cotton and engaging in labor whereby they may earn a sufficiency for the sustenance of life.

Mr. Speaker, all must concede that the lack of market for cotton is only a temporary thing. So soon as this war will end every bale of cotton will be in demand, and it will bring a normal price. Cotton is a great international crop. It keeps in reserve the very gold of this country.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HUGHES of Georgia was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I come from a cotton State. The district I have the honor to represent is a cotton district. I want to tell you that the people of that country are energetic people, who work all day and part of the night, and they are industrious, but because of this low price of cotton, occasioned, as we all know, by the great war in Europe, they are now in distress. While a good house is on fire, let us not stand around here and say that we have the water but we do not know whether we ought to use it or not. You have the ability under the Treasury system of the country now to place this money according to this amendment in the banks of the South, and how can any man who wants to come to the relief of the distressed people talk about expediency when we know we are all able to do it?

I will not take any part of the short time allotted to me to reiterate what other gentlemen from the Southern States have told you. Every Member of this Congress knows all about the calamity in the South occasioned by the loss of cotton markets on account of the world-wide war in Europe.

There is no market for cotton at present and will not be until the cotton is out of the hands of the farmers, unless we pass this amendment or the original Senate bill.

I am going to stand up here for my people this evening, like I have stood for them on all occasions when their interests were at stake. Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen tell us they are sorry for the people who have raised the cotton, but they can not vote for any of these measures to give relief to these men who are now unable to realize more than one-half the value of their cotton.

The trouble is, they do not know how to sympathize for a poor farmer. These same Congressmen who now say on this floor that it is unconstitutional to pass a bill for the Government to purchase one-third of the entire cotton crop at 10 cents a pound and hold it off the market, or that it would destroy the value of the Government's dollar if we issue $250,000,000 in currency under the greenback act and loan to the producers of cotton at a conservative estimate of the cost of production, with the cotton itself as security, have voted for all kinds of gifts, loans, and schemes on other occasions. I can not have any respect for their reasons for opposing the sound and legitimate legislation proposed here now to give relief to nearly 30,000,000 people throughout the Southland. These same Congressmen voted to lend millions of dollars of Government money, if you please, direct to the irrigation of farms in the arid West. I do not complain of them; I would vote that way myself; I think the Government ought to help the wealth producers in every section of this Republic.

Mr. Speaker, what I am complaining about is that these selfsame statesmen say that we are asking too much of the Government, that there is no precedent for such legislation as the South calls for now.

No man who is familiar with the bills passed even by this present Congress and approved by the President could seriously contend that we are without precedent. You gentlemen who are opposing this bill never balked at the big pension bills that were going through this Congress, but you were extremely active in trying to increase them all the time. These cotton farmers help to pay all of these pensions, and still you can not vote for a bill to let two and one-half hundred million dollars be placed in the southern banks to loan them on their cotton.

When the bill, with Executive sanction, was before this House to place $2,000,000 of gold money in Europe to lend without any security to American citizens in Europe in order that they could return to the United States, shortly after hostilities opened between Germany and France, were any of these Congressmen opposing it on the ground of no precedent? Who of you could vote for that emergency bill to relieve distressed "globe-trotters" in Europe that can not now vote for this sound legislation to protect the only crop that keeps up our balance of trade with Europe and at the same time save the cotton farmers from impending bankruptcy? The South is really the only part of this Union that can produce cotton, and this industry ought to be conserved by the Government.

All of the cotton farmers are citizens of this great Government, and their business is entitled to the same consideration that any other business receives. Does not this Government go to the rescue of the great banks and deposit money in them in the time of stress and storm? President Roosevelt had the Secretary of the Treasury place $42,000,000 in the big banks of New York in 1907 to avoid the wreck and ruin of bank failures. This has been done on more than one occasion. Not a dime of interest was received on all of those millions which Mr. Morgan received from the Government to save the banking interests of New York. The panic came all over the United States, but New York was saved. Every well-informed man knows that the Secretary of the Treasury has deposited money in banks to help out in crucial times, and this is wise and proper.

Can not this Congress under the Constitution give relief to the men who raise the cotton, the greatest product to bring the world's gold to the United States? No gratuity is asked, no scheme is proposed that could jeopardize the currency of this Government.

I feel that unless something be done the farmers who raised the cotton will be forced to part with their cotton at 6 and 7 cents per pound, and that the middle men and speculators will hold onto it until they get the value out of it. What good will that do the farmer? He is the man I am trying to help, and this amendment will help him. I wish every farmer could stack his cotton under a shed and let it stay there until it goes to 10 cents or more per pound. I know he could hold it if this Congress will pass this bill or amendment so that he could borrow the money to pay up his pressing debts. All other products are rising in value, and if the farmer eats any flour bread or biscuits he will have to pay $7 a barrel for it. The manufacturers of cotton in our own country are anxious to get cotton as cheap as possible and to sell the output of their mills at as high prices as possible.

As one friend of the farmer in this Congress I do not want to sit idly by when I know we have the right under the Constitution to pass this legislation that would enable him to hold his cotton until he can sell it for what it is worth.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, it is not, in my judgment, so much the want of credit that the South suffers from now; but it is the want of a market. I believe it is my duty also to say here now, in view of some criticisms I have heard, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in my opinion, has earnestly, and with love and devotion to the South, put forth every effort that he possibly could to come to our relief. I do not believe there is a warmer sympathizer with us in our distress in the Halls of this Congress than is the Secretary of the Treasury. We have had opportunities extended to our banks to obtain all the credit that they need, but how to get that credit extended to the farmer has been so far the unsolved problem. And if the same opportunity for credit were extended to the farmer that has been extended to the banks—that is, the opportunity to borrow on ample security—would that enable him to tide over this period of distress, which has grown out of a want of a market for his cotton?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that the amendment offered to this bill may afford some relief, but I fear not very much. The trouble is that even if the banks were full of money they could not loan it except on ample security. If they were ready and anxious to make well-secured loans at reasonable interest, could they in justice to their depositors loan more than, say, three-fourths the market price of the security at the time they made the loan? If this amendment were law, some men who owe little and have much could borrow perhaps enough on their cotton to enable them to hold it.

But, Mr. Speaker, what good would it do to the man who has a little home half paid for, who has raised 30 bales of cotton, and who owes to some loan company of the purchase money, say, $4,000, bearing 8 per cent interest, and payable the principal and interest in five annual installments? Would it help him if he could borrow $900, or $30 a bale, on that cotton after he had stored and fully insured it? He must raise eleven hundred and twenty dollars. Let us figure, if you please, on that man's situation. Perhaps he has raised enough corn, oats, hogs, poultry, and little things to have fed and clothed his family during the year, and has hired no help to make the crop, and when cotton-gathering time came he owed nothing except these sums on his home. It is a violent assumption or a rare condition, but I am supposing a case of the most deserving and thrifty young farmer I can imagine. What then? To save his cotton from waste he must hire at least half of it picked at a cost of at least $8 a bale, or $120. Ginning and bagging will cost him $3.50 per bale, or $105. Warehousing and insuring will cost him about $2 a bale, or $60.

This makes a total of $285. We will credit him with $6.50 per bale, or $195, for his seed, which is about what he got, allowing nothing for saving over any seed to plant next year. This would leave $90, I think, at the very least, to come out of his cotton, on which he was borrowing $900, with interest, say, at 6 per cent taken out in advance. He would have left $766 with which to save his home. Such a man is a thrifty man; he has made by-products carry him. He is an industrious man; he has made good crops. He is a frugal and economical man and he is a lucky man; he has had no sickness nor stock losses, yet he has $766 to meet $1,120 of debt. Oh, but you say, if he comes within $400 of paying up, his creditors will give him time. That may be, and then, again, his creditor may demand what is due him, bring suit, and sweep away from him what he had worked years to get together. Hundreds of thousands of such cases will occur in the South, if something better than even this amendment is not found, even if, under this amendment, plenty of banks were found ready and willing to advance 6 cents a pound to all who wished to borrow on cotton. I confess that at one time I thought the cotton section could tide over their evil hour fairly well if they could borrow 6 cents per pound; but I say frankly now that will be small help to the great majority of our people.

Let me give another illustration. A small merchant, in a rich cotton county, has been advancing to small farmers and tenants all during the year. He is easily worth $20,000 over all his indebtedness if times were normal, but he has advanced perhaps $50,000 worth of farm supplies and has on hand goods worth $10,000. Now, he owes, we may presume, $30,000 to the bank and to the larger merchant from whom he bought. He can collect only between a half and a fourth of what is due him. If he collects $20,000 only he can not pay what he owes and must go to the wall. Or take the case of a landlord who has supplied his tenants, as is frequently the case, close up to the margin of what the tenant expected to make. The tenant can only pay half or less. What becomes of the landlord if he has simply supplied the tenant by using his credit? If the banker or foreign merchant demands payment, the merchant or landlord must also demand payment. And all along down the line inability to pay in full spells ruin. I fear I can not make myself clear enough for those who are not of the South to understand the situation. The whole fabric of our system is gone. Let me explain it or try to in another way. I make the statement that a landlord owning a good farm, but owing something on it, having made a good crop this year is in worse condition than he would have been in any normal year if a cloudburst had singled him out and destroyed every house and every acre of cotton and corn on his place, because in that case he could easily have gotten credit to start over. His neighbors, his merchant, his banker, his credit would have helped him, but to-day there is no help in any of these. He is simply stripped, and there is no help for him if he is forced to pay.

I vote for this amendment because it will do something, but the wisdom and statesmanship of this country ought to do more. What the farmer needs is not to be able to borrow but to be able to pay. And to make him able to pay he needs not the privilege of borrowing, but a market for his crop, so that he can sell it and pay his debts. If I had the opportunity I would like to vote for what is known as the Hoke Smith proposition, provided some of its features were stricken out. That is to say, I would like to vote to provide the issuance of $250,000,000 United States bonds in small denominations, bearing 4 per cent interest, to be used in buying 5,000,000 bales of cotton at 10 cents per pound, the cotton to be taken off the market and held by the Government till 1916 or until it brought 11 cents per pound, and to levy a uniform tax on the cotton production of the South to make good any possible losses that might come to the United States by reason of the transaction. Mr. Speaker, this would not be valorization or attempting by law to fix the price of a commodity. It would simply be the Government of the United States advancing to the whole cotton industry of the United States a loan of $250,000,000 to enable it as one industrial enterprise to take care of its surplus while it marketed in a reasonable way and for a reasonable price that part of its product for which there was a demand and market.

I shall not enter into the discussion of the constitutionality of such a measure, but it is constitutional under the same interpretation of the Constitution and in the same way that the law was and is constitutional by which we spent $400,000,000 to build the Panama Canal and millions upon millions to clear out and deepen our harbors and rivers to aid commerce and preserve and build up our industries. I know that other nations under like conditions have not hesitated and would not hesitate to go to the aid of great industries. Even to-day I find in the New York Journal of Commerce of October 19 this item:

[Special cable to the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, October 19, 1914.]

LONDON, October 18, 1914.

There is a growing agitation here for some solution of the cotton situation. There has been considerable talk of direct purchases by English spinners in the American market. This talk has now ended. Manufacturers agree that the cotton industry can only be restored to normal by attacking present conditions at their base. The raw-cotton market must first be standardized.

It is hoped that the Government can be induced to advance funds for the purchase of this year's surplus cotton, either with or without the cooperation of your Government. Improvement must come first from a demand for the products of the mills at workable prices. Severe distress in labor is in sight, and it is not improbable that 90 per cent of the Lancashire looms will become idle.

But I can not blind myself to the fact that in the Senate the Smith proposition was defeated by a vote of 40 to 21; that 21 Democrats voted against it and only 17 Democrats for it, and that all those Democrats who voted for it were southern Democrats, and that no Democrat from Maryland, Kentucky, Virginia, or Missouri voted for it. Nor am I blind to the fact that such a law as the Smith amendment on our Federal statutes might open a very pandoras box of mischief in the future. Amendments offered by Senators from other sections while the Smith amendment was pending, such as one asking that $500,000,000 of bonds be issued to buy up the grain of the West, and speech after speech showed clearly which way the proposition pointed. With the Smith proposition enacted into law I see clearly that it would be used as a precedent for every industry and every interest from every section of the country to appeal to the Federal Government for like assistance, and if these appeals were heeded our Federal Government would become a juggernaut of destruction for all the reserved powers, rights, privileges, and duties of the States once the pride and glory of our fathers. Even to me, in the extremity of desperation for my people, the Smith proposition had some features incorporated by its southern sponsors so obnoxious that I could not have supported it as it was. It not only sought Federal aid to take some of our cotton off the market, but it turned over to the Federal Government the direction of our industrial life, fixing by Federal law what we should plant, and the apportioning of our crops, and penalizing our labor if we failed to observe its mandate.

The Smith proposition as a whole and other still more extreme and impossible propositions urged and insisted on from the beginning of our distress by southern Members, who have been loudest in their declamation and agitation, have, it seems to me, been a nightmare of unwisdom and bad counsel. The first grave mistake we made was in assuming that we had to make our fight alone and calling into conference only cotton State representatives. I think we ought from the beginning to have assumed that our relief was a national question and asked for the cooperation and advice of the ablest and coolest heads in all sections and parties of our country. As a result of the course actually pursued no measures of relief were brought to the front, until within the last few days, that any Members not from the South would support.

It plainly appears now, and I think it ought to have been always known, that we had friends in every State and in every party ready and anxious to aid us if we would show them how or let them show us how it could be done wisely and effectively. The speeches and votes of not a few northern and western Members and Senators, Republicans as well as Democrats, show this. And since this question may not have been dealt with by Congress for the last time, I am hoping that there may yet be an outgrowth from it of a warmer fraternity of feeling between the North and South—a stronger welding together of the two sections in mutual regard and common aim. When sons of the North and South in the Spanish War fought under one flag against a common foe much was done to end the bitterness of the past. When the two sections shall counsel together, earnestly and honestly seeking to lift up the one that is stricken, still more will be done to make this country and these States forever one and inseparable, because held together by bonds of love and devotion.

But with all this, if the amendment we are voting on shall be defeated or if it shall be carried, what more have I to suggest? Without being too tedious, let me tell you. I have said what we want is a market. I have told you some of the objections to the Federal Government attempting to furnish or provide that market. There remains but one other staff to lean on. That staff is the cotton-growing State itself. I urge that every cotton-growing State issue its own bonds, bearing, say, 4 per cent interest, in large and small denominations, and give these bonds in exchange for our cotton at 10 cents per pound basis middling to the extent of one-half of the State's whole crop for 1914. Let any possible loss to the State be made good by a tax on the cotton produced next year and thereafter, and let the State hold this cotton off the market till January, 1916, or until it shall sell for 11 cents per pound. The fact that the State holds this cotton, the tax on cotton will be sufficiently deterrent to prevent growing a large cotton crop next year, but inducements might also be held out to encourage other crops. I do not like penalties, certainly not criminal penalties, on labor or the products of the labor of freemen. But I am told that my State and other States can not issue such bonds as I urge because of the State's constitution inhibition. If that be true, let the legislature be asked to take the shortest way possible to submit to the people an amendment to the constitution, and while waiting for that amendment let the legislature pass such stay laws as will prevent forced collection of debts.

The remedy I propose is heroic, but the disease is the most fearful that has invaded our borders for more than a generation. We are stricken worse than we have been since armies trod and cannon sounded over our land.

If Texas will do this, other cotton States will follow. If Texas, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Oklahoma, the six biggest cotton States, will do this at once, in my judgment the remaining half of our cotton will sell for 10 cents before the 1st of April, 1915.

If this plan were pursued and there were any need, we could come to Congress at the December term and ask, with no fear of being denied and no fear of setting any dangerous precedent, that the Federal Government back every bond issued by the States with the entire credit and the fullest favor of the Nation.

For days and weeks, Mr. Speaker, after the European war broke out we were dazed and stunned by the magnitude of the misfortune that befell our people. Our brethren of the North have not yet fully comprehended it. It will only come home to them when our bankruptcy or our failure to pay shall lock the wheels of their industries and business. By December they will know. No wonder we have been lost in a maze of conflicting remedies. What I have suggested is not original with me. It was, I believe, the idea first of Mr. Harding, one of the members of the Federal Reserve Board and one of the soundest and ablest bankers of the South. I care not who has the credit. What I do care for is the salvation of my people.

Let us of the cotton-growing States gird up our loins as strong men and go out to help ourselves. Let us cease for a while to look abroad for help. Let our own governors and legislatures get busy. Neither Congress nor banks, neither friend nor foe, is going to lend to us without ample security, and no one is going to help us till we first help ourselves. We have the power to help ourselves in the way I have suggested. Will we do it?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not any more time to yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill to help the cotton farmers of the South. Some gentlemen seem to think that this is radical legislation. In reply I wish to say that we are facing a serious condition, and it requires quick action and a certain remedy. If this bill becomes a law, it simply means that our distressed farmers will be enabled to borrow money from the Government at 4 per cent interest on their cotton warehouse receipts, where the cotton is properly weighed, graded, and insured.

As we all know, we have lost our cotton market as the result of this horrible and bloody war in Europe. It came upon our people like a clap of thunder in a clear sky, and has left us with a large crop and without a market, and as a result of it middling cotton, which was selling at 13 cents a pound when the war broke out, is now selling at 6 cents a pound at interior points. From August 1, 1913, to October 5, 1913, exports of cotton from our ports were 1,307,000 bales, of an approximate value of $85,000,000. For the corresponding period of this year there were exported but 152,000 bales, of an estimated value of about $5,000,000. These figures show not only that we have practically lost our foreign market but that we are sacrificing our product when we do export it, and it should be plain to any thinking man that the only remedy now is quick money to help us hold our surplus cotton and to enable us to sell the balance at a better price.

Some contend that the remedy now is to reduce the acreage or prevent the growing of it altogether by law for next year. I do not believe this is practicable, and it seems to me that this is no time to discuss what should be done to relieve us for next year's crop until we have applied a remedy for this present crop. The time to apply the remedy is now. The cotton farmers understand that they must reduce their acreage for next year, and they will do so voluntarily. They understand, too, that this war will cause the price of foodstuffs to rise, and they will diversify and live more at home. In other words, if they can get present relief in this emergency by borrowing money at a low rate of interest and not have to sacrifice their present crop, they can tide over until they can produce a diversified crop for next year on which they can live, and the cotton that they will have held over they can then offer to supply the necessary demand and in that way evade the impending calamity.

Gentlemen, I am a cotton planter myself, and I speak from experience. I have here an account of sale of cotton produced from my place and sold for 6 cents a pound. This cotton has cost about 8 cents or 10 cents to grow it. Now, I ask you as fair-minded men how can our people pay their debts and get along in this emergency unless help comes to them immediately? But, gentlemen, I submit that we are not beggars asking you to give us money out of the Treasury for nothing. On the contrary, we are offering you the best security in the world for the loan we ask. We are offering you middling cotton weighed, graded, and insured as collateral for this money, and I submit that this is a sound business proposition that we are making you.

Do not think for one moment that this is a local condition affecting the South only, and that you are not interested in it. Far from it. We are an agricultural section, buying our horses, mules, farm implements, wagons, buggies, flour, meat, clothing, and shoes from you people of the North, East, and West. In other words this great cotton industry of ours dovetails into every other industry in this country, and if nothing is done in this emergency to save our surplus cotton and help us withhold it from going to the speculators and manufacturers for almost nothing it will leave us in a helpless condition, without money to buy from you who live in the other sections of our country. To do nothing in this crisis and permit the prostration of the South would be a crime against this great Republic of ours, and the prostration and financial ruin of any section of the United States is bound to be a serious blow at the financial life of the whole Nation.

We of the South have always been willing to help the people of other sections during periods of stress. I do not have to go back far into the history of our country to find examples of our good faith. We showed that spirit two years ago during the Ohio flood, and we did so recently on two occasions, when the city of Salem went up in flames and when we helped to bring back the American tourists who were caught in the war zone. Now we are facing a calamity, and we appeal to you to help us in a legitimate way. You can do so by passing this bill, and the emergency of the times and the consummation of its purpose amply justify its passage.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield me two minutes more?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman's time all exhausted?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; and I have only two more gentlemen who wish to be recognized.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was to be recognized.

Mr. HENRY. He does not care for any time now, but will use it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois yields two minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues from the South have so fully set forth the present needs of the cotton producers in the South that I shall not attempt to enlarge on what they have so well said. We are soon to have a vote on an amendment to this bill which will authorize the issuance of $250,000,000 to be used to aid in taking care of the distressed conditions in the South. A great many of the gentlemen on the Republican side say they are my friends. I believe they are, and I am their friend.

Now, what I want you gentlemen on that side of the House to do is to assist us in passing this amendment. This, more than anything else you can do or say, will prove your friendship. The farmers have become tired and weary of advice; what they want and what I want for them is money, now, to aid them in holding their cotton.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe the Government can do something for the relief of the people of the South, who are facing disaster because of the great drop in the price of cotton, their principal crop, and I will oppose the adjournment of Congress until something is done along this line.

The people of the South are not asking alms, they are not asking a gift of any kind; they are simply asking that the Government perform its rightful functions. They are asking that the Government do something for a great part of the people and not for any special interest. One-third of the people of the United States are directly interested in the cotton crop. The price of cotton has been cut in half by the war in Europe, and unless something is done for the people of the South they are going to have the value of their labor this year cut in half. They can not afford to bear this loss, and it is not right that they should have to bear it.

In the past the Government has been lavish with the public funds. We have built the Panama Canal, at enormous expense, to benefit the whole country, and during the last session of Congress we appropriated $30,000,000 to build a railroad in Alaska to develop that far-off territory. The Panama Canal will be of no special direct benefit to the people of the interior of the country, and the railroad in Alaska will not benefit one person in 100,000 in the United States proper. I doubt seriously if we had constitutional authority for the appropriations for the Panama Canal or for the railroad in Alaska, yet there was no great objection to these appropriations. And if we had authority for these appropriations we certainly have authority for emergency legislation now for the whole people of the South.

Then we have spent many millions for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West, and every year we spend millions on river and harbor improvements. The money spent on these projects can benefit at best only a comparatively small part of the people. We seem able to find constitutional authority for these appropriations, and there is, as a matter of fact, no great objection to them on the part of the people. The people of this country, and especially the people of the South, are broad-minded, and they indorse the proposition that it is good policy for the Government to try to develop the country in every reasonable and proper way. This attitude on their part makes it all the harder for them to understand why the Government can not do something for them now in the hour of their greatest distress. The people of the South will be disappointed if something is not done, and I believe the people of the other sections of the country will indorse all reasonable and proper legislation along this line. Sectional lines have long been obliterated, and an appeal from one part of our people in distress touches the hearts of all our people.

There may be honest differences of opinion as to what is the best thing to do, and I think that perhaps the people of the South may have suffered in the opinion of the rest of the country because of some measures that have been advocated. Some propositions have been made that have impressed me as being utterly impracticable. But we can not excuse ourselves by simply opposing what we consider unwise measures. If we are to be true to ourselves and to the people who sent us here, if we are to be worthy of the positions we hold, we must work out a plan that will give the relief that is needed. I will never concede that we can not do this.

Like many other thinking men, in Congress and out of it, I have my own ideas as to what should be done, but my pride of opinion does not carry me so far as to oppose everything else if I can not get just what I want. I believe there is sufficient ability and statesmanship in this Congress to solve the problem that is before us, and I will support any plan that meets the approval of the majority.

I have been an advocate of a rural credits system and have introduced a bill along this line. I believe that the problem of the South of to-day would be solved if we had a system by which farmers could borrow money direct from the Government on their farm lands, on long time, and at low rates of interest. If we had that law to-day, the farmer who has cotton could borrow money—not on his cotton but on his land—and he could store his cotton and grow other crops until cotton again became profitable. The mechanic in the city or town who finds himself thrown out of employment because of the business depression could under such a law buy a little farm and make a living for himself and his family while he was paying for his home. Farm land, managed and tilled by an ambitious man, would be as good security for a Government loan as a Government bond itself.

I think we might pass such a law as this and get it in operation within a short time, and that it would be the salvation of the South, and there will probably come times when it would be the salvation of the farmers of other sections of the country.

But if it be impossible to work out a rural credits bill now and put it in operation, then do something else. Give us emergency legislation of some kind, for there can be no denying the fact that the people of the South to-day need help as badly as any people ever needed it. And I am not yet ready to believe that Congress will adjourn without giving it.

I can not conclude these remarks, Mr. Speaker, without giving expression to a thought that weighs very heavily upon me, and that is that the farmers of the South are themselves very largely to blame for the plight they are in to-day. Of course they had nothing to do with bringing on the war in Europe and thus cutting off the market for their cotton, but they have been to blame for attempting to grow nothing but cotton. By doing this they have put themselves at the mercy of people and conditions over which they could have no control. The climate of the South is ideal; its soil is the most fertile in the world. The people of the South can grow successfully any crop that is grown anywhere in the United States. The people of the South can make all their foodstuffs at home. And if they had been doing this, and making cotton as a surplus, they would not now be facing disaster and coming here in desperation and asking for help. But while they may have contributed to their present condition, they are none the less in sore straits, and they deserve whatever help we can give them. And I believe the help we are asked to give now will be simply emergency help. I believe the people of the South will learn a much-needed lesson from this experience, and that from this year henceforth they will pursue better methods. They will grow on their farms the things needed on their farms—grains and meats—and that in the future cotton will be a surplus crop, a money crop, pure and simple, and not a food crop. That is the trouble now; many farmers depend on the sale of their cotton for actual food for themselves and their families and the horses and mules that pull their plows. If they can not realize money on their cotton, they can not eat. This is an ugly truth, but it is the truth nevertheless. So we are asked for emergency legislation, and the emergency is very real and pressing.

And for this reason I am prepared to support almost any legislation that meets with the approval of my colleagues, and I am unwilling for the Congress to adjourn until something is done. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, about the only reason advanced in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia is that submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON], who requested gentlemen to support this bill on the ground of good-fellowship. Even the proponents of the measure state it is not workable. I wish to point out a fatal weakness in reference to this amendment, and that is that the banks, State and national, which are presumably engaged in loaning money to their customers, will not accept these funds when it is conditioned under this act that the money is to be loaned at the low rate of one-half of what they are receiving on their outstanding loans. It stands to reason that they would not accept this money, and you can not force them to accept it, under the condition to loan it out at 4 per cent. The bank's paper which they discounted at 6, 8, 10, and higher per cent would never be renewed at those rates.

I am opposed to asset currency. I am not in favor even of the original proposition contained in the Senate bill. I read the circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I obtained this morning from the department—and that reminds me that at the present moment the national banks of the South have $150,000,000 of circulating currency now available which they have not availed themselves of—and under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, as shown by the Secretary's letter, they can today deposit their warehouse receipts for cotton, tobacco, and naval stores, and for 75 per cent of their face value receive emergency currency; and yet the southern banks, to the extent of $150,000,000, have not availed themselves of that privilege. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] says, it is a matter of marketing the cotton and not a matter of credit. This bill only provides for credit, and the banks at present have ample currency for credit. This bill would furnish little relief to the cotton situation, and, more, it would establish a most dangerous precedent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that the appeal in support of this bill has been made in this manner, so largely based upon sympathy. Of course we all realize that the decline in the price of cotton, due to the European war, is a serious calamity to the cotton producers of the South, and we all sympathize with them; but this is a matter that must be decided upon sound economic principles and not upon sympathy. Notwithstanding my strong desire to aid, I am convinced that the remedy proposed is worse than the disease, and that the people concerned would be injured rather than benefited by the remedy proposed.

It is not strictly accurate to say that this misfortune, this decline of the cotton market, is a calamity to be compared with the San Francisco earthquake or the Salem fire or any catastrophe of that kind. There is no analogy between them, because this is a thing that may recur at any time. In fact, the cotton producers are not the only ones who find themselves without a market on account of the European war. The market for copper is also depressed, and there are thousands and thousands of men engaged in that industry. I understand also that in production of perishable products, such as fruits—notably, apples—formerly shipped to Europe, and for which there is no market, a large number of people are engaged, and they are also in the same predicament. This amendment is based upon a wrong theory. This relief here sought will not remedy the evil at all. This bill ought to be denominated, or rather this amendment ought to be denominated, "A bill for the free and unlimited coinage of cotton and tobacco without the aid or consent of any other nation whatsoever." That would be a more appropriate title. It does not provide for loaning on cotton, but the purchase—that is what it amounts to—and holding it until the market revives.

This bill proposes that the United States shall issue $250,000,000 of greenbacks without a dollar of gold reserve to back up the issue and deposit it in the State and National banks of the States producing cotton and tobacco, to be loaned on the security of those commodities. There is an alternative provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell Panama Canal bonds to the amount of $240,000,000 and deposit the funds so raised in banks, to be loaned on the security of cotton and tobacco warehouse receipts. It is the most dangerous inflation scheme ever proposed. If carried out, it will destroy faith in the soundness of our whole currency, drive gold into hiding, and produce general financial disaster.

Now they say that this decline in the cotton market is unprecedented. Let us see about that. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] inserted in the RECORD a table of the prices of cotton, and I find that during the last Democratic administration the prices were lower than they are now, without any war in Europe. These are Democratic prices. In 1893 the price was 7½ cents, in 1894 it was 5.9, in 1895 it was 8.2, in 1896 it was 7.1, in 1897 it was 5.6. The Dingley law was passed in July, 1897, and it took some time for business to revive and raise prices.

Mr. WEBB. Cotton went to its lowest point in 1898, under the McKinley administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. Business had not fully revived; you had four years in which to ruin the country. It took some time to revive business.

Certainly, by this time, we ought to have an efficient currency system. You have loudly proclaimed to the country that you have given us an ideal system. I hope so. You remember that the President only a day or two ago in his letter to Mr. UNDERWOOD, published in the RECORD, said that we now had an ideal currency system capable of meeting every situation. He said:

> In like manner, by the currency bill, we have created a democracy of credit, such as has never existed in this country before.

Further on he says:

> Let bankers explain the technical features of the new system. Suffice it here to say that it provides a currency which expands as it is needed, and contracts when it is not needed; a currency which comes into existence in response to the call of every man who can show a going business and a concrete basis for extending credit to him, however obscure or prominent he may be, however big or little his business transactions.

But this does not agree with the testimony of the leading Democrats of the South. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in his speech yesterday, as it appears in the RECORD, says:

> But, Mr. Speaker, we are in distress; we must have relief. Other agencies have failed us, and we turn now to the Government of the United States and ask that it grant us the use of some of the public funds in order that we may hold our cotton and prevent panic and bankruptcy among the producing classes of the South. [Applause.] This Government owes more to its producing classes than to any other class of its people. Why, then, should special favors be shown by the Government to banks and to bankers? We can not all be bankers, and when the banking institutions refuse to aid the productive industries of our country, and when they permit the producer to be greatly handicapped and seriously injured in his business, then it is the duty of the Government to do the thing necessary to relieve the distress of the industrial and producing classes, in order that they may not be deprived of the fruits of their labor and industry.

To the same effect was the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], chairman of the Rules Committee. It will be interesting to learn how these gentlemen will harmonize what they now say with the boastful declarations in their campaign literature.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] desire to proceed?

Mr. GLASS. I supposed I would be permitted to close the debate.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman going to close in one speech?

Mr. GLASS. Except that I will yield to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], in order that he may secure leave to print. I do it now.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this so-called "Hardwick amendment" authorizing the issuance of $250,000,000 upon the security of cotton or tobacco warehouse receipts, because I believe its enactment would imperil our whole credit and financial system. The proposed amendment is repugnant to every sound economic principle. In a limited time I can only briefly point out some of the many objections to this proposed amendment.

It is objectionable, in the first place, because it is special legislation, confined to specific sections of the country and to specified commodities, cotton and tobacco.

The amendment is, moreover, objectionable because it specifies a special rate of interest, namely, 4 per cent. This is discriminatory when the prevailing rate all over the country is from 2 to 4 per cent higher.

It would be, furthermore, a serious danger to issue the proposed notes through State banks. They are not subject to examination by our National Treasury Department, nor in any way under national control. Even though they would submit to examination there are not sufficient examiners available to make satisfactory examinations within the limited time available. Again, in many States State banks have not the limitations as to the amount of loans which can be made to individuals proportionable to the capital and surplus of the banks, nor subject to the double-liability provisions with reference to stockholders.

In addition, there is the very practicable objection that plates from which to make the proposed bank notes could not be furnished for many weeks. A delay of many weeks would defeat the very purpose of the bill.

There are even more important objections, which are fundamental and fatal.

The proposition to sell $240,000,000 of Panama bonds is absolutely impracticable. There would be no market for these bonds, because the banks would not invest their money at 4 per cent when they are getting from 6 to 8 per cent, and they would not at this critical time invest their funds in permanent investments, but would continue to keep their funds in the most liquid kind of assets obtainable.

What is even more important, they would not deplete their reserves by using gold to buy bonds. Even granting that they would, such a course would be disastrous to the whole financial business of the country, because at the present time, with the heavy withdrawal of gold by European countries, there is little enough gold in the country as it is, and the supply is needed absolutely for reserve purposes.

The bond proposition, therefore, is entirely unfeasible, first, because bonds could not be sold, and, second, because the gold of the country ought not to be drawn away from the reserves.

As to the alternative proposition, namely, to issue $250,000,000 of United States notes, enactment of this proposition would menace our whole financial structure. First, however, let me state that it is extremely unlikely that even though these $250,000,000 of notes were issued to banks, prudent bankers would make loans to any extent upon cotton as security. To-day there is a large amount of currency in banks in the cotton States. The principal reason it is not loaned is because cotton has no market, and, accordingly, has no stable price. No prudent man will take cotton for security until he is certain that the cotton can be sold. Every Member of Congress with whom I have talked on the subject admits that the whole of this year's cotton crop can not be sold for 10 cents a pound unless it is certain that next year's crop will be greatly curtailed. There is, however, not the slightest assurance that there will be this curtailment, and it is very difficult to find any practical method by which next year's cotton crop can be curtailed.

The whole problem amounts to this: Before cotton can safely be used as security for loans on a basis of 10 cents a pound there must be a definite assurance that cotton will at some time in the future sell for 10 cents a pound. There has been no plan evolved to give any assurance that this year's cotton crop can be sold at 10 cents a pound. Under present conditions loans can not be obtained upon cotton because cotton has no price.

In view of all the conditions it would be a positive peril to issue $250,000,000 upon cotton as a security as proposed in this amendment. No provision for an adequate gold reserve is made in this bill. If it be argued that these proposed notes are not redeemable in gold until the 1st of January, 1916, then it is questionable whether or not these unredeemable notes, even with the 2 per cent interest, would remain at par. No one would keep notes for the 2 per cent interest when the same amount of currency redeemable in gold could be used to obtain a far greater rate of interest. It is quite probable, therefore, that these notes would fall below par. Then again, there is no certainty that on January 1, 1916, when they are redeemable, that there would be gold enough in the Treasury to redeem them. The whole proposition is full of danger and peril. The enactment of this amendment would threaten the security of the United States Treasury Department. It would, moreover, afford the opportunity for wild inflation. It is an absolutely unsound principle to issue United States notes upon security which has no present market value and which may not have a reasonable market price even in the future, and which is not a liquid asset but a fixed asset.

I think we all appreciate the unfortunate distress in which the cotton States find themselves to-day because of the outbreak of war in Europe. I think the Members of this Congress would go a long way to help any section of the country suffering as the cotton sections are suffering at this moment, but it would be a foolhardy action to endanger our whole credit and financial system, to bring about almost certain disaster to the commerce and industry and agriculture of the Nation by enacting any such imprudent, unsafe, and fruitless bill as is offered in this amendment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, every citizen, no matter from what section he hails, sympathizes with the distress existing in the cotton States due to the war in Europe. This appeals to all of us; but, representing the people of the country, as we do, the bill, and especially the amendment, before the House is not, in my judgment, safe nor sound. It is a new departure in our well-established financial policy. The amendment proposed by with the proposition would for a moment consent to a return to the old greenback days, which, if it had been adopted then, would have demoralized every business and commercial interest of the country. We escaped that calamity, and no one familiar with the proposition would for a moment consent to a return of that chaotic condition. If adopted now by the Congress and approved by the President, the latter being very doubtful, it would fail to give the needed relief to the suffering cotton farmers. It would require at least 6 months to put the machinery into successful operation to carry out its provisions. The 13 months in which these notes are to mature and to be paid in gold would speedily pass and the people of the South be unprepared to redeem them. It would certainly be an entirely new departure, establishing an untried and experimental system of finance, and I am sure will not receive the approval of this House.

"An act to amend the national banking laws," as heretofore amended in an act approved August 4, 1914, is hereby further amended so that the words "that no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 30 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus" is amended to read as follows: "That no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 100 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus."

I am opposed to the change to 100 per cent, as it is too near the danger line of solvency. The increase from 30 to 75 per cent may be justifiable, when handled by the Federal Reserve Board. However, if approved by the Congress, I shall reluctantly acquiesce and vote for the measure. Frequent allusions were made on the floor to-day, charging that my own city—New York—which I have the honor in part to represent, has been favored in times past.

Moneys have been deposited in the great financial institutions of New York for the relief of the country at large and only on the most unquestioned security. It is universally recognized that this city is the great commercial and financial center of the country. All must look to it for advice and relief, and while our great institutions may have taken advantage of their opportunities they have frequently saved the Nation from distress and panics.

The bill S. 6398, as reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, in the main is one that men believing in sound money and a stable currency can support. The report of the committee, among other things, says:

The enactment of this bill is urgently recommended by the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Department upon the ground that it will greatly facilitate and amplify the relief which the Federal reserve system is expected to afford the business interests of the country in the existing financial emergency.

When the Federal reserve act was framed it had for its purpose the gradual concentration into 12 Federal reserve banks of the scattered gold reserves held by many thousand banks and the gradual elimination of balances kept as reserves with reserve agents in reserve and central reserve cities. This plan of gradual development was adopted for two reasons: First, because a rapid withdrawal of all reserve balances from reserve agents would have created a dangerous disturbance; and, second, because it was thought that elasticity should be added step by step only to our present system lest it should stimulate too rapid expansion.

It so happens that many banks, especially in the South and West, have not enough investment in bonds and other securities to enable them to put out the amount of circulation which they now require and to which they should be entitled within the limitation provided by the act of August 4, 1914. These banks, however, have an adequate supply of commercial paper, and, inasmuch as this security is now recognized as the most liquid of assets, there seems to be no reason for denying the issuance of emergency currency to national banks which are able to offer it as security.

Just at this time a considerable amount of additional currency is demanded, and the demand seems to be justified. Crop-moving season is at hand, and at this time of year the amount of currency in circulation is greater than at other seasons. Over and above the usual seasonal demand there is now an exceptional demand owing to the fact that the necessities of Europe growing out of war have caused a substantial gold export movement. There is reason to believe, too, that doubts and fears arising from the great European war have prompted a certain amount of hoarding of specie in this country. It is desirable that the shortage of currency growing out of these causes should be promptly supplied by the issuance of emergency notes which will be retired whenever the emergency may be passed. The progressive tax imposed on the emergency notes by the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as amended, and the discretion given the Secretary of the Treasury to require of the issuing banks additional gold deposits in the redemption fund, will have the effect of causing the retirement of the notes when they are not needed to supply an actual demand for a circulating medium.

The bill as amended has the approval of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board.

In my judgment, the Federal Reserve Board, with the bill offered by the Committee on Banking and Currency amending that measure, will have full power to meet this and all other questions. Our legislative bodies are too prone to tinker with existing statutes, and usually with unfortunate results to the business interests of the country. What the people want and should have is a rest, so that business may adjust itself on a sound basis and universal prosperity bless our beloved country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when we passed the Vreeland Act there was a great deal of controversy in regard to the advancing of emergency currency based upon commercial paper. The national-bank notes had stood for many years as solid as the legal-tender notes and as good as gold; and we finally provided in the law that emergency currency might be issued on the terms named in the Vreeland law to the extent of 30 per cent of the capital and surplus of the banks. The Senate the other day passed this bill increasing that amount from 30 per cent to 75 per cent, and the Committee on Banking and Currency have now reported the bill again, proposing to increase it from 75 per cent to 100 per cent, so that we now propose by the bill to permit emergency currency to be issued by the banks to the full extent of their capital and surplus. What we thought was a striking innovation only a few years ago—to allow 30 per cent—has now grown to be a minor thing, when we propose 100 per cent. Gentlemen seem to forget that there is now more money in circulation in the country per capita than ever before, and less credit. Printing large sums of money does not help the situation; it never has and never will; and the proposition here to increase the emergency currency based on the commercial paper is, in my judgment, a very dangerous proposition of itself. Now, the cotton proposition, which is to increase the legal-tender notes by $250,000,000, without any gold reserve behind them in addition to the present gold reserve, is itself a dangerous proposition. What the South needs is a market for cotton. If a billion dollars were to be placed in the banks of the South to-day, I doubt whether money would be any easier to borrow there to-morrow. Men loan money with two objects in view—one to secure the return of the principal and one to secure the return of the interest upon the money. And people in the South and banks elsewhere will not loan money upon cotton or anything else unless they feel fairly secure that the money will be returned to them; that their security is good. You to-day have no market price for your cotton. If you had, you would have no difficulty in borrowing money to the extent that it is a reasonable security. And printing bank notes will not add to your relief; it will take away from it. The more bank notes the Government prints the less credit there will be in the land. The more asset currency that is issued without sufficient assets behind it the less credit there will be in the land. You may start the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or the Government Printing Office to printing money, but what good would it be? It will soon be worth no more, if we keep on in this way, than the bales of assignats in France were, where they became so cheap that they were baled up like cotton. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, there comes from the South an appeal for help. It is a cry from Macedonia, and I will not turn a deaf ear. The Congress of the United States responded when a calamity befell San Francisco, when the lands of Ohio were deluged, and when thousands in Salem were homeless, and even when pleasure seekers were detained in Europe the vaults of the Treasury were opened and thousands of dollars were immediately dispatched to relieve their embarrassed condition.

And yet there are those who are saying there is no precedent for helping the panic-stricken people of the cotton belt. If, as some say, there are no precedents, then in God's name let us make one; for it is never too late to establish a good precedent.

Not long ago I was in Charleston, S. C., and there I found baled hay from Ohio, and in all the Southland I find meat, breadstuffs, and other manufactured commodities from the North world without end. Out trade relations with the South are now practically paralyzed, almost cut off, as it were, by a successful blockade. The privilege of selling abroad their surplus products is confined almost exclusively to cotton, and because of this we are asked to lend a helping hand, not by way of gift or donation, as was the case with San Francisco, the valley of the Ohio, and the people of Salem.

Unfortunately the people of the South have not indulged in the planting of a diversity of crops, thus they depend almost wholly in their expectancy upon a single article, namely, cotton. No such a crisis or calamity has befallen our people since the War between the States. The appeals of these people are modest and not extravagant; they only ask that the use of the credit of all our people be extended by the Government until such time as normal conditions can be restored—conditions which are now disrupted by a world war. I am for this measure without halt or hesitancy.

If in 1907 the President went to the rescue of the gamblers in New York to such an extent that only $17,000,000 of available cash was left in the Treasury of the United States, then why not heed the cry of a people whose God is our God and whose flag is our flag, and thus cement anew the bonds of a reunited people?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this measure embodies a proposal to base and justify a statute on an illegal and dangerous precedent. In his eloquent presentation of his side of the case during the discussion of the special rule the gifted Georgian, Mr. HARDWICK, who is so soon to grace another body after long and useful service in this House, defended the proposition to lend the Federal credit to the cotton planters of the South on the ground that there was notable precedent for such a policy in the frequent devotion of the National Treasury to the needs of Wall Street.

Yet everyone knows that the Treasury usurped authority in so doing. It had neither a legal nor a moral right to divert the public funds to a private end. Of course, it may be argued that but for this usurpation a frightful financial calamity would have befallen. But, on the other hand, it may be argued with even greater force that the conditions which called for Treasury intervention might never have arisen but for the latent assurance on the part of Wall Street stock gamblers and big-business boomers that Uncle Sam would come to their rescue when they could no longer make head for themselves.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said that in all history there is no parallel for the situation which now confronts the South. Yet there is scarcely a page of history which does not present such a parallel—not on an equal scale, but with the same elements of tragedy. What has happened to the cotton growers of the South? They have lost their market. But was not this what happened to the Ephesians when Paul came among them with his strange new religion? The acceptance of that meant to the artificers of Ephesus the loss of their market for the shrines of Diana. There was sore distress among them, and Paul was as unpopular there as one may be here who advocates a doctrine—rapidly becoming strange in this era of paternalism run mad—which would restrict government to the exercise of its powers only for public purposes.

It were easy to multiply historic parallels on a minor scale for the calamity which has befallen the South as a result of European disturbance. Thousands of merchants in the course of the years have been ruined by changes in fashions. Their markets failed. It meant bankruptcy for the stagecoach when the locomotive began shrieking its way across the country. It meant bankruptcy for the horse-drawn carriage when the automobile honked its way into popularity. There was tragedy and heartbreak in all these events and in every event in the progress of invention which involves a sudden change in economic relations. And here on a gigantic scale we have repeated a familiar detail of the common life—a market that has gone bad. It is not gone altogether, as the market for tulips went when the tulip craze suddenly yielded up the ghost and left thousands in Holland and elsewhere stranded on the shores of bankruptcy. It is a frightful situation, but it is unprecedented only in the sense that it is the biggest thing of the sort that has happened in our time if not in all time.

And let me call attention to the fact that the benefit of this proposed amendment can not accrue in any large measure to the actual growers of cotton—the vast body of tenant farmers who do the work and produce the crop. This quarter of a billion fund which is to be loaned in the South at 4 per cent is to be at the disposal in a large way of the landowners, not at that of the land users. The net effect of this gratuity—for that is all it is, disguise it as we may—will be to stimulate speculation in cotton land in the South, with the certainty that this in the end will react on the tenant farmers in the form of higher rents.

This form of farm credits does not differ in any material aspect from other forms, nor will the results differ materially. In every application of the principle we are bound to see a common effect. For what is at the bottom of all these proposals? Nothing more than extending credit at less than the market rate to a certain class—in the last analysis to that class which owns agricultural land or to those possessed of a desire to enter that class. If farmers were permitted to borrow money at 4 per cent while the rest of us were obliged to pay 6 or 7 or 8 per cent, it is easy to see what would follow. A lot of us now engaged in other than agricultural pursuits would rush to get into a business offering so rich an advantage. This, of course, would mean a greater demand for agricultural land. And this in turn would infallibly mean stiff and increasing advances in the value of such lands. Land users, in consequence, would be compelled to pay more dearly in rent or in the purchase price for opportunity to use it. This is the whole story. Nor can all the sophistry in the world change its essential details. It is writ large in the history of the race.

The South might obtain temporary relief by some such resource as the one proposed. But if we relieve cotton to-day because its market has failed, why not corn to-morrow and lumber next day and coal the next? All these fall upon evil times now and again. Our amiable but disgruntled friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] never ceases to lament the hard lines into which shingles have fallen since other material for roofing has become popular. He blames it on the Underwood tariff, of course, although this had nothing whatever to do with the shingle situation, the shingle makers of British Columbia being just as much in the dumps as those of Washington. The trouble with both is that their market has failed—not utterly, but to an extent which imposes hardship, if not actual loss. The changing fashion in roofing and not Democratic legislation is responsible.

The thought that abides with me in all this clamor for relief for southern cotton growers is, that to give it by the means proposed would involve a subversion of governmental powers. No one can outrun me in sympathy for those in distress in the cotton States. But I have sympathy for those likewise who in other States are in bad case as a result of the same great disturbance which has cost the South its market. If relief is to be voted out of the Treasury for the one, with what face shall we deny relief to the other? Is Uncle Sam a partial relative? Are there favorites among his nephews and nieces? Does he kill the fatted calf for this child, while for the other there is reserved a stone when the cry goes up for bread?

That things will right themselves for the South in due course of time I have not the least doubt. The man whose house burns down is always at some inconvenience and must undergo some hardship. But he can build himself another; he need not give up in despair; he need not dissolve himself in tears while waiting for some one to rebuild for him. Instead, he will show his fortitude, his self-reliance, his pluck in adversity, his determination to make good no matter what the distress or the difficulty. And so it should be with our southern friends. Their case is, indeed, a bitter one. But it is unusual only in its magnitude. In its bearing on the individual it is as everyday and homely as sickness and death. It is no more tragic than the destruction of a wheat field by a cyclone, the devastation of a corn field by the army worm, the blighting of a potato field by a pest of bugs, or the ruin of an orchard by the San Jose scale. It seems so only because the loss of the individual in this case is multiplied by millions. Yet to the individual sufferer it is precisely the same. Were he isolated he would never dream of appealing to Uncle Sam for relief. It is only where he finds himself a unit in the mass that he lifts his voice to beseech a sort of aid that can be given only by the opening of a very Pandora's box of paternalistic mischief.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. SLAYDEN, Mr. FARR, Mr. FALCONER, and Mr. KIRKPATRICK were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for eight minutes and a half.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely necessary that I should reiterate the statement that no Member of this House has a greater appreciation of the trouble in the South or a greater desire to remedy it than I, but I am obliged to be guided by my judgment rather than by my sympathy in determining measures which are designed to relieve the situation. It is very desirable that the Congress should understand the facts of the case and not be misled by misconceptions, rhetorically expressed, of what has been done and what may be done.

Contrary to the repeated asseverations of gentlemen who favor the Hardwick-Henry amendment to this bill, there is no precedent in the history of this or any other country for the thing here sought to be done. It has been stated that in 1907, under the administration of President Roosevelt, he "took $150,000,000 of Government funds and deposited them in Wall Street to aid the gamblers there." That was never done, nor anything like it, at that or any other period.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I have not the time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will take but a minute. How about the Money Trust investigation? Did not that show it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GLASS. I have but little time and can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Did he not deposit $42,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. Neither Mr. Cortelyou nor anybody else ever took $150,000,000 of the Government's money and "deposited it in New York to aid the stock gamblers."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman say he did not deposit $42,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, he did not take $42,000,000 and deposit it in New York for the aid of the gamblers. If he deposited that amount, it was to prevent a panic sweeping over the entire country and ruinously affecting all kinds of business everywhere.

NO DEPOSIT OF "PUBLIC FUNDS."

My friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] the other day quoted the Comptroller of the Currency as saying that the present Secretary of the Treasury had recently deposited $40,000,000 of public funds in New York banks. I have here a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, which I shall insert in the RECORD, saying explicitly that I was right in denying that he had ever done anything of the kind. Here is the letter in part:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, October 20, 1914.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I confirm the statement which I have just made to you over the telephone in response to your inquiry that the "$100,000,000 of additional currency," which in my recent address before the Indiana bankers I stated the Secretary of the Treasury had announced his readiness to supply to the New York banks, if it should be needed, at the time of the international crisis, the 1st of August, was part of the emergency currency provided for under the provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, as amended by the Federal reserve act.

* * * * * * *

It was well known to every banker and business man, and I think we would have reason to assume that it was well known by every Congressman, that the hundred millions of additional currency which the Secretary of the Treasury offered to the New York banks in his announcement on August 2 was the currency which had been issued under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act and stored in the Treasury for the purpose of meeting any emergencies. It has met the emergency, and most effectively.

In my same address in the same connection I made this further statement:

"Is it not deeply significant and enheartening, as indicative of a new policy on the part of our Government, that in this emergency the administration of the restorative was not, as in the past, confined to the banks in New York City? For under the direction of Secretary McAdoo more than $160,000,000 of currency has already, since August 1, with impartial hand, been distributed to the national banks in every section of the country where it has been needed, from Boston to San Francisco, and from the Great Lakes to the cities on the Gulf, helping to dispel and neutralize the poisonous fumes of distrust, alarm, and fear, which had begun to manifest themselves."

I find it hard to believe that there is any Member of Congress who does not know that the one hundred millions of currency which was so promptly furnished to the New York banks, and the one hundred and sixty millions of currency which, at the same time, I stated had been distributed "to the national banks in every section of the country when it has been needed," was the currency issued under the provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as amended, and it seems to me rather unfair for anyone to attempt to construe my statements, which I endeavored to make so very clear, into an announcement that $40,000,000 of Treasury gold in the shape of Government deposits had been turned over to the New York banks. Nothing of the sort was done, and no statement of mine could fairly be construed as indicating anything of the sort.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

So, Mr. Speaker, this currency that was sent to New York was not "the people's money," to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] perpetually is making reference, but merely emergency bank notes, $160,000,000 of which were sent to all sections of the country alike, and not merely to New York. Texas and Virginia and Georgia got their share.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I put the comptroller's speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GLASS. I know the gentleman did that; but what the Comptroller of the Currency meant in that speech, as he declares himself, was that $40,000,000 of "emergency currency" had been sent to New York and not "Government funds." There is a vast difference. Any national bank may receive emergency bank notes upon application by impounding acceptable security in the required amount, depositing the necessary gold-redemption fund, and paying the tax exacted by law. Such notes are the bank's obligation and not public funds belonging to the people. When the Secretary of the Treasury sent $40,000,000 of emergency bank notes to New York he at the same time sent $68,000,000 to southern banks; and southern banks, if they will apply for it, may quickly obtain $150,000,000 more of the same sort of currency that was sent to the New York banks. Indeed, the pending bill, consideration of which has been too long delayed by obstructive tactics, is expressly intended to make it easier for southern and western banks to obtain these emergency bank notes on commercial paper as security.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GLASS. I can not yield; my time is nearly expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I wanted to ask him if Mr. Cortelyou did not make that deposit of $42,000,000?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

AN UNPRECEDENTED PROPOSAL.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, answering my friend from South Carolina, I will say the Secretary of the Treasury, under the discretion which the law permits, has repeatedly deposited large amounts of Government funds in New York banks, as he has in other banks, at the required rate of interest, and subject to instant recall at any time. That is no unusual transaction. That is business prudence; but, Mr. Speaker, there is no case on record where the Secretary of the Treasury has issued bonds of the Government, thus taxing all the people to create a special fund, not for use of the Government, but for the purpose of depositing it in the banks of a given section of the country. [Applause.]

When public funds derived from taxes levied on the people accumulate in the vaults at the Treasury the fixed fiscal policy is to deposit these funds in national banks throughout the country at a specified rate of interest. The banks loan these funds, precisely as they loan their other deposits, to their customers, and thus the public funds are put back into the channels of trade until called in by the Treasury to defray the expenses of the Government. In making Government deposits the Treasury Department is given a wide discretion. It may be that deposits have not invariably been equitably made as required by law. It may be that, at times, deposits have been unwisely made. There have been criticisms of deposits made in New York with the expectation that they would enable the banks to allay or frustrate threatened panics. There have been criticisms of deposits made in the South and West to aid in "moving the crops."

But, Mr. Speaker, let us bear in mind that these deposits, wherever made or for whatever apparent purpose, were merely accumulated public funds, put in Government depositaries at interest in the ordinary process of business, to be withdrawn at any moment the Government should have need. There is not attached to these deposits any condition that they shall or shall not be loaned by the banks to anybody or any business concern, or any class of persons. The banks may themselves determine to whom these public funds will be loaned, at what rate of discount, upon what nature of collateral, and for what length of time. Why should it not be so? The banks are responsible to the Government for the return of these public funds on call. They give bond for their security, pay interest on the deposits, and, without charge, act as fiscal agents of the Government.

TAXING ALL THE PEOPLE FOR A SINGLE CLASS.

How vastly different is this transaction from that proposed by the amendment to this bill! There is not one particle of analogy; not the remotest resemblance. It is not provided by this amendment that public funds already derived from taxation shall be deposited equitably in the banks of the various States, at interest and subject to call, to be loaned to business men generally, or upon agricultural products without discrimination, or in commercial or industrial transactions without partiality, at the option of the banks receiving the deposits and upon security satisfactory to the banks holding the deposits. Not at all. None of these things is provided. The accumulated Government funds amounting to $74,000,000 are already deposited with the banks, $27,000,000 in southern banks.

THE GOVERNMENT LACKS FUNDS.

Beyond this $74,000,000 now on deposit with banks throughout the country the Government has no public funds which it may conveniently deposit with banks to be loaned to the cotton or tobacco growers, or to anybody. So far from it, the Government, owing to failing customs revenues, is actually in need of funds to defray its own expenses. That is precisely why the President came to Congress not long ago and recommended that $100,000,000 be raised by taxing the people. That is exactly why Congress is at this moment engaged in passing a tax bill. That is the reason that loud protests are heard from all sections of the country against raising even $100,000,000 of revenue urgently required to pay the running expenses of the Government itself. This outcry which we hear is against raising $100,000,000 which the Government directly needs. How swift would be our condemnation should we further tax the people to raise $250,000,000 more that the Government does not need!

I experience no difficulty, Mr. Speaker, in detecting a wide difference between this ordinary fiscal policy of the Government in thus depositing in banks, at interest, its momentarily idle funds, raised and held to pay the Government's current expenses, and this other proposed congressional policy of taxing the American people for the avowed purpose of raising an enormous fund, not needed by the Government nor to be used for the Government, but to be put in banks subject to the credit demands of a single class of citizens, to assure a profitable price for a certain product.

If, instead of $74,000,000 of temporarily idle funds now on deposit in banks at interest and subject to instant call, the Government had an additional $250,000,000, raised for legitimate expenses of Government and awaiting use for such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury might be justified in stretching his discretionary power under the law to the extent of depositing a major part of such funds in banks of the South, at interest and on call, to relieve a situation fraught with immediate distress to that section and ultimate disturbance of business in the entire country. But the Government has no such idle fund; for its own purposes the Government does not need any such fund, and Congress has no right to tax the people in order to obtain it.

A MARKET, NOT CURRENCY, NEEDED.

I can not too often emphasize the fact that nothing like this was ever done by the Government or ever should be undertaken. It is the rankest kind of paternalism; and, even should we attempt it, the scheme could never be consummated. What the cotton grower and tobacco planter need, Mr. Speaker, is a market for their product and not additional currency facilities. Yet this amendment is merely another currency scheme. As I have repeatedly said, southern banks have in hand, or can easily obtain, millions of additional currency. There is no lack of currency. What the cotton growers and tobacco planters require is credit pending a readjustment of market conditions in order that they may not be forced to sacrifice their product by selling at ruinous prices. This fact was cogently presented at the hearing on the Henry bill by Mr. A. F. Thomas, of Virginia, who broadly declared that there was no lack of funds, but a lack of market; yet there is not a line in this Hardwick-Henry amendment that would compel the banks receiving the Government deposits to extend credit to the cotton growers or tobacco planters of the South until they can get a market for their products—the very thing they most need.

AN IMPRACTICABLE SCHEME.

Under this amendment, if passed, not a dollar of this currency would ever get in circulation. Could it be expected that banks, State or National, would constitute themselves agencies for the receipt of Government funds to be loaned in competition with themselves, at 2 per cent net profit, when these same banks are deriving from 6 to 10 per cent net profit from loaning their own available funds? There is not a sane banker, as I view it, who would accept these deposits on the terms prescribed in this amendment. But suppose the Government were to issue $250,000,000 of Panama bonds at 4 per cent, do you imagine that the shrewd bankers of the East, or of any section, would take out of their current funds $250,000,000 of gold to engage in a 4 per cent investment when they are now loaning that money out at 6 per cent on call and 8 per cent upon quick-time commercial paper? It would never be done on earth. The bonds could not at this time for this purpose be sold. But assume that they could. Argue that thrifty, acquisitive bankers would be unbusinesslike and unwise enough to engage in a transaction of that sort. What would it mean for the country? It would mean taking $250,000,000 of gold—reserve money—out of the banks, thereby contracting the commercial credits of the country nearly $1,000,000,000.

Would that help the general situation? Would it improve conditions in the South? Suppose southern banks should buy the $250,000,000 of bonds. What would that mean? It would mean that they would have to call in nearly a billion dollars of their commercial credits, their outstanding loans of to-day; so that if we were to be unsound enough to take this Hardwick-Henry amendment as a cure of the unhappy situation it not only would not relieve conditions, but would intensify the prevailing distress.

THE SOUTH NOT FOR IT.

Mr. Speaker, I deny the repeated assertion that "thirty millions of southern people" are demanding this utterly unsound and, as I conceive, dangerous scheme. If that were true, is it not rather singular that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives has not received a telegram or a letter from a National or a State bank in all the South asking that this sort of legislation be embarked upon?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How long, if the gentleman can state, would it require the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to print these notes?

Mr. GLASS. I am coming to that. I was at the Treasury Department this morning and, upon information derived from trusted and experienced public officials, am prepared to assert that, should we adopt this amendment, conceding it to be a sound measure, embracing in its provisions genuine aid for the distressed cotton planters and tobacco growers of the South, it would take longer to engrave and print the bonds or notes, to sell the bonds, to organize the mechanism for the deposit requirements under such rules and regulations as a judicious Secretary of the Treasury might put in force than will be required to fully organize the Federal reserve banking system, under which the planters may obtain a greater abundance of currency, larger and more extended credit facilities, without endangering the financial fabric of the country. [Applause.]

NO DEMAND FOR UNIQUE SCHEMES.

Mr. Speaker, when the Federal reserve bill was pending before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House I received thousands of letters from all parts of the country favoring or opposing various features of the measure. These letters came from all classes of citizens. When the rural credits matter was being considered by the committee hundreds of letters poured in, making suggestions or voicing criticisms. But, I repeat to the House the very significant fact that not a single bank in the South, National or State, so far as I have personal knowledge, has asked for this sort of legislation, which gentlemen insist is demanded in behalf of 30,000,000 people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Read the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and revise them in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] ought to be recognized. He is the proponent of this measure.

Mr. MANN. The bill has not been read.

The SPEAKER. That is what they are starting in to do.

Mr. MANN. They have not started yet. Nobody has been recognized yet.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act approved May 30, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the national banking laws," as heretofore amended in an act approved August 4, 1914, is hereby further amended so that the words "that no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 30 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus" is amended to read as follows: "That no national banking association shall be authorized in any event to issue circulating notes based on commercial paper in excess of 75 per cent of its unimpaired capital and surplus."

SEC. 2. That the provisions and benefits of the act approved May 30, 1908, known as the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, and the amendments thereto, are hereby extended to all State banks and trust companies having a capital stock of not less than $25,000 and a surplus of 20 per cent. Said banks and trust companies shall be required to pay upon notes so issued the tax provided for in said act as amended, and said notes shall not be subject to the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes." The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing provision.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend, page 2, lines 4 and 5, by striking out the word "seventy-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred."

Amend, page 2, by striking out section 2, embracing lines 2 to 21, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 5202, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to contingent liabilities incurred by national banking associations by reason of membership in currency associations organized under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, as amended."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order upon the last committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MANN. The point of order is that the last committee amendment is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that it shall be in order for the House to consider——

Mr. MANN. I am not referring to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. I am talking about the amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has just been reported to the House.

Mr. BULKLEY. Which amendment?

Mr. MANN. Section 2. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. BULKLEY. The purpose of it is to permit the banks, on joining these currency associations, to incur the contingent liability without coming within the inhibition of section 5202.

Mr. MANN. That does not mean anything to me yet.

Mr. BULKLEY. What is it that the gentleman does not understand? Shall I read section 5202?

Mr. MANN. I do not remember whether I looked this up or not.

Mr. BULKLEY. Section 5202 of the Revised Statutes provides:

SEC. 5202. No association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished, by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

First. Notes of circulation.

Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association or due thereto.

Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserved profits.

To that we have added by the Federal reserve act——

Mr. MANN. I recall the matter now.

Mr. BULKLEY. The situation is that when national banks join a currency association under the provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act they are required to assume a liability for all notes issued to that association.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. MANN. In the end the title of the bill will need to be amended. You have not proposed to amend the title.

Mr. BULKLEY. I should have no objection to amending the title. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order to vote on the committee amendments before debate on the other amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think so.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the committee amendments are now before the House.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then I ask for a vote on the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first committee amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first committee amendment be read. A good many of us do not recognize it by that designation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in lines 4 and 5, strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred."

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division. We had a division started once before.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 40.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, strike out section 2, from lines 7 to 21, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The new section 2 is printed in italics as an amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section:

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 5202, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to contingent liabilities incurred by national banking associations by reason of membership in currency associations organized under the provisions of the act of May 30, 1908, as amended."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I measure my words, and I believe I understate rather than overstate the case, when I say to the House that the South at this moment faces the most critical period in her economic history since the late Civil War ended.

Consider, gentlemen, for just a moment the situation that confronts us. This year we have produced a large crop of cotton, probably 15,000,000 bales, yet even this large crop seemed hardly large enough under normal conditions to supply a rapidly increasing consumption that year after year demanded more and more of this staple.

Into the making of this crop the South has poured practically all of her liquid assets and has borrowed large sums of money, to be repaid when it was sold. Its production represents the huge outlay of $800,000,000, and throughout the great southern section of our country credits were universally extended and adjusted on the basis of its easy and prompt convertibility into cash at a price that represented a reasonable profit above its cost of production. More than that, in order to produce it the South bought largely, and on credit, from other sections of the country—mules and horses, corn and meat from the West, money from New York and the East, and every kind and variety of merchandise and manufactured product from every section of the country.

The time for paying these debts and for realizing on this crop was at hand, when suddenly, like a bolt of lightening from a clear sky, this tremendous war in Europe broke out, stopping the commerce, disarranging the exchanges, and disjointing the finances of the world.

To disturbances of this kind and from this quarter cotton is peculiarly amenable, because 60 per cent of it is exported for foreign manufacture. In 1913 Germany consumed 1,256,000 bales of our cotton; France, 786,000 bales; Belgium, 171,000 bales; and Austria-Hungary, 626,000 bales. These countries, with the total consumption in 1913 of nearly 4,000,000 bales and an expected consumption in 1914 of fully 4,500,000 bales, were eliminated for the time being as consumers of our cotton. Also, in England, which had in 1913 consumed 3,281,000 bales of our cotton and was expected to consume almost if not fully 4,000,000 bales in 1914, soon developed into an indifferent customer, taking only small amounts of our cotton—practically none in proportion to the real needs of her commerce and to the actual requirements of her mills. Of course, to some extent the English attitude may be attributed to the war; but the real key to that attitude was candidly and accurately expressed in a recent interview to the Washington Post by Sir George Paish, an agent of the British exchequer, sent to this country to consult our Government upon the trade and fiscal affairs of the two countries, who said that English spinners are not taking cotton because they were not sure it had arrived "at a bottom price."

Nor has the same motive failed to control and affect the attitude of our American spinners. With the large crop made and with more than 4,000,000 bales of the expected demand for it practically eliminated from the market, spinners everywhere seem to have adopted a policy of "watchful waiting" for cotton to reach "a bottom price."

In the meantime the cotton producer, anxious to meet his obligations, has found the market—where he could find one at all—that was constantly and rapidly declining, and the price steadily growing lower and lower, until to-day he can hardly get 6 cents for his cotton the South over.

This is fully 4 cents per pound under its cost of production, and if it be accepted it means that the year's work of the farmer shall be entirely without compensation, and that he shall also lose $20 per bale on every bale of cotton that he has produced. This means a loss in the State of Georgia alone of between fifty and sixty millions of dollars, and a loss in the entire South of fully $300,000,000, besides a loss of a profit that we had every reason to figure at fully $200,000,000 above the cost of producing the crop; in other words, it means a total loss to the South of the enormous sum of fully $500,000,000. More than that, there is not only a possibility but a probability that the price may sink still lower and the loss be still greater unless prompt and adequate relief be afforded by some agency powerful enough to cope with the situation.

Mr. Speaker, I can not believe that the Members of the House from States and sections that do not produce cotton can fully comprehend the gravity of the situation. I do not believe that they realize the full extent of the danger that now confronts us and will in the end touch them. If they understood it fully, or if we could possibly make them understand it fully, I can not but believe that self-interest, to say nothing of generous impulses, would prompt them to aid us in the solution of this great problem, that is not sectional, although its present location is in the South, but is thoroughly national in its character, and will be Nation wide in its ultimate and terrific effects unless the dangers that confront us can be met and sane aid of some character can be extended.

Do we owe debts to Great Britain and European countries that must be paid? And does the bare fear that gold may be demanded for these debts and sought, at any price, for American stocks and bonds held in foreign lands terrify our financiers and close our stock exchanges? If so, can we discharge more or less of those debts and buy more or less of those stocks and bonds by selling to Great Britain and other foreign countries 10,000,000 bales of cotton at 12 cents a pound or by selling them 10,000,000 bales of cotton at 6 cents per pound? Can agriculture languish and fail at the South, demoralizing and crippling every form of southern industry and commerce, and leave the other parts of this country, from which the South buys liberally and to which it owes largely, untouched and uninjured? If so, new principles in economics will be established and old doctrines discarded. Sir, if the South be ruined or crippled, you may rest assured that the balance of the Republic can not and will not go unscathed. Our peril is your peril and our danger is your danger. True, our people may be the first victims from such a catastrophe, but in the end the entire country must and will suffer unless a remedy be devised and applied.

Mr. Speaker, the people whom I represent on this floor are a brave and self-reliant people; they are proud and self-respecting; they are devoted to principle, and because of their devotion to it they have once already in the history of this country walked through the valley of the shadow of death and drunk of the very dregs of the cup of despair. Even in this hour of trouble and distress they do not, if I understand them aright and represent them correctly, come to you asking alms or beseeching charity. They are not asking you to tread in new and untried paths or to embark on new and dangerous experiments in government in order to relieve their distress.

As I endeavored to point out to you on yesterday, when I closed the debate in favor of the special rule which provides for a consideration of this bill and amendment, the proposition that we present is not in any important particular either new in theory or untried in practice. So far as those provisions of the amendment that direct the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $250,000,000 of the public funds in the National and State banks of this distressed portion of our country in order to relieve the needs of these farmers is concerned, the proposition is not novel in theory or new in practice, for we have repeatedly done just that without the sanction of statute law but by Treasury policy alone. I called attention on yesterday to the relief of that character that had been afforded the banks of New York during the panic of 1907 by the Roosevelt administration. To some extent I believe the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] takes issue with me as to exactly what the Roosevelt administration did to aid the banks of New York in bringing that panic to an end. However much I regret to take issue with my friend from Virginia on a question of fact, yet I must again assert that the panic of 1907 was practically ended by the policy of the Roosevelt administration in depositing public funds in the New York banks. I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia and the country to the sworn testimony of Mr. Cortelyou, who was Secretary of the Treasury in 1907, delivered during the Money Trust investigation of 1912 before the gentleman's own committee—Banking and Currency. Mr. Cortelyou stated that at one time during the panic of 1907 the Treasury deposited more than $40,000,000 of the public funds in the New York banks on the express condition that it should be used in certain ways, and that at least $10,000,000 of it should be advanced by them to certain trust companies of New York that were on the brink of ruin and were not national depositories at all.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on yesterday complained that I had not correctly quoted or had misinterpreted the recent speech of the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Williams, at Cincinnati, in which speech Mr. Williams described in detail the aid that was hurried, even in advance of consultation with them, to the New York banks on August 2 of the present year. I certainly did not quote Mr. Williams's speech inaccurately, for I quoted his exact words and put them in the RECORD. I must confess that the only inference I could draw from the language employed by the Comptroller of the Currency was that the money "expressed" to New York was funds of the Government, and not emergency currency, especially since the visit of Secretary McAdoo to New York was made on August 2, two days before the passage of the act of August 4, amending and vitalizing the Vreeland-Aldrich bill.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], now or later, here or elsewhere, to deny another proposition I advanced on yesterday—that not 60 days ago the Treasury deposited in the National Park Bank, of New York, $400,000 and agreed, in substance and effect, to allow a previous deposit of $1,000,000 that had been made in that bank to remain there on condition that the National Park Bank would fund a loan for the State of Tennessee of $1,400,000.

I think I might cite one more instance of this kind, a recent one and one that occurred in the city of Washington. Early in the present administration, when the apparently imminent failure of the United States Trust Co. seemed to threaten the stability of banking conditions in Washington, the good offices of the Treasury were employed, if we may believe the current reports, through the deposits of the public moneys in depositories of the United States in Washington, on condition that local banking arrangements should be made to assist the Munsey Trust Co. in taking over the affairs of the United States Trust Co.

I do not wish, however, to be misunderstood, either by the House or the country, on this question. I am neither criticizing this administration nor that of Mr. Roosevelt's for making these deposits. They were probably necessary, as they were certainly efficient, in averting serious and ruinous panics in one or more instances at least.

Ever since this Government abandoned the Independent Treasury system it has always, in making deposits of the public funds, regardless of what party was in control, made such deposits in such localities and in such banks at such times and even on such terms and conditions as, in the opinion of the Treasury, would best promote the proper flow of commerce, the necessary equilibrium of the currency, and the easy transaction of the business of the country. In this way crop-moving and panic-preventing loans have been made, and not infrequently, as I have endeavored to point out, on conditions that were expressed or implied and on contracts that were strictly enforced by the Treasury. In most instances, at least, this policy has been most necessary and wise, its employment being dictated by the most unselfish motives of public interest and without the slightest suspicion of incorrect act or improper motive. Still the fact remains that ever since we left the Independent Treasury system we have adopted and followed this policy, and have not hesitated to make and shift deposits of public funds in such way as to avert panic and ruin, loss and inconvenience, whenever it threatened the commerce or industry of any city, State, or section of this great country.

True, these deposits have always been made, whether conditional or unconditional, by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to his view of the situation, and where conditions have been imposed these conditions, in like manner, have been made by Treasury policy rather than by the mandate of the Congress, but surely, gentlemen, the climax of bureaucracy has been reached if the contention is to be seriously advanced that the Congress of the United States, elected by the people, has not a far greater right to formulate this policy of the Government and to determine how and when and for what purpose the deposits of the public funds shall be made than has a mere bureau or department of the executive branch of the Government. I earnestly protest against the manifest injustice of attempting to label the proponents of this measure as "unsafe" or "radical" when we propose in this amendment no more than what the opponents of this amendment hail as wise and sound when the same thing is done by departmental policy, without the sanction of law.

Our first proposition, then, in this amendment is that by law we shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit $250,000,000 of the public funds in the National and State banks of the cotton and tobacco producing sections of this country, on condition that these banks shall loan these funds on reasonable terms, to be controlled by the Treasury Department, to the distressed producers of cotton and tobacco. The provision is further made that these deposits are not to be withdrawn from the banks in which they are made prior to December 31, 1915.

But, we are asked, where will you obtain the money with which to make these deposits? It seems to me that we provide a reasonable and safe way of doing so. We propose to issue for this purpose $250,000,000 of United States notes with all the legal qualities of the outstanding notes of the United States. If the objection be made that this is a step toward greenbackism, or that it smacks of that system, our answer is twofold. In the first place, we say that since this great world-wide war has swept most of the powerful European nations from a gold basis to a paper basis and is destined, if it continues long, to force them all upon a paper basis for many years to come, that it will probably be a most difficult undertaking to maintain this country upon a gold basis, with all the nations of the world using every endeavor to deplete our gold reserves; and that the exigencies of an international situation that we did not create and can not control may at any moment force us to somewhat relax the rigidity of our gold position. Already we have been forced to close our stock exchanges, so that American stocks and bonds held in foreign lands may not be dumped upon the market, demoralizing values and draining the country of its last penny of gold. Cotton has for many decades been largely instrumental in keeping our gold reserves intact and in bringing foreign gold to our shores. If it is to permanently lose its power to accomplish this great function, we may be utterly unable to maintain our present gold standard with the balance of the world upon a paper basis. But we do not care to forestall that question, nor do we unnecessarily rush to meet it. So far as the amendment we present is concerned, the issue is not raised, for while we propose to issue paper money, it is not irredeemable paper money, but, on the contrary, is to be redeemed in gold coin or its equivalent on January 1, 1916.

We are asked how will the Treasury then redeem these notes? We reply that the Secretary of the Treasury may call in every dollar of the deposits we propose and require the payment of the last penny of them at the Treasury in Washington on the 31st day of December, 1915, the day before the law requires the Treasury to redeem these notes. He will have every dollar of it in hand before the time to pay the notes shall come. It is true that the banks may not pay these deposits in actual gold or in gold certificates, but it must not be forgotten that they did not get actual gold or gold certificates when they received these deposits, and that if they repay them in any form of lawful money of the United States, as they must, then the transaction does not involve a single ounce of additional burden on the gold reserve or one single additional obligation on the Treasury, which, under its policy, is already pledged to the redemption of every form of outstanding currency in gold.

To secure the repayment of these deposits the Treasury Department would have not only the staple agricultural products that are pledged as security for the loans, but also the credit of each and every bank in which the deposits are made, with all the priority of liens established by law in favor of the United States upon all the assets of its depositories.

The notes of the United States so issued would bear 2 per cent interest from date. This is to compensate the holders of them for the inability to have them redeemed in gold prior to January 1, 1916, and this interest in turn will be made up to the Government by the 2 per cent interest each of its depositories must pay.

The banks in the South obtaining this money at the rate of 2 per cent per annum interest would be able to loan money to the producers of cotton at a lower rate of interest for any period of time up to 12 months upon their cotton as security, at a reasonable market valuation thereof. My judgment is the banks could make these loans at rates that might vary from 4 to 6 per cent per annum. This would enable the producer of cotton to hold his crop for a full year, if necessary, and this, in turn, would steady the market. By the early spring of 1915 the crop of 1915 will have been planted, and if it is curtailed to at least one-half of the production of this year, as I firmly believe both common sense and financial necessity will require and enforce, then I am confident that the price of cotton will then instantly and materially increase, and all who have been able to hold it up to that time will realize on it at a figure which at least equals the cost of its production, or possibly at a small profit.

The amendment I propose would, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, accomplish these results. It would mean relief and safety to 30,000,000 people who are now threatened with want and ruin; it would mean prosperity and happiness, sir, to a great section of our common country.

The situation in which we find ourselves, gentlemen, is in no manner the result of our fault, of our mistakes, or of our lack of caution; it comes from causes to which we did not contribute, from circumstances that we can not control, and from conditions that we could not foresee when we planted this crop. While we do not ask the largess of the Government or charity of any man, we do ask and we do demand that, so far as governmental policies may be shaped to aid us or may be framed to permit us to aid ourselves, they shall be so shaped and so framed, and that at least you shall grant to us by statute that kind and character of aid that this Government has so freely given, even without the sanction of statute, to other sections and to other industries and to other businesses of our common country when they were in sore distress as we are to-day. The deposits of Government funds have always been made to safeguard and promote the great business and commercial interests of this country, and we insist that in this hour of trouble at least that much be done for the South.

Mr. Speaker, the plea we present to-day is not one for mercy, but one for justice. Our demand is not that special privileges be accorded to us or to our people, but that equal treatment and equal rights be given to them and to us with what has already been given to other interests and to other sections.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

When I concluded my remarks a while ago, under general debate, I was citing to the House the fact that not a single bank in the South, National or State, as far as I have personal knowledge, has asked for this sort of legislation.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to produce one?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. Here is a telegram, which I will read, which came to me this morning.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I have a number of such others.

Mr. MURRAY. That telegram reads as follows:

HOLDENVILLE, OKLA., October 20, 1914.

Hon. WM. H. MURRAY, Washington, D. C.:

We are for the Henry measure. Stay with him until the South can get relief of some kind, if possible.

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK.
STATE NATIONAL BANK.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK.
FARMERS' STATE BANK.

Mr. GLASS. But the amendment under consideration is not anything like the Henry bill referred to in your telegram. The Henry measure proposes valorization of cotton—a fixed price for a single commodity at a specified rate of interest for the loan, with no responsibility on the banks and the ultimate risk with the Government, which means with the people, who own the Government—while this measure proposes to put the Government in debt to the extent of $250,000,000 for currency that is not required in the South; and, if required, could not as quickly be obtained as Federal reserve notes under the Federal reserve act. This currency is to be deposited in the banks on condition that the banks loan it to certain people, the banks being held responsible for its return to the Government. This is not the Henry bill, but a distinctly different proposition.

Mr. HENRY. Why do you not vote for this, then?

Mr. GLASS. I do not vote for everything that my friend from Texas does not offer. Other people can offer unsound things as well as the gentleman from Texas, and this is one of them. [Laughter.]

This amendment is utterly unlike any one of the seven or eight bills introduced by the gentleman from Texas. This is in fact a proposal to raise revenue by taxation and to deposit it in certain banks for certain specified purposes, upon certain terms. The Henry bills, especially H. R. 18916, to which the Oklahoma telegram evidently refers, is a proposition for the Government to guarantee the cotton crop, at a minimum price per pound, to the total extent of $500,000,000, with no ultimate responsibility attaching to the banks dispensing the funds as loans to the planters. That bill is not here. It was almost unanimously rejected by the Banking and Currency Committee. No bill akin to it has ever been reported to the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] was unable to get his own Committee on Rules, of which he is the distinguished chairman, to report a rule even for consideration of H. R. 19203, indorsed by the farmers' unions and by a conference of certain southern Members of the House. This is the Hardwick proposition, vastly less objectionable, I grant, than any of the other measures referred to and vastly less unique and dangerous as a precedent.

AN ALLEGED PRECEDENT.

Nevertheless, not only is it true, as I have stated, that no State or National bank in the South, as far as I can tell, favors this expedient, but it likewise is true that there is no precedent for the proposal. Statements to the contrary are based upon a failure to discriminate. The Comptroller of the Currency, as has been shown, states that the currency recently shipped by the Secretary of the Treasury to New York was not "the people's money." It was not money at all. It was $40,000,000 of Vreeland-Aldrich currency, for the use of which the New York banks had to pay a Government tax and against the redemption of which they had to provide a gold reserve. It was the same kind of currency that Texas banks or any national bank in the United States may get by applying for it under the law. Wherever Government deposits have been made they have been made in due process of business. They have been from current funds already on hand. Rather than keep them impounded in the Treasury or the subtreasury, idle and serving no good purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury, within the discretion allowed him by law, has simply deposited these funds at interest and on call, not to maintain the price of a single commodity nor for the benefit of a single section or class of people, but for the general commercial and financial interests of the whole country. Such deposits have never been made under a stipulation that the funds should be loaned to a particular class of citizens or for the advantage of a single industry or under a stipulation that the funds thus deposited should be loaned by the banks at a specified rate of interest, abnormally low.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. No; I have not the time to yield. It has been alleged that in the Roosevelt administration $150,000,000 of bonds and three-year certificates were sold "for the purpose of depositing the funds in the banks of Wall Street, to help the stock gamblers of that community." Nothing of the sort ever was done. Under Roosevelt's administration, in November, 1907, the President directed Secretary Cortelyou to issue $50,000,000 of Panama bonds and $100,000,000 of three-year certificates, a total of $150,000,000 of Government obligations for the avowed purpose, as set forth in the Treasury circular, of "meeting public expenditures without withdrawing for that purpose any appreciable amount of the public moneys now deposited in national banks throughout the country." The public funds so deposited amounted to $240,156,441.85, and were being used by the banks to "help move the crops"—the same purpose for which $74,000,000 of public funds are now deposited in banks throughout the country, $27,000,000 in southern banks. President Roosevelt simply did the thing that President Wilson proposed to this Congress, but in a little different way. President Wilson proposed to raise the money by direct taxation rather than by the issuance of bonds. In substance the two things are alike. President Roosevelt stated that the proceeds of his sale of bonds and certificates were to be used to meet current expenditures, to preserve the finances of the Government, and to avoid contraction of credits by withdrawal of funds already on deposit then being used—for what purpose? To hold crops? No; to "move crops." The efficiency of the method employed by President Wilson over that used by President Roosevelt may be understood when it is stated that the latter could sell but $15,000,000 of his bonds and but $20,000,000 of his certificates, a total of $35,000,000 out of the proposed aggregate of $150,000,000, whereas President Wilson is very apt to raise $110,000,000 by the method of direct taxation.

DENOUNCED BY PARTY PLATFORMS.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us admit that President Roosevelt and his Secretary of the Treasury actually deposited large sums of Government funds in New York City banks under agreement that it was to be used to "help out stock-gambling operations" rather than to arrest the ravages of a panic which threatened to engulf the Nation; and let us go further and concede that the public funds thus used were not raised in the ordinary process of taxation for Government purposes—which they distinctly were—but were raised by taxing the people for the especial advantage of Wall Street stock gamblers. What subsequently happened? Why, the Democratic Party, in two national platforms, bitterly reprehended the transaction and explicitly asserted that it should never be undertaken again. Democratic campaign speakers severely denounced it from every rostrum in the country as a vicious perversion of the proper functions of government.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] himself made this, among other transactions, the basis of his "money-trust" resolutions, subsequently denouncing it as a desperate use of "the people's money to affect the prices of staple products," as a corrupt and shameless "tapping of the Federal Treasury by the banks," and an illegitimate withdrawal of public funds from the uses for which they were raised. Shall we now proceed, Mr. Speaker, to do, in principle, precisely the thing, in an exceedingly accentuated form, that the Democratic Party denounced and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] vehemently decried? Has the gentleman so soon recovered from his passionate indignation? The Republican administration, in what it did, used idle public funds raised for Government requirements, but for which the Government at that moment had no need. Shall this Democratic administration take us even beyond this alleged Wall Street adventure by levying taxes on the people for the previously avowed purpose of putting the proceeds in the banks for the exclusive benefit of a particular class?

Does it help the affair to say the beneficiaries are from the South? Does it help to say the favored class is of the farming community? Once embark on this legislative policy and next time the suppliants will press Congress from every section where temporary distress happens to prevail. Next time the privileged class may be the stock gamblers again!—and next the copper or coal or zinc miners; then the grain growers and the orchardists, the railroads and the manufacturers, the thousands of the industrial idle, made so by paralysis of trade or by prolonged labor warfare. Once begun there is no end to this extraordinary and dangerous expedient of using the taxing power of Government to help depressed interests. It is a prelude to inestimable disaster.

SOUTHERN SELF-RELIANCE.

I wish I could think that I am mistaken. It is not agreeable to be so utterly out of accord with those of my southern colleagues, who are convinced that make-shift legislation of this unusual description is a remedy for threatened industrial distress in our section. But I was never surer of anything in my life, Mr. Speaker, than of the fact that to adopt this extraordinary scheme would inevitably prove a plague to those whom it is designed to benefit and a curse to the whole country. Moreover, I think gentlemen are, unwillingly I am sure, misinterpreting the temper and underrating the intelligence of the southern planters. I have here a typical letter from among those received by me bearing on this subject. It is from a North Carolinian.

RAYNHAM, N. C., October 16, 1914.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
Chairman Banking and Currency Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a man, directly concerned, allow me to commend your course in regard to the effort in behalf of the cotton growers of the South for aid from the Government. My home is deeply within the cotton belt, and my sole means of livelihood is derived from a farm located in a county which is classed as the leading cotton county of North Carolina. Like to most others, the low price for cotton is an especially hard blow to me this year, all the more from the fact that the seasons of last year were quite unfavorable in our section. But rather than see enacted the "relief" measures proposed by some of our Members of Congress, I had rather bide my time without selling a pound of tobacco, even if it means the sacrifice of a part of my land.

In making these demands for Government aid, not a few people seem to forget what is the province of political power. My conception may be crude, but it seems to me that a Government should regard the Nation as a unit in regulating the relations of its citizens to each other, and that when this is done, without partiality or usurpation, it serves its purpose well. However hard the condition of southern farmers, to pass an act for a special class would, I fear, establish a precedent which would not be long in making us sufferers from calamities which are not now ours. Within the short period since the Democratic Party came into power it has put on the statute books a series of reform measures rarely paralleled in the history of any country. We modestly ask, Shall it close this memorable session of Congress by bringing upon itself a charge of partiality?

That you may have reason for the sincerity of these statements, allow me to say that I am a Democrat. Against a Whig majority my grandfather was a candidate for the legislature in this county of Robeson nearly 100 years ago; and, so far as I am able to trace my political lineage, no Whig, Republican, or Populist vote has ever been cast by a member of our immediate family. We are a family of eight brothers, the youngest of whom is 47 years old, who now cast Democratic votes in three different States.

Again commending your course and thanking you for your zealous action in this and other important matters, allow me to subscribe myself as

Your obedient servant,

R. WALTER TOWNSEND.

I do not know Mr. Townsend. He refers me to my colleague [Mr. GODWIN] as to his identity; but, judging him by the tenor of his letter, he is that type of southern man which Henry Grady on a memorable occasion so eloquently extolled. At all events, whoever he may be, he but echoes the note of lofty self-reliance and energizing self-respect that characterizes every expression which has come to me in letters from the South.

CERTAIN AND FEASIBLE RELIEF.

It has been once or twice suggested here, Mr. Speaker, that if the remarkable proposals of the gentlemen from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the much less objectionable proposition of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] are to be set aside as unsound and inexpedient, some efficient and feasible remedy should be devised. My friend the minority leader [Mr. MANN] made this suggestion the other day. Mr. Speaker, my contention is that much has already been done to relieve the threatened distress in the South; much has been done to prevent a realization of the disaster which some gentlemen so gravely apprehend. The Federal reserve system, when fully organized, will infinitely help the situation; and if gentlemen will quit obstructing the passage of bills reported by the Banking and Currency Committee amending the Federal reserve act so as to facilitate organization of the system and amplify its powers of aid, we shall speedily afford real relief to the South.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair wishes to admonish Members about two or three rules to which they do not pay the slightest attention during exciting circumstances. No Member has a right to sit in his seat and inject remarks into what a Member who has the floor says. It is not fair, for half the time he does not catch the meaning of it. And another thing, if a gentleman wants to interrupt a gentleman who has the floor he ought to address the Chair and ask consent, and we will get along just as well——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Has the Reporter the right to take down the remarks of a Member under the circumstances indicated by the Chair, or only the right to take down the remarks of the gentleman who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. No; it is the business of the Reporter to take down whatever is said, and if the gentleman wants to have it stricken out it can be done under certain circumstances, if the House wishes to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of amendments to this pending amendment upon which I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 3, all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, by changing the semicolon in line 3, and inserting a period. Also to strike out the following, beginning in line 25, page 2, with the word "and," down to and including the word "issuance," on page 3, line —.

Amend, page 2, by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, the following words: "at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by Mr. HARDWICK, my colleague, under the special rule, reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and in State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, the sum of $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The said Secretary shall make such deposits under the terms of this act and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him to carry out this act. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the securities he is now authorized or required by law to exact of the banks in which the funds of the United States are deposited, is authorized and hereby directed to accept as security for the deposits directed to be made in this act cotton warehouse and tobacco warehouse receipts, where the cotton or tobacco thereby represented has been fully insured, at a valuation that represents the fair market value of the cotton or tobacco covered by such receipts. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same, under reasonable terms and conditions, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or the owners of lands upon which same was produced during the year 1914, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the terms and conditions under which these deposits shall be loaned by the banks that accept the same.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and said notes shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from the date of their issuance and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States or its equivalent on January 1, 1916; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not require the repayment of any deposit made under the provisions of this act prior to December 31, 1915.

SEC. 6. That when the deposits herein authorized are called in by the Secretary of the Treasury the same shall be and become a part of a special fund, to be kept and held separate and apart from the general funds of the Government, for the redemption and retirement at maturity of the Panama Canal bonds in such cases and to such extent as the proceeds of such bonds have been used to make the deposits herein provided.

If the amendments I have offered are adopted, then the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. HARDWICK] will read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and in State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, the sum of $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The said Secretary shall make such deposits under the terms of this act and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him to carry out this act. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the securities he is now authorized or required by law to exact of the banks in which the funds of the United States are deposited, is authorized and hereby directed to accept as security for the deposits directed to be made in this act cotton warehouse and tobacco warehouse receipts, where the cotton or tobacco thereby represented has been fully insured, at a valuation that represents the fair market value of the cotton or tobacco covered by such receipts. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same, under reasonable terms and conditions, to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or the owners of lands upon which the same was produced during the year 1914, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the terms and conditions under which these deposits shall be loaned by the banks that accept the same.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States or its equivalent on January 1, 1916.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not require the repayment of any deposit made under the provisions of this act prior to December 31, 1915.

By this means we will supply $250,000,000 of additional currency to the banks located in the cotton and tobacco producing States, to be loaned under reasonable terms and conditions, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the producers of cotton or tobacco or to the owners of the land upon which these products were produced during the year 1914.

The amendments I propose dispense with the issue of the Panama bonds at 4 per cent, strike out the provision that the notes issued by the Government shall bear 2 per cent, and also the requirement that the loans made by the banks shall bear only 4 per cent per annum. I am glad of the opportunity to support some reasonable, practical measure that will somewhat relieve the situation in the cotton-growing States which exists by reason of the war now being waged in European countries.

The fact that 65 per cent of our raw cotton must be exported, and that all foreign markets are virtually closed, has brought about the situation now prevailing in this country, when we have absolutely no market for our cotton, and when the price for that reason has fallen below the cost of production. But even under this stress of dire circumstances, when our chief money crop is almost valueless, the South is not a beggar for charity or alms. For one I am not here to advocate any measure that has the semblance or color of asking for charity at the hands of the General Government for the people of the South; nor do I ask any special privileges for them. I simply insist that this Government shall exercise that supreme governmental function—to issue sufficient currency to answer the demands of our people. This is the duty of the Government and should be exercised whenever the needs of the people require it.

The plan now being considered is based upon sound Democratic principle and equally sound financial policy. The proposition, if the amendments I propose are agreed to, simply provides for the issue of a limited amount of Treasury notes, redeemable in gold within a short period of time; these notes, having all the qualities of existing Treasury notes, to be deposited in the banks and loaned upon cotton notes secured by warehouse receipts. There could be and is no better security to be obtained, and there will be no danger of any loss to the Government or the banks. For one, believing that Congress has the power to issue these notes, and that it can direct in what manner the deposits of public funds shall be used, I shall support the proposition.

On other occasions the Secretary of the Treasury has deposited the public funds and directed the manner in which the banks—the depositaries—should use them, and this emergency fully justifies such action in the case of the cotton producers, because should bankruptcy come to them, it would not only affect that particular section but would be a calamity nation-wide in its scope.

Cotton is the largest and most valuable asset we have to produce and maintain our international credit and for many years past has produced and sustained the balance of trade in favor of the United States. During the last year the sales abroad amounted to $610,000,000, and this large sum maintained the balance of trade in our favor; without it we would have had no balance of trade in our favor. In such an emergency, affecting as it does our entire country and involving the welfare not only of the cotton-producing States but of almost every section and the country as a whole, surely it is a reasonable demand to invoke the power of the General Government to discharge one of its sovereign functions—to issue in such an emergency sufficient currency to meet the necessities of the people.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the amendment I propose strikes from this bill the issuance of Panama bonds, also that provision that the notes issued shall bear 2 per cent. I also propose to strike from the bill that provision that the money shall be loaned at 4 per cent. I have not the time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this amendment or the purposes of it. I have not the time to make an argument or the speech I would desire to make if I had that time about this proposition to meet the condition of affairs now prevailing in the cotton-producing States; but I have submitted a proposition in which a Democrat ought to believe, and that is that it is the highest duty of this Government at all times, and especially in times of emergency, to furnish the people with a sufficient currency to do the business of those people. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that I violate the doctrines of the Democratic Party or of sound financial policy when I say that this Government should now in this emergency issue $250,000,000 of Treasury notes, to be paid in gold one year from now, to be used by being deposited in the banks of the South, to be loaned to the raisers of cotton during this great emergency that has arisen by reason of the withdrawal of the foreign markets, in order that not only the South but the country itself be saved from impending panic. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we should sell bonds now in order to procure money to make these deposits. One reason is when you are selling bonds you are obliged to deplete the volume of currency in one section to transfer to the other, whereas by the issue of notes you do not diminish the volume of currency in any section, but you add to it, and a note issue by the Government of $250,000,000 is just as sound and safe as Panama bonds, with 4 per cent interest, and will answer every purpose and can be met at maturity just as promptly. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the only proposition that has been presented to this Congress that I have found myself able to support. I have no political purpose to serve. I am not endeavoring to do anything except to do something in this unusual and unlooked-for emergency, to aid our cotton producers to tide them over in such a crisis, for which they are in no wise responsible. I repeat, it is the highest duty of the Government to furnish to the people a currency sufficient to meet the demands of those people in a time of great emergency like this. I am not supporting, nor will I support, a proposition directing the purchase of cotton by the Government or the lending of money on cotton directly to the cotton farmer; this is not the function of government in any event. I am simply advocating the proposition that the highest duty of the Government is to furnish to its people a sufficient currency in order to transact the business of the country at all times, and especially to transact the business in a time of emergency, and by such means to save them from panic and ruin.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. Speaker, one thing I want to say before I close, and I know it to be a fact from evidence brought out in the investigation of the Steel Corporation, that in 1907 the Secretary of the Treasury not only deposited $42,000,000 of the Government's money at one time in the banks of New York, in order to save from panic and bankruptcy a lot of stock gamblers, but also to enable certain favored bankers and trust magnates to violate the antitrust laws of the United States and to enable the Steel Corporation to purchase the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., its only competitor, and a former President boasted that by such action he not only saved Moore & Schley, stock brokers, from bankruptcy, but stopped the panic of 1907, which was a "bankers' panic." We seek by this legislation to save millions of honest men who produce the chief asset in the Nation's prosperity from bankruptcy and financial ruin, and surely they are more entitled to our consideration and favor than those who in 1907 brought upon the country a financial panic by overtrading and gambling in the stocks of the country.

We seek nothing as charity. We simply insist that the Government come to our relief in a sound and reasonable way. The Manufacturers' Record published a few days ago the following, which I indorse:

SOUTH NOT A BEGGAR—VAST RESOURCES ONLY NEED TO BE DIRECTED ON CONSERVATIVE LINES.

The South is not a beggar. It does not need to beg and it can take care of itself, or, if it can not do so, then the sooner its people learn that fact and bring in others who can take care of themselves in such a heaven-favored land the better it will be.

No other country on the face of the earth has so many advantages as the South. No other country upon which the sun shines is so rich in resources. No other country is so well equipped by nature to produce the foodstuffs of grain and provisions and vegetables and fruits for man's sustenance, and no other country is so rich in mineral and timber and water-power resources so susceptible of development.

If in such a land as this, where the farmers for the five years preceding the present crop received an average of largely over 12 cents a pound for their cotton, yielding very large profits, one year's complete failure of the cotton crop, or one year's inability, as at present, to sell the cotton crop, brings about such a condition as to flood the land with plasters begging for charity to "help the South," then it is time for the people of this section who have backbone and stamina to take the lead and try to stem the current.

The South of olden days did not do so. The South blasted by a four years' war never asked for charity, and never in those days was the country plastered with appeals to "help the South." In the 10-year period between 1892 and 1901, when cotton sold at from 4 to 5 and 6 to 7 cents a pound in different years, the South suffered much, but it endured the situation and fought its fight without any such appeals as are now being made by politicians and others who are trying to make the South believe that it ought to be a beggar and the world believe that it is a beggar.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment in the nature of a substitute that would not be in order if any other amendments are to be offered until they are offered. I would like to have it reported and have it pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma has a substitute for this whole amendment, and he asks to have it reported and have it pending. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does this come out of the time?

The SPEAKER. It does not come out of the time. In keeping the time on this debate, the time for the reading of the amendments is not taken out. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act and under the terms and conditions herein prescribed, to be loaned by said banks to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or owners of lands upon which the same was produced during the year 1914, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum. The deposits herein authorized shall be advanced upon the terms prescribed in this act and under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton and pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make and enforce rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith for carrying out the purposes of this act. Said Secretary of the Treasury may fix the compensation for the banks for their services in lending said sums of money.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000: Provided, That such United States notes, should the Secretary of the Treasury conclude to issue them, deposited under this act and not used as prescribed herein, shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be destroyed.

"SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

"SEC. 5. That this act shall expire by limitation on the 31st day of December, 1915."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, when I introduced that I thought it referred to a bill, but I find it refers to an amendment to the proposed bill S. 6398, and I offer it as a substitute to that proposed amendment rather than to strike out all after the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. You offer it as read?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] reserves the point of order, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the House——

Mr. MURRAY. How did the gentleman from Texas get the floor when I wanted to discuss the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma was not recognized to discuss it. You were recognized to offer it and have it ready for information. Your time on the amendment will come later. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there are a few facts that have come to light in the last debate about which this House should have information. The gentleman speaks of the abundance of currency that has been placed in the New York banks and has been sent to the South. Let me say to him that this plan which was originated by Mr. Wade, of St. Louis, will be a failure, because the banks of the South are not able to contribute to the pool. All the national banks in the city of Waco, my home town, a day or two ago met and found they could not advance one dollar to this pool, because they had already loaned $2,000,000, and naturally they did not have the resources to meet the requirements.

And to-day occurs the following statement in the New York Sun:

BANKS MAY NOT JOIN IN BIG COTTON POOL—SUGGEST THAT SOUTH COULD USE $170,000,000 EMERGENCY CASH IN PINCH.

There is a growing feeling among New York bankers that the plan for the $150,000,000 cotton pool, as proposed by Festus J. Wade, of St. Louis, may not go through without considerable modification or until some other scheme has been tried. Prominent bankers here are inclined to look upon the cry for assistance from the southern banks as rather unfair and unnecessary in view of the financial problems which New York is facing, and the fact that the South has just gone through three or four years of great prosperity. They believe that the South should first try to help itself and meet its problems the way that New York City did the matter of its foreign indebtedness without seeking aid of other sections of the country.

Suggestions are said to have been made to the members of the Federal Reserve Board, Secretary McAdoo, and the southern banks that the banks avail themselves of their right to take out emergency currency and use that for the relief of the cotton problem. It is pointed out that the South has taken out only about $40,000,000 in emergency currency, while it is entitled to take out something like $170,000,000. This amount, if taken out by the southern banks, would be sufficient, in the opinion of New York financial authorities, to meet all the needs of the occasion.

Mr. Speaker, as outlined in the New York Sun, they are cramped, and although the vaults of the New York banks have been glutted with more than $140,000,000 of the people's money sent from the Treasury of the United States to supply their needs, they are not willing to contribute to that pool.

Mr. Speaker, I am grieved that my friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] can not follow us this day. Let me remind him that we include in this bill tobacco, which is distressed as well as cotton, and let me say to him that while this Government has deposited funds to relieve the distress of New York and Tennessee and of other States in this country, it ought to deposit public funds to relieve the distress of his own people in Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. Just one moment.

Mr. GLASS. Just to put in the RECORD this statement: That the putting of tobacco in this bill at the twelfth hour shall not be permitted to compromise my intellectual integrity for the purpose of bringing me back to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, in 1907—and it can not be stated too often in this debate—public funds in four days to the extent of $43,000,000 were expressed to New York City and placed in the hands of J. Pierpont Morgan, who was not an officer in any banking institution or trust company, who was not a director in a single national bank or trust company, and he distributed the people's money amongst the banks of New York City—his favorites—and deposited $10,000,000 of the people's money in the trust company at the head of which was Oakley Thorne. Here we are proposing things in line with the same thing that was done then. We are proposing things in line with what Mr. Williams—the other Virginian—said at Indianapolis recently, that which they had done in regard to the New York banks, that they had sent $40,000,000 by express as fast as the train could carry that amount of money, of public funds out of the Treasury of the United States, in order to relieve the distress of the banks of New York City. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] reminds us that the amendment covers both cotton and tobacco. I am willing to make a present to anybody in the House who can tell what this language means:

The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during 1913.

Is the bale of cotton to be offset against a pound of tobacco or a pound of tobacco offset against a bale of cotton? Since when did a pound of tobacco become worth as much as a bale of cotton?

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN. No; I will not yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought you wanted an answer.

Mr. MANN. If I had time I would be glad to yield. That is what the bill says. It directs the apportionment, not so much for cotton and so much for tobacco, but $250,000,000 for cotton and tobacco, according to the number of bales of cotton and pounds of tobacco. Wisconsin, under that, would get more money for tobacco than Georgia will for cotton. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the distinguished author of the amendment, said there was provision made for repaying these notes that it is proposed to issue. The bill distinctly provides that the deposits made in the banks shall not be withdrawn before the 31st day of December, 1915, and then it innocently provides that they shall be paid—the notes outstanding shall be paid—on the 1st day of January, 1916. That is pretty rapid movement, to withdraw $250,000,000 from the southern banks on the last day of December and pay it all out on the 1st day of January. It is absolutely absurd and impossible.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MANN. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that we shall find a way for cotton. But, after all, remember that while we are not able now to sell cotton, we are not likewise able to buy the bonds and stocks which Europe threatens to put upon us, which they now own. The difficulty in the one case is no greater than the difficulty in the other. The real paralysis to-day in the financial world comes from the fact that on the other side of the Atlantic they own in the neighborhood, it is said, of $3,000,000,000 of our stocks and bonds——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Five billion dollars' worth.

Mr. MANN. They need the money. They propose, it is said, to dump them on our shores, and the financial world is to-day straining its back, endeavoring to be ready to take those stocks and bonds at some price, because if they are all dumped upon us, and no one is ready to take them, universal bankruptcy in our country follows as an inevitable consequence. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CORRECTION OF ERROR IN A PENSION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The other day the House passed House joint resolution 361, an omnibus resolution, making corrections in pension bills, and sent it over to the Senate. Then, after that, the House passed joint resolution 375, which contained one of the items that was in the House joint resolution 361. So, unless there is objection, the House will ask the Senate to return House joint resolution 375. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the substitute I offered was prepared by a committee representing one from each cotton and tobacco State, and was ratified by a conference of southern Congressmen, which in its organization has 83 members, and there were 62 members present when this bill was adopted. I feel that I ought, as chairman of that conference, to offer it for the conference, and for the further reason that it will meet the conditions better than the provision offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

I am not opposed to the provision offered by the gentleman from Georgia. I will vote for it, and for the next best thing, and any other thing or all things that will meet this situation. I would vote, certainly, just as quickly to provide for a loan to the cotton grower as I would to appropriate money to San Francisco or Salem as an absolute gift.

The only objection I have to the provision offered by the gentleman from Georgia is this: It makes the banks liable, and therefore in this condition they can not afford to make the loans, and will not make the loans.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MURRAY. Just in a moment I will. They can not tell, in view of their depositors, how long they must hold this cotton; and the first duty of every banker is the protection of his depositors. The Government is the only power that can come to the rescue of the southern cotton farmers, just as the Government was the only power that could take the place of the insurance companies that insured merchant ships against war risks. The insurance companies could not do it, and the Government wisely came to their rescue. And that is unprecedented. Now, the Government is the only power. The banks can not do it, and the Government ought to do it.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if there is any provision of this proposed amendment that requires the banks to loan Government funds at 4 per cent, when they are already receiving 6 and 7 per cent?

Mr. MURRAY. Under the one I offered?

Mr. GLASS. No; under the Hardwick amendment. Is there any provision under this amendment that requires banks to make these loans?

Mr. MURRAY. No, sir.

Mr. GLASS. Then I will ask the gentleman if he thinks it at all probable that these banks will receive Government funds and use them in competition with their own funds at 4 per cent?

Mr. MURRAY. The selfish banker will not do it. The unselfish banker will do it. I feel that 90 per cent of the bankers in my district will do it, because they are willing for any kind of aid. They know that there is nothing in the Vreeland-Aldrich Currency Act. They know there is nothing under the regional reserve system. That system was intended to make the farmer give up his crop. It was written for that purpose, and not to enable him to hold it for any kind of price. [Applause.] And there is not any remedy for that.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia speaks of inflation. It is a question of what you mean by inflation. If you mean that your money is equal to any other dollar, then there is no inflation in it. If increase of money means inflation, then of course it does; and I apprehend the gentleman from Virginia means that, because he stated the other day to the bankers that there would not be inflation when we had dollar for dollar in gold behind the $360,000,000 of currency.

Why, there is no inflation to-day when you consider one dollar equal to every other dollar, and I do not see how, from that point of view, that could be made a charge against this. In fact, the gentleman knows that it is not, unless he means an increase of currency means inflation. There is no danger in an increase of currency when it will all be equal to the gold dollar. It is true we have more money to-day than we ever had, but for many years France had $55 per capita, and that was their prosperous period.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I will vote for this so-called cotton amendment to this pending Senate bill, as it gives us the only opportunity we will have in the House to vote for anything calculated to relieve the situation now existing in the South, but I hope when the bill goes back to the Senate that this amendment will be so amended in the Senate as to provide for legislation similar to what is known as the Smith amendment to the war-revenue bill, when that measure was before the Senate.

Speaking for myself, I favor the proposition for the Government to issue small denomination bonds bearing 4 per cent interest, to be given in exchange for cotton at par, at a price not to exceed 10 cents per pound, middling basis, in sufficient amount to take over 5,000,000 bales of this year's growth of cotton, and to hold same for two years, unless it can sooner be sold at a price that would fully reimburse the Government for the bonds, accrued interest, all costs and expenses incurred in purchasing, carrying, and disposing of the cotton. But should a loss of any amount finally result to the Government, the same to be recouped by a tax of not exceeding one-half a cent per pound to be levied on all cotton hereafter grown, grading middling or better, until such loss is fully paid.

A law of this kind will immediately steady the market in all countries, and not another bale of cotton would be offered or sold at less than 10 cents a pound, and I doubt that a single bale would be offered to the Government. The moment that it was known the world over that our Government would take 5,000,000 bales at 10 cents a pound of this year's growth and hold it for two years, every man who has a drop of speculative blood in him would be willing and anxious to take a chance on a few bales of cotton at 10 cents, when he knows that the price will not decline for two years and that in all human probability he will make a good profit on his investment.

The banks would not hesitate to lend money on cotton at a much higher valuation and at a lower rate of interest than they will in the absence of such a law. I thing such a proposition far preferable to the Government issuing legal-tender Treasury notes, redeemable in gold on demand, and depositing same with the banks to be loaned out to the holders of cotton at such a rate of interest as the banks may see proper to demand and at a valuation to be fixed by themselves. The bond-issue plan would not tend to the inflation of the currency nor lead to the indefinite sale of Government bonds with which to replenish the gold-redemption fund in the Treasury. Such a plan would enable the cotton industry to take care of itself without any tax burden on any other industry. I see nothing in the Constitution that prohibits such a transaction. It involves no greater governmental power than was exercised in the purchase of silver bullion and involves the Government in no ultimate loss, as did the silver-purchase law.

If something of this kind is not done, I very much fear that before the present world-wide war is over cotton will sell at 4 cents a pound. I do not think it necessary or advisable to levy any kind of acreage-reduction tax to prevent an excessive crop next year. With the prices of all other crops at a much higher figure, relatively, than cotton at 10 cents, the acreage-reduction question will take care of itself.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, how much more time is remaining?

The SPEAKER. One minute.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, the assertion has been made that all danger of issuing these proposed Government notes is obviated by making them payable in gold only after the 1st of January, 1916. In the brief time at my disposal I want to call the attention of the House to the fallacy of that argument. It only postpones the day of reckoning for a few brief months. In the proposed amendment no provision is made for any additional gold to be available to redeem those notes when they come due on the 1st of January, 1916. The holders of the present outstanding United States notes have the right to demand the payment of those notes in gold now; and if they are put upon notice now that on the 1st of January, 1916, the burden on the gold reserve behind those notes will be doubled, does anyone suppose that the holders of those United States notes will not now be alarmed by that situation?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the first Bartlett amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker. I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first Bartlett amendment, if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 5, all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 and by changing the semicolon in line 3 and inserting a period.

Mr. BARTLETT. That strikes out the provision for the sale of Panama bonds.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MURRAY and Mr. HARDWICK demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 39.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Bartlett amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 25, page 2, beginning with the word "and," down to and including the word "issuance," on page 3, line 1.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House I will ask to withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not need to have the permission of the House.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I object.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I can withdraw it without the permission of the House, I will withdraw it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not withdraw it when there is objection.

The SPEAKER. In the House a Member has the right to withdraw an amendment clear up to the time of voting upon it.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman has a right to withdraw an amendment which has been offered when no further opportunity can be had under the rule to offer the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman certainly will acquit me of any bad faith in the matter.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

The SPEAKER. That has nothing on earth to do with it.

Mr. MANN. If that ruling were made, the gentleman could not offer another amendment while the same amendment was pending.

Mr. BARTLETT. I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his request. The question is on the amendment which has just been reported.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 43.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next Bartlett amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, the following words: "At any rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. BARTLETT, there were—ayes 82, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the Murray substitute.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is not germane to the proposition pending, the pending proposition being to deposit certain funds of the United States in certain depositories, and the proposition of the gentleman from Oklahoma being to make certain loans to certain people in the United States, with no liability whatever on the part of any of the banks through which those loans are made. It seems to me that the Murray proposition is radically different from the pending amendment. One is a deposit proposition and the other is a loan proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Considering all of the facts, as well as the fact that some of us here cooperated in getting this matter before the House for a vote, why is not the gentleman from Georgia willing to withdraw his point of order and let us have a vote on the proposition? Is it not better to have a vote upon all of these propositions?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman frankly by saying that for reasons which I would be glad to explain, but which I do not believe I will explain right now, I can not. I do not think one proposition is germane to the other, and can not waive the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is not the Murray proposition a deposit proposition also?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard?

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, all I desire to say is this, that it would certainly be an unwholesome principle to rule a provision of this character out of order when it is offered not to the bill, but as a substitute for the Hardwick amendment, because both provide for the deposit of funds, both provide that the funds shall be Government funds, and the only distinction is that in his case the banks are liable for all of essence in value of the currency, while in the amendment I offer they are liable as banks receiving deposits, and they are also liable in the matter of agency in handling the Government funds. That is the only distinction. It merely facilitates the same object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question. Does the Hardwick amendment contain anything about loans?

Mr. MURRAY. I understand that it does.

Mr. HENRY. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, it does not.

Mr. MURRAY. It provides that the money shall be loaned at a rate of interest to the producers of cotton or owners of land on which it is produced at not exceeding 4 per cent.

The SPEAKER. Is that the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MURRAY. That is the Hardwick amendment, and the same language is used in my amendment. The fact is that the whole purpose of this is not a purpose of deposit, but the purpose of his provision is to give the farmers a loan, and that is the purpose of mine. There is a distinction as to liability. I hope the gentleman will not claim that his purpose is merely to make a deposit, but the fundamental idea is a loan, and the loan is used in both.

The SPEAKER. Wherein does his proposition differ from the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me on that?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, the pending amendment presents this sort of a proposition: It proposes to deposit funds of the United States in certain banks, which banks, of course, are made depositories of the United States for the purpose of receiving those deposits, the banks remaining in each case liable to the Government for public funds, the deposits being made on condition that the deposits shall be used in a certain way. That is my amendment.

The SPEAKER. How does that differ from the Murray amendment?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Murray amendment proposes not to deposit funds of the United States, but to loan funds of the United States directly to certain farmers of the United States, without any bank in which the same is deposited being liable to the Government for those funds.

Mr. MURRAY. Oh, that is not correct.

Mr. HARDWICK. Except for gross negligence in handling it, as if they should let some one steal it.

The SPEAKER. What is the real difference between a deposit of Federal funds in a bank and loaning Federal funds to a bank?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is all the difference in the world. In the Murray proposition the banks are liable simply as naked bailees. They distribute Government funds directly to the people to whom the Government loans it. In the amendment that I offer the Government merely deposits this fund in the banks, its own depositories, who are liable under the law for its return and must give security for it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I confess these two propositions are so much alike that it is difficult to tell the difference.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, let me finish my statement. There is but one difference, and that is fundamental. In the amendment that we are now voting upon the banks are liable for the return of every cent of this money to the Government. If the gentleman's proposition be adopted, the banks would not be liable unless they had been guilty of gross negligence as a bailee would be liable, and not as a depository of Government funds.

In other words, the banks under the proposition proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma are liable only as a bailee would be liable. They do not borrow the money from the Government, nor is the Government money deposited in them, but they are simply used as agents to distribute Government loans.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. Now, in the line of this discussion allow me to read two lines from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HENRY. From section 3 of the amendment offered.

Mr. MANN. Page 2, line 7.

Mr. HENRY (reading):

The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same under reasonable terms and conditions, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, to the producers of cotton or tobacco.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I called attention to that. But the fundamental, the cardinal, difference is in the proposition I have offered—that the banks are liable to the Government as the depositaries are now liable to the Government for the return of public funds; whereas under the proposition now suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma the banks are simply agents of the Government, and would not be liable for the return of the funds as depositaries are now liable, and you will observe that the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma in its second section provides for paying a certain commission, one-third of the amount of the interest, I think it is, for their services as agents. If these loans fail and were not repaid by the planters, the banks who handle them would not owe the Government one cent because of such default, whereas under the proposition I present every bank that gets a dollar is liable as depositaries now are liable and must repay such funds. There is all the difference in the world.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think under the Murray amendment that a bank is not liable for the money?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; I think the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Oklahoma will tell you the same thing.

Mr. HENRY. If the Chair will read the second section of their proposition, he will see a provision that they shall receive a certain commission for their services in distributing this money.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman hold up to the proposition that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] is not germane?

Mr. HARDWICK. I go back to the first proposition with which I started, because the proposition we present here is a proposition to deposit public funds of the United States in such depositaries of the United States on certain conditions which are expressed in law, whereas the proposition of the gentleman from Oklahoma is not to make deposits of public funds at all, but to make loans of public funds to private individuals and to employ banks simply to act as agents for this loan-distribution process, which is an essentially different proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I know it is very natural for a gentleman who has prepared a proposition himself to think that another proposition to cover the same purpose but not in the same form is not germane. That is natural——

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the gentleman will acquit me of that.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the trouble with the gentleman now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. If it were not the gentleman's own proposition, he would clearly see that the Murray amendment was germane. The Hardwick proposition is not merely to deposit money in the bank, but to deposit money in the bank on the compulsion that the bank shall loan the money at 4 per cent interest to certain persons.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. MANN. In a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. MANN. It is a compulsion. It is not a deposit of money in the bank, but the banks are a mere conduit through which the money is to flow from the Treasury to the individual.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman will pardon me, no bank is required to accept these deposits. You can not make them come in and take this money, but they are liable for it if they do take it.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. HARDWICK. And if they take it, they have to see it is paid back.

Mr. MANN. They can not get the money unless they agree to do a certain thing, which is to hand the money over to the individual. That is the Murray amendment in a different form. It makes no difference in the end. The purpose in the end is to get the money of the Government into the hands of the cotton producer, a new method of doing it. There might be a thousand methods, all of them germane one to the other, so there can be no question in my mind that a proposition to employ a different method to accomplish the same result must be germane to a method which has already been proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia, where does this bill say anything about these banks being Government depositories?

Mr. HARDWICK. Which bill—my proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Nothing in the world, except it directs the Secretary to deposit it in these banks, and that makes them depositories.

The SPEAKER. What banks?

Mr. HARDWICK. In the banks named, State and National banks in certain territory of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was arguing here awhile ago that under his amendment that money was loaned.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. That these moneys are deposited under 5153 of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Are they deposited under the same rules and regulations?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all.

Mr. HENRY. I think——

Mr. HARDWICK. I think there is a material difference, and the gentleman from Texas knows it, too, I think, and will, I believe, readily concede it. In the one case the banks in which these deposits are made are liable to the Government of the United States for them, and in the other case they are not liable.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman doubt that an amendment would be in order to relieve the banks of that liability?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think it would, because this is a proposition to deposit public funds in the depositories.

Mr. MANN. Can we not relieve the banks of that liability if we wish to do so? Has not the House, in the consideration of that, the right to strike out the liability proposition?

Mr. HARDWICK. It might be germane to the pending proposition.

Mr. MANN. You would have a right to strike out?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think you can substantially change the general character of the proposition. Here is a proposition to deposit certain public funds, on condition, I admit, but to make deposits in the banks of the United States. The banks in which the same are deposited remain liable to the Government therefor.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. Does the gentleman deny that the first object of his amendment, as well as mine, is to get the loan to the farmer?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know that I am called on to answer that question, although I do not mind doing it. This is to do it in the only safe and sane way we can accomplish the gentleman's purpose, in my opinion.

Mr. MURRAY. Leaving that out, is not that the first object?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is to do it in a safe way.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman answer? Is not that the object?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I have already answered the gentleman's question. I do not think it necessary to do so again.

Mr. METZ. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. METZ. Is it not proper to propose an insane substitute, That is what this amounts to, then.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. Here is a proposition under which the banks remain liable to the Government. Now, they propose to substitute for that a proposition which is an advance to certain private individuals and under which the banks will not be liable. That is the difference as I see it, and it is a most important and material difference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish to be recognized?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not now. I did wish to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but it is not necessary now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to and ask unanimous consent that we may consider an amendment to strike out section 6 of this bill, which pertains entirely to the redemption of the Panama Canal bonds, and it is proper to do this in order to perfect the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that I may offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to strike out section 6.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the question now come up on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as amended by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]?

The SPEAKER. Of course; but the gentleman from Georgia is now asking unanimous consent to offer an amendment to strike out a section.

Mr. BARTLETT. That applies entirely to the Panama Canal bonds.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not applicable now. The provision in regard to the Panama bonds ought to go out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says he wishes to perfect the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out section 6.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRISP, Mr. HENRY, and Mr. HARDWICK demanded a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

First, however, the Chair will state that he sent over to Mr. UNDERWOOD to find out what was the prospect about getting the conference report on the war-tax bill in to-night. The gentleman sent back word that, while they had agreed substantially on most of it, it would take three hours to get it into shape, but that they would try to get it into shape and have it printed so that we can have a printed copy in the morning. [Applause.]

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, is the vote on the adoption of the amendment now?

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the adoption of the Hardwick amendment as amended. Those in favor thereof will answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. EDWARDS. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDWARDS. If the Hardwick amendment is voted down, would it then be in order to offer the amendment that was offered awhile ago by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes are allowed under the rule, and 30 minutes have expired. You can not offer any more amendments to this bill.

Mr. MANN. Has the Speaker declared no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do it, if it has not been done. There is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 123, answered "present" 12, not voting 202, as follows:

So the Hardwick amendment as amended was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. GUDGER (for amendment) with Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (against).

Mr. FERRIS (for amendment) with Mr. BORLAND (against).

Mr. DAVENPORT (for amendment) with Mr. COADY (against).

Mr. HARRISON (for amendment) with Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey (against).

Mr. RUSSELL (for amendment) with Mr. WHITACRE (against).

Mr. WATKINS (for amendment) with Mr. BUTLER (against).

Mr. ESTOPINAL (for amendment) with Mr. RUCKER (against).

Mr. FAISON (for amendment) with Mr. HENSLEY (against).

For the session:

Mr. UNDERWOOD with Mr. MANN.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, has not come in. He is not recorded, is he?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). No.

Mr. MANN. I am paired with him. I voted "nay." I withdraw my vote and ask to be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MANN, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recorded as voting "nay."

Mr. HENSLEY. I withdraw that vote, as I am paired with Mr. FAISON, who is sick, and I wish to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HENSLEY, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I discover that I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DOUGHTON. I voted "nay." I desire to withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HAMLIN, and he answered "Present."

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay," but being paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. HARRISON, I desire to change my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BOOHER, and he answered "Present."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recorded in the negative.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has arranged a pair for me with Gen. ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana, who can not be here. I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RUCKER, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CRISP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. CRISP. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the committee amendment striking out section 2 of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I move to reconsider the last vote, Mr. Speaker; and ask to have that motion laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. What motion was it?

Mr. MANN. I move to reconsider the last vote and lay that on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I object, Mr. Speaker, and ask for a division of the two questions.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. WINGO. I demand a separate vote on each proposition, to reconsider and lay on the table. I am entitled to a division.

Mr. MANN. There is no separate proposition about it. I moved to reconsider and lay that on the table. The question is on laying it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the Hardwick amendment was rejected and laying that motion on the table.

Mr. CRISP. The question is on laying on the table the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Yes; to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Those in favor of tabling the motion to reconsider will vote "aye." Those opposed will vote "no."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask for the yeas and nays. If you gentlemen over there are going to filibuster, let us do it. We gave you your chance, and you are not playing fair on it. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of tabling the motion to reconsider will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Speaker did not state the question correctly. I understood the Speaker to say that the question was on the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair said it was on the motion to table the motion to reconsider. Those in favor of tabling the motion to reconsider will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there is some confusion about the motion. Is the motion to table the Hardwick amendment, or is it the State bank amendment? I understand it is the Hardwick amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is the Hardwick amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Under the rule, we were operating in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and we had up various amendments.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. They were acted upon. Now, is it in order to reconsider the vote on those amendments? If we had been in Committee of the Whole—we were acting as though we were in Committee of the Whole—it would not have been in order, and the question could only have come up when the bill came up on its final passage or when the vote was in the House. Now, I make the inquiry of the Chair if it is in order now to reconsider, inasmuch as we are acting as if we were in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Speaker, just a moment. While it is true that we are acting in Committee of the Whole, yet the rules of the House obtain and not the rules of the Committee of the Whole. For instance, we have already had the yeas and nays, which we could not have had in the committee; and we can order the previous question, which we could not do in the Committee of the Whole. So while we are proceeding as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule the rules of the House apply. I suggest that the point of order of my friend from Kentucky is not well taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have not made any point of order. I have made a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to be heard any further?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I simply desire the ruling of the Chair. I made a parliamentary inquiry. I shall be glad to have the Chair answer it.

The SPEAKER. When the House is acting as in Committee of the Whole in the House the rules of the House apply. That was the reason the Chair ruled about half an hour ago that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] could withdraw his amendment. The question is on tabling the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the Hardwick amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 89, answered "present" 11, not voting 209, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama with Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia.

On this vote:

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota (for) with Mr. GUDGER (against).

Mr. BORLAND (for) with Mr. FERRIS (against).

Mr. COADY (for) with Mr. DAVENPORT (against).

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey (for) with Mr. HARRISON (against).

Mr. WHITACRE (for) with Mr. RUSSELL (against).

Mr. BUTLER (for) with Mr. WATKINS (against).

Mr. RUCKER (for) with Mr. ESTOPINAL (against).

Mr. FAISON (against) with Mr. HENSLEY (for).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, who is in conference on the war-tax bill, and who I presume has not voted. I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MANN, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, is the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to reconsider the vote by which the so-called Smith amendment was rejected still pending?

Mr. CRISP. If not, I will enter the motion now.

Mr. BULKLEY. I desire to move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman make his motion now.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency striking from the Senate bill section 2 as it passed the Senate, which authorized State banks to participate under the Aldrich Act.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. That motion is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The question is on tabling the motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment striking out section 2 was agreed to.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULKLEY) there were—ayes 77, noes 48.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that point for a moment until I submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. And that when the House meets to-morrow morning it shall be in order to consider the conference report on the war-tax bill, if it has not theretofore been disposed of. I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has just come into the Chamber, and he can perhaps give us some information respecting it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I have just come from the conference. An agreement will be reached probably not in time to print it in the RECORD to-night under the rules. Therefore, I hope the request of the gentleman from Illinois will be granted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to make the request himself, instead of my making it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report be considered at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman from South Carolina reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did everything within my power to give the cotton people a chance for a vote upon the amendment that was presented, and it was stated, not by everybody, of course, that if a vote could be had upon the cotton amendment, gentlemen would not seek to further delay action on the war-tax bill. I think, in good faith to the House, although the gentleman himself was not consulted, that he ought to be willing to let the House act upon the bill. I will say frankly that the Republican side of the House probably will not be represented here after to-morrow night to any very great extent. I think that no one Member of the House ought to stand in the way of the convenience of the great mass of membership of the House, and although I am very frequently tempted to do so, yet I do not yield to that temptation.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection. On both sides of the House, from all over the North, we are holding men here who are anxious to get back in order that they may have a week's work in their campaigns for election.

Of course, all over the South it is not as important, because the contests of the southern Members are over; but we have given to the Members of this House from the South an opportunity to make their record on the cotton question and we have held a quorum here this long for that purpose, and the gentleman is doing a great injustice, a great unkindness, to all the Members in the North on either side, and will not advance his cause in the least, I do not think.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, not as a matter of justice, but as a matter of generosity, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the objection. Although at this time the gentleman from Illinois is asking that northern Members be allowed to go home to take part in the election, during the few days when gentlemen from South Carolina were called to their homes to the primary it was put in the press of this country and advertised on the floor of this House that not one of us was present on the floor of this House to vote. It is a well-known fact we have no opposition in South Carolina in November. It is a well-known fact that our primaries are equivalent to election there, and yet practically the only time I have been away from this House was on account of sickness. I have been here trying to keep a quorum, and yet it has been advertised on the floor of this House and through this Union that the Representatives from South Carolina were away from here during that primary. Now, Mr. Speaker, since the gentlemen have asked us to extend them this courtesy, I will for the present withdraw the objection. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow, and that the conference report on the war-tax bill shall be considered at that time, the rule about printing the report in the RECORD and its going over one day to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to my colleague to ask unanimous consent that if the conferees have the conference report ready in time that it may be inserted in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I will include that, although I did not presume it would be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman further asks if the conferees should get their report ready in time to-night that it shall be printed in the RECORD without being brought back to the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment to the bill (H. R. 10168) for the relief of Leon Greenbaum.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five calendar days in which to print remarks on the cotton question.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman withhold it until I can put this request?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the cotton question——

Mr. HARDWICK. All Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. That all Members of the House shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the cotton question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to amend that by asking that all Members of the House have leave to print for five calendar days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On what?

Mr. MANN. On the gentleman from New York, if they desire to do so.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. I will be more generous and fairer than——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, when I want lessons in generosity and fairness I will not appeal to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Because the gentleman would not take them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to print remarks in reference to cotton.

Mr. HARDWICK. Calendar days.

The SPEAKER. Calendar days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two articles from the Waterways Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing two articles from the Waterways Journal. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized.

Mr. GLASS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GLASS. I want to know what has become of the legislation of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is suspended temporarily. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON]——

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The point of no quorum was made before the result was announced on the motion to reconsider. On that vote it was disclosed there was not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. That does not settle anything. It was not a roll call. The Chair will count to see if there is a quorum present. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. I possibly did not state my inquiry correctly a while ago. Is not the situation this, that the Chair had announced that the ayes were 77 and the noes 48 on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to table the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and at that moment the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] made the point of no quorum for the purpose of getting a record vote on that motion? At that time he agreed to temporarily withhold it for these unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. MANN. I think that is correct.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the vote now occur not simply as a "present" vote, but upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to table the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]?

The SPEAKER. That is true; but it turned out there was not a quorum here.

Mr. WINGO. The question I am asking now is, inasmuch as no quorum was disclosed on that division, does not a call of the House follow automatically?

The SPEAKER. I know; but the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] made the point of no quorum, and the Chair counted and found 157 Members present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, then the call of the House orders the yeas and nays on this question, and the doors have to be closed, and the vote is taken on the question of laying on the table the motion to reconsider made by myself.

Mr. WINGO. That was the inquiry, Mr. Speaker, that I desired to make.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the vote comes on the question to table.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that the count of the Chair in that respect was superfluous, because a vote of the House had already indicated there was not a quorum present on the division.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to table the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to reconsider the committee amendment to which he referred and relating to the cutting out of State banks. Those in favor of tabling the motion will vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 121, nays 87, answered "present" 7, not voting 214, as follows:

Before the announcement of the vote,

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BULKLEY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded. Those in favor of adjourning will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-eight gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-three gentlemen have arisen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 58 and the noes are 53.

Mr. LEVY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks for tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-five gentlemen have risen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number.

Mr. BULKLEY. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed to taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-one gentlemen have risen in the negative. Twenty-five is a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. Those in favor of adjourning will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 108, answered "present" 4, not voting 239, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Before the result of the motion to adjourn was announced, several Members requested that they be allowed to vote.

Mr. MANN. Are these gentlemen entitled to vote? They have not qualified yet.

The SPEAKER. We are operating under a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. But this is on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, but we have not finished with the other call. The Chair thinks they are competent to vote, since we are under that call.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest, possibly out of order, that several gentlemen have come in since the roll was called on the motion to lay on the table, and they are eligible to vote on that.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and if the Chair can find out who they are he will count them.

Several Members appeared and voted.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is it in order at this time to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BULKLEY. I hope the gentleman will withhold that. There will not be much opposition to the passage of the bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. We can not get a quorum.

Mr. BULKLEY. We do not need to, unless a roll call is demanded.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I desire to announce to the gentleman that we will need a quorum to pass this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that there has been no business transacted since the roll was called, and we can not adjourn unless the motion is seconded by a majority of those present. The truth is that the roll call ought not to have been taken on that other motion to adjourn. The motion should have been seconded before the Chair entertained it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Would a motion be in order to reconsider the vote just taken on adjournment?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the Speaker decide that the motion to adjourn is in order if it is seconded by a majority of those present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the rule. This is the new rule about calls of the House:

If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be considered as dispensed with. At any time after the roll call has been completed, the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker; and if the House adjourns, all proceedings under this section shall be vacated.

Now, while the vote on the motion to adjourn was not conducted according to that rule, it did happen.

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that it will be impossible to maintain a quorum here to-night, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WINGO. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion will have to be seconded by a majority of those present. All gentlemen will please take their seats. Those who desire to second this motion to adjourn will rise and stand until they can be counted. [After counting.] Forty-nine Members have voted to second the motion to adjourn. The Chair will count to ascertain the number of Members present. [After counting.] There are 107 Members present. Less than a majority having voted to second the motion, the Chair does not put it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "present," but as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I was paired, has voted, I desire to vote "aye" on the motion to table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair just counted 49 Members seconding the motion and 107 Members present, not a sufficient number.

The result of the vote on the motion of Mr. BULKLEY to table the motion of Mr. CRISP was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5474. An act for the relief of Patrick McGee, alias Patrick Gallagher;

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Ninth International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of San Francisco, State of California, July 18 to 24, 1915; and

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution relating to the awards and payments thereon in what are commonly known as the Plaza cases.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I will not withhold anything at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the Speaker has just announced that a quorum was present.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I demand a count.

Mr. BULKLEY. I make the point of order that the point of order of the gentleman from Oklahoma is dilatory. The Chair has just announced that a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but it is not dilatory. The Chair will never rule that a point of order of no quorum is dilatory, because it is a constitutional right. The gentleman makes the point, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one Members present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to punish Members of the House by requiring their presence here upon bills of relief. If these gentlemen do not want the perfectly feasible relief that these bills afford, I do not care to give it to them. Therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 22, 1914, at 10 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 22, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom. Thy dominion endureth to all generations. Calamities of life, war, pestilence, famine have come because men have tried to subvert Thy purposes and stay Thine arm. But all peace and all happiness come in conforming our lives to the will of our God. We thank Thee for the assurance that Thy will for us is for our prosperity and happiness. Thou dost love us with an everlasting love. Guide us in the discharge of the duties of this life, that we may be found in conformity to Thy will and receive the blessings that Thou hast for those who love and serve Thee. We ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

STORAGE OF RAW SUGAR.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as bearing upon the discussion which took place yesterday morning between the Senator from Michigan and myself, being the outgrowth of a letter which the Senator from Michigan presented and which was read from the desk, I wish to state that since that time I myself have received a letter, or, rather, a copy of a letter containing the substance of a confidential report made by the Great Western Sugar Co. to some of its stockholders and to its brokers showing the character of its business under the existing law. I ask leave to have inserted a part of the same in the RECORD this morning without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from Colorado will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Great Western Sugar Co. statement shows that on March 1, 1914, they had on hand cash totalling $3,001,000. In addition to this they had at that time $7,868,000 worth of sugar. The sugar on hand was invoiced at the cost of production, which cost included every possible item of expense, such as storage, carrying charges, interest on the money, etc. Presuming that the sugar was sold at the price quoted in the public press as coming from the officers of this company, a sum equal to $10,500,000 or more was realized when the sugar was disposed of in the open market. In addition, the Great Western Sugar Co. statement carried an item of nearly $900,000 for pulp and molasses. The pulp being sold to the farmers and also being used for feeding cattle, this statement shows that the cattle owned by the Great Western Sugar Co. are invoiced at $506,000. In addition to all this, the company's statement shows that they have beet seed and other such material on hand to the amount of almost $900,000, and this report still further shows that they had several hundred thousand dollars of collectible bills outstanding. This is only part of their report, and does not include the earnings or cash reserve of the beet-sugar factories located at Billings, Mont., and Scotts Bluff, Nebr., nor does it contain any statement concerning the earnings of the Great Western Railway. We might, if we wished, extend this statement by giving some of the particulars concerning other operations of this company, such as its efforts to create sentiment against the Underwood tariff bill and the reduction of the tariff on sugar. For instance, it has been charged in the Denver newspapers that certain sums had been paid out of the earnings of this company for the employment of lobbyists and others for maintaining headquarters and for the dissemination of literature looking to the manufacture of favorable sentiment. In addition to all this they have always embraced the opportunity to deceive the public as to the earning power of the Great Western Sugar Co. During the past two years they have been repeatedly buying space in various newspapers equaling two whole pages, displaying pictures of the factories that would be closed down when the Underwood tariff went into effect. Up to date no factory belonging to this company has closed its doors. On the contrary, for the sugar campaign beginning about October 1, 1913, and ending with the last of February, 1914, this company made a profit of at least $2,000,000 over and above its dividend requirements.

Taking their own figures, they paid to the farmer $5.50 per ton for his sugar beets, from which they recover about 270 pounds of sugar—about $3.75 per hundred pounds. Multiplying the 270 pounds by $3.75 a hundred, we find they receive $10.32 for the sugar extracted from 1 ton of beets.

In addition they sell back the pulp, which is the residue of the beets after the sugar has been extracted, receiving from the farmer from 50 cents to $1 per ton therefor, or else they feed it to their own stock, which they fatten for the market. The proceeds from the sale of this pulp about pays for all factory operation; therefore the net earnings on each ton of sugar beets is the difference between the $5.50 paid to the farmer and the $10.13 received from the consumer.

In giving the foregoing figures I forgot to mention that the Great Western Sugar Co. statement shows that, in addition to their enormous holdings of cash and other properties, they have between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 invested in other companies. We could go on elaborating on these various items to a much greater extent, but will conclude by saying the officers of the company tell those on the inside not to urge any increase in dividends nor to ask for any statements until the tariff agitation is over, for by doing so they would destroy any hope for a retention of the tariff, telling them the people of Colorado would not support them if they knew the inside story. * * * It is generally accepted that if the earnings of the subsidiary companies were included in the profits of the parent company there would be somewhere in the neighborhood of $26,000,000 earned during the past 10 years, after the payment of dividends of 7 per cent on about $13,500,000 of preferred stock and 5 per cent on about $10,800,000 of common stock.

Here are two extracts from a letter in my possession. It is to a New York banker from a prominent official of the Great Western Sugar Co. It was given me in strictest confidence, and I am not at liberty to use the names, but you may depend upon it as authentic: "The Great Western Sugar Co. should net, after all expenses and dividends are paid, something like $7,000,000." And this, remember, on an outstanding capitalization of $24,000,000. * * * "The talk from the sugar company officials is not particularly favorable, for the reason that this year they reduced the price to $4.50 per ton, and they are raising a great hue and cry regarding their inability to get seeds from Germany," etc.

Most cordially, yours,

_____.

ARMY VETERINARY SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I send a telegram to the desk and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., October 21, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In behalf of 900 veterinarians in our State I earnestly request you to use every means in your power to get the Army veterinary bill passed before adjournment. This bill has passed the House, and is all ready for final action.

Yours, sincerely,

GEO. W. DUNPHY, State Veterinarian.

ADDRESSES BEFORE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, two notable addresses were delivered yesterday before the American Bar Association, that by ex-President Taft, the president of the American Bar Association, being the annual address (S. Doc. No. 614), and that of Senator ROOT on the subject of "The layman's criticism of the lawyer" (S. Doc. No. 612). I ask unanimous consent that these two addresses be printed each as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from South Dakota will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE COTTON SITUATION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution passed by the National Farmers' Congress, in session recently at Fort Worth, Tex., and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks that the resolution presented by him may be read. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the crisis caused by closing European markets for cotton, our greatest export crop, having disturbed national credit, reversed our balance of trade, and deprived a large part of our country of the means with which to meet its obligations to other sections, presents a great national problem.

We therefore urgently call upon Congress to remain in session until it has enacted sound laws for financing surplus cotton and for protecting the producers against ruinous prices for the next crop, due to the present war-created surplus. We believe that adjournment of Congress without this legislation would be culpable neglect of duty.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the resolution to show that the farmers of the Nation—not alone the farmers of the South—regard the cotton problem as essentially a national problem, and believe that Congress ought not to adjourn without taking some remedial steps.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the resolution?

Mr. SHEPPARD. A resolution by the National Farmers' Congress, recently in session at Fort Worth, Tex., a congress representing the farmers of all the Nation, all sections of the Nation—North, East, South, and West.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to ask him, as the resolution calls for some action, has the Senator in mind now any action along this line that he is going to ask Congress to take prior to adjournment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would have some remedy to present if there appeared to be any chance for its adoption. The representatives of the Southern States interested in the matter have been making every effort within their power to devise another measure since the rejection of the cotton-bond amendment last Saturday, and if we see any prospect for its adoption we will present it.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any information as to how soon they will be ready to present the proposition?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here two short letters bearing on the irrigation and reclamation of the lower Rio Grande Valley, a problem that will come prominently before Congress at the next session. I ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMISSION FOR THE EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF THE WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As the "commissioner on the part of the United States to study the questions in connection with the distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande," I invite your attention to the inclosed copy of a communication and valuable consideration, by Judge J. O. Nicholson, Laredo, Tex., March 5, 1902, of the subject, the international diversion, impounding, and using the water in the Rio Grande from Devils River to the Gulf.

Your obedient servant,

JNO. W. GAINES,
Commissioner.

LAREDO, TEX., March 5, 1902.

Hon. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In behalf of a large proportion of the citizens of the United States inhabiting the lower Rio Grande Valley, and especially in behalf of the citizens of the county of Webb, State of Texas, I desire to present to you the importance of an arrangement by treaty between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United States of Mexico, the object of such treaty being to provide for the utilization and equitable distribution of the waters of that portion of the Rio Grande Valley extending from the vicinity of the point where the Devils River empties into the Rio Grande, thence down the valley of the latter stream to its mouth, a distance of about 300 miles.

The question of irrigation along the lower Rio Grande has long been discussed, and the inestimable benefits of a proper system, not only to the people residing in the valley of said river but also to those of the nations on both sides, are well known. Yet, without the aid of the Governments of both of said nations it is not probable, and, I might say, hardly possible that the waters of the Rio Grande will ever be extensively used for irrigation; but with the joint control of the two Governments, there is no reason to doubt that it can be successfully accomplished; that vested rights in the use of the water along the course of the river will be properly protected and large areas of lands now unproductive be reclaimed.

To summarize some of the reasons which, in the opinion of the citizens of that portion of the Rio Grande Valley, and also in the opinion of the citizens of many portions of the United States, will justify the two Governments in establishing and maintaining such a system of irrigation, they direct your attention to the following:

First. There are many hundreds of thousands of acres of fertile land in the territory mentioned admirably adapted for irrigation now unproductive on account of insufficient rainfall, which could be reclaimed and made very productive. The minimum low-water flow of the Rio Grande at Eagle Pass and Laredo is, to wit, 2,000 cubic feet per second—it is much greater below Roma and Rio Grande City—while at ordinary low water the flow is double that quantity, which, if all used for irrigation, is sufficient to furnish annually 3 acre-feet of water on 500,000 acres of land and sustain a farming population of 150,000 persons.

Second. The quantity of flood water which frequently rushed down said stream and out into the Gulf of Mexico is out of all proportion to the ordinary flow, a rise of from 15 feet to 20 feet at Laredo and Eagle Pass being frequent, while at Laredo it has been known to rise 28 feet, at which height it flows at a velocity of 12 feet per second. The distance between the shore piers of the bridge at Laredo is 820 feet. From this data it will be seen that the maximum high-water flow at Laredo is 275,520 cubic feet per second. It has been estimated by a competent engineer that the immense volumes of flood waters alone annually flowing down the river and out into the Gulf of Mexico are sufficient, if utilized for irrigation, to irrigate every acre of tillable land in the lower Rio Grande Valley; but whether the flood waters of the river or the ordinary flow, or both, should be utilized for irrigation, or could be profitably so used, are questions which probably can not be determined until a careful investigation and survey has been made by a competent board of engineers.

Third. Besides the ordinary field crops adapted to the climate of the lower Rio Grande Valley, such as corn, cotton, sugar cane, rice, castor beans, etc., which could be successfully grown by irrigation, there could also be successfully grown grapes and olives and many other small fruits together with melons and other varieties of vegetables adapted to that climate. In addition to all these, it is stated in the last Yearbook issued by the Agricultural Department that the county of Webb, of which the city of Laredo is the county seat, and which county has a frontage of 80 miles on the Rio Grande and contains more than 3,400 square miles of territory, has all the climatic conditions necessary to the successful cultivation of the date palm; that all that is necessary in addition to the climate and soil already existing is water for irrigation; that the territory embraced in said county and extending up the valley therefrom for a distance of, say, 100 miles, and a like distance below, is the only territory east of Arizona which is adapted to the successful cultivation of the date. It is a fact that the date palm, grown from seeds of the fruit, have been growing as ornamental shrubs in the residence grounds of several citizens of Laredo for from 5 to 10 years last past.

Fourth. The establishment of a comprehensive system of utilizing the abundant water supply of the lower Rio Grande for irrigation is probably beyond the scope of private capital, and said stream being the international boundary between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, the establishment of such a system of irrigation is properly a matter for the consideration of the Governments of the United States of America and the United States of Mexico.

Fifth. The propriety of the governments of said two countries establishing such a system of irrigation has been indorsed by the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, as will be seen by the following resolution of said Congress:

"Resolved by the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, That this congress heartily indorses and recommends the appropriation of the sum of $50,000 by the Government of the United States, which sum shall become available when supplemented by a like amount to be appropriated by the Government of the Republic of Mexico, for the purpose of locating sites for one or more dams across the lower Rio Grande for irrigation purposes; the location of canals in connectin with such dam or dams, and the making of estimates of the number of acres of land which can be irrigated thereby, together with estimates of the cost of construction of such dam or dams and canals; the survey and estimates to be made by a corps of competent engineers selected by said Governments of Mexico and the United States."

All of which is submitted for your consideration.

Respectfully, etc.,

J. O. NICHOLSON.

COMMISSION FOR THE EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF THE WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose copy of the original and amended order, issued in 1911 by the Secretary of War, on the request of the Secretary of State, and a copy of the local orders issued under each, in the matter of the diversion of the water in the Rio Grande, and the practice in case of complaint.

Your obedient servant,

JNO. W. GAINES,
Commissioner for the Equitable Distribution of the Waters of the Rio Grande.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, October 10, 1914.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,
State Department, Washington, D. C.

SIR: 1. Referring to your oral request for information in regard to the orders of the War Department, dated March 13 and November 18, 1911, respectively, relative to the diversion of the water from the Rio Grande River, the following is submitted:

2. The Secretary of State wrote, on January 19, 1911, to the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter from Mr. Keblinger, American commissioner for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande, relative to the diversion on the American side of the waters of that river for the purposes of irrigation. The Secretary of State expressed the desire that the War Department exercise the powers conferred by sections 10 and 12 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, to regulate and control the diversion of the waters of the Rio Grande for irrigation.

3. In response to the request of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, on February 28, 1911, directed the Chief of Engineers to give instructions to the local engineer officer at Galveston, Tex., as follows:

"To publish a notice that the War Department regards the further diversion of water from this river for irrigation purposes as injuring its navigable capacity, in violation of sections 10 and 12 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, and that the construction of any additional works for the diversion of the waters of this river will not, for the present, be sanctioned. The local engineer officer will also be instructed to communicate with the proper persons who control the irrigation works now withdrawing water from the Rio Grande with a view to limiting the amount so diverted, so that the amount of water heretofore withdrawn from the river shall not be increased pending the completion of a survey now being made by the International Boundary Commission."

The instructions were given as directed, and were followed by the local engineer officer. A copy of the order as published by him under date of March 13, 1911, is inclosed herewith.

4. Pursuant to instructions of the Secretary of War, a hearing was given the attorneys for certain local irrigation companies, etc., on November 6 and 7, 1911, at which the attorneys urged the revocation of the department orders, or, if that could not be done, that they be modified so as to permit of the taking of additional waters from the river at the higher stages of the water, and so as not to recognize any priority in regard to the withdrawal of water by those companies who were taking from the river at the time of the publication of the notice by the local engineer officer.

5. The outcome of the hearings was the modification of the order by the Secretary of War November 9, 1911. The modified order was published by the local engineer officer under date of November 18, 1911, copy of which is herewith.

6. When any communication is received by the department in regard to the diversion of water from the Rio Grande the usual practice has been to refer it to the local engineer officer, who informs the parties in accordance with the above-mentioned order.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

NOTICE RELATIVE TO THE DIVERSION OF WATER FROM THE RIO GRANDE RIVER, TEX., FOR IRRIGATION PURPOSES.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Galveston, Tex., March 13, 1911.

The War Department regards the further diversion of water from the Rio Grande River for irrigation purposes as injuring its navigable capacity, in violation of sections 10 and 12 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, prescribing "laws for the protection and preservation of the navigable waters of the United States."

The construction of any additional works for the diversion of the waters of this river will not for the present be sanctioned.

By direction of the Secretary of War:

G. P. HOWELL,
Major, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

"Confirming the department order of March 13, 1911, regarding and controlling the diversion of the waters of the lower Rio Grande and the status quo created thereunder, and pending the negotiation and proclamation of a treaty with the Government of Mexico, providing for an equitable distribution of such waters, the Department of War waives, subject to revocation in case such action becomes advisable, its objection to the further diversion of water from the Rio Grande and the establishment of additional works therefor: Provided, That the total actual diversion on the American side at any time shall not exceed one-half of the total actual flow of the river at such time to be determined by the department from data furnished by the commission for the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande.

"This order and the order hereby confirmed are for the regulation and control, under authority of the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat., 1121), of the amount of water which at any given time may be taken from the river, and do not purport to affect in any way the right or title of the various parties interested and concerned to the water which the department permits to be diverted; and further, such orders do not convey, and are not intended to convey, any rights of any sort to any of the parties in interest in any of the waters thereunder controlled, and both orders are subject to immediate revocation or modification so soon as the exigencies of the situation may demand."

2. Applications which have been refused in the past may be now renewed through this office under the present order, and such applications should contain full data in regard to proposed plants in order that intelligent action may be taken thereon.

EARL I. BROWN,

COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS (S. DOC. NO. 613).

Mr. FLETCHER. On the 16th instant the Senate received a message from the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the Commission of Fine Arts for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, with accompanying illustrations, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

That report, as submitted to the Senate, included a report on the Panama Canal, but as that has already been printed as a document, being No. 146, the committee thought it best to eliminate it and to report a resolution authorizing the printing of the remainder. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 481) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Commission of Fine Arts for the year ended June 30, 1914, be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, omitting therefrom that portion of the report relating to the Panama Canal which has heretofore been printed as Senate Document No. 146, Sixty third Congress.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

MONUMENT TO URIAH P. LEVY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on August 22 last I introduced a bill, Senate bill 6376, which was properly referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It proposes to make an appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of a monument to Commodore Uriah P. Levy, who was a great commander, as is known, and was also the author of abolition of flogging in the United States Navy, a most commendable act, which was highly praised the world over.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is chairman. Col. Harts suggested that the Secretary of War be included in the commission created by the bill. The bill provided for a commission consisting of the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Navy. Col. Harts has suggested that it be amended so as to include the Secretary of War, and I have the honor to introduce an amended bill, with the words "the Secretary of War" interlined.

The bill (S. 6675) for erecting a suitable monument to Commodore Uriah P. Levy in the city of Washington, D. C., was read twice by its title.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senator will not ask unanimous consent for an appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of a monument. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia subsequently said: From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, borne upon the annual and session rolls, their respective salaries for the month of October, 1914, on the day of adjournment; and the Clerk of the House is authorized to pay on said day to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners their allowances for clerk hire for said month of October.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COTTON EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 480) was read, as follows:

Whereas the European war has seriously interfered with the market of our greatest national export product, lint cotton; and

Whereas although lint cotton is not contraband of war serious impediments are being placed in the way of shipments of this commodity to belligerent countries; and

Whereas shippers who desire to export cotton are finding it difficult to do so: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be named by the Chair to confer with the departments with reference thereto, and to report to the Senate as early as possible the result of their investigations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, the resolution will lie over for a day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution just presented by him may be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. KERN. I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator who introduced this resolution why it was that cottonseed oil was left out?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because my attention had not been called to cottonseed oil.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There has been a great deal more complaint about cottonseed oil than about cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senator may have heard more complaint of it, but I have heard more of cotton.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard more of cottonseed oil. Both ought to go together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senators that the question is whether or not the Senate will give unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was holding the right to object and interrogating the Senator from Georgia. I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that it would be well to put in cottonseed oil.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course I have no objection. I will be glad to so modify the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a letter I have just received from a cotton exporter at Albany, Ga. He writes:

We are having some small demands from neutral countries, and have sold to Sweden a few hundred bales. We were able to get war insurance on this cotton at a rate of 5 per cent, but we are in receipt of a telegram from one of the largest brokers in the East saying that they could not place another bale at any price without this clause:

"Warranted free from any claim arising from capture, seizure, or detention by the British Government or their allies."

He further states that the American underwriters are following the lead of the British underwriters in this matter. I do not see why the British or their allies should hold up cotton, as it is not a contraband of war when in a neutral ship going to a neutral country, or, in fact, why they should hold up cotton at all.

Then the request is made for investigation and cooperation in the matter, with the statement that at least some cotton could be shipped into belligerent countries, and there is a demand for a limited amount of cotton, and it would be shipped if free from interference.

Again, Mr. President, I received this morning from Savannah, Ga., from a large shipping firm there, a letter containing the statement that—

> We have been contemplating the purchase of one or two foreign steamers to place under the American flag and have been working on several boats now in American ports of British, German, and Austrian ownership and flags.
>
> We will appreciate it very highly if you will ascertain for us from the insurance commission or the Secretary of State if such steamers purchased from foreign owners, even belligerents, will be insured by the American Insurance Commission when placed under the American flag. We have been advised that they will only insure steamers that were actually owned by Americans, though under foreign flags, prior to outbreak of hostilities.
> We would like to get this question very clearly and definitely settled and would be glad if you would wire us fully, at our expense, upon receipt of this letter.

Mr. President, I think a little more vigorous attention to the question of the transportation of cotton to foreign countries, and even to belligerent countries, by the departments is not uncalled for under the present circumstances. I think a little deeper realization of the importance of this question on the part of the departments would not hurt, and it is for this reason that I offer the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say that I received several complaints of interference upon the part of French ships and men-of-war with the shipments of cottonseed oil. The London convention which we signed, and which nearly all the civilized nations of the world signed, expressly declared raw cotton and cottonseed oil to be noncontraband of war. They are not even conditional contraband of war. They can not be taken when shipped by a neutral even to a belligerent purchaser, except, of course, at or through a blockaded port.

I brought the matter to the attention of the State Department and the State Department is looking into it. It has taken up the matter with the French Republic, and I believe also with the British Empire. One of my correspondents complained of some interference upon the part of a British ship. That, however, did not seem to be very well established. I think perhaps it will do no harm at all to have this investigation go along concurrently with the movement made in the State Department, so that everybody may know that we are in earnest about the protection of our undoubted rights wherever those rights are undoubted. We are not attempting to quarrel with anybody, and shall not do so, I am sure; but where an article stands upon the footing of expressly declared noncontraband of war we ought to let the world know that we do not care to have it interfered with. I hope the resolution will be modified as I have suggested and then passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Mississippi that, while the Senator from Mississippi inquired of the Senator from Georgia whether or not it would be agreeable to have the resolution so amended as to include cottonseed oil products, no amendment to that effect has been offered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I accept that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will restate the resolution in its modified form.

The Secretary read as follows:

> Whereas the European war has seriously interfered with the market of two of our greatest national export products, lint cotton and cottonseed oil; and
>
> Whereas although lint cotton and cottonseed oil are not contraband of war, serious impediments are being placed in the way of shipments of these commodities to belligerent countries; and
>
> Whereas shippers who desire to export cotton and cottonseed oil are finding it difficult to do so: Therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be named by the Chair to confer with the departments with reference thereto, and to report to the Senate as early as possible the result of their investigations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to suggest in this connection, that yesterday I received a telegram in reference to commercial cablegrams. Certain exporters in my State have made contracts for the shipment of cotton abroad, and certain foreign banks have O. K.'d or were to O. K. them; but word has been received that the cablegrams which have been sent have not yet reached the parties in South Carolina, and they are complaining of the fact that some of the Governments, perhaps England, were censoring these commercial cablegrams to the extent of interfering with the shipment of cotton. I merely make this statement to emphasize the necessity for some action in order to clear the channels of trade.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In pursuance of the foregoing resolution, the Chair appoints as the committee under the resolution Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. JONES.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution authorizing the appointment by the Chair of three Members to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some communication to make to them, and the Speaker of the House had appointed on the part of the House Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. FITZGERALD, and Mr. MANN.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SIMMONS. I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the so-called war-tax bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand a majority of the Senate can proceed to its consideration, and that unanimous consent is not required. I want to ascertain what is in the report, but I am not in a hurry about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 18891.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask that the amendments be read as the Secretary proceeds with the reading of the report. We can not tell anything by the numbers. I should also like to ask if there is a printed copy of the report that can be furnished to us?

Mr. WARREN. The report is printed in the RECORD this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the report is printed in the RECORD this morning in the House proceedings.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is printed in the RECORD, and there is also a statement accompanying the report in the RECORD, explaining each amendment, so that Senators can secure all the information which I think they will need concerning the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Secretary proceeds, I think we would gain some time, and it would enable us to better understand the report, if the Senator from North Carolina would simply express wherein any changes or modifications have been made in the Senate bill by the confereees. I understand there are very few changes, indeed, and the Senator can inform us as to those.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to do that, Mr. President; but I do not understand the Senator is suggesting that I refer to every minor and unimportant change that was made by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it will be proper, first, to have the report read, and then let the discussion ensue, unless the Senator from North Carolina prefers to proceed in some other way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should prefer that the report be read, after which I will make a brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. According to the matter printed in the RECORD of the House proceedings of yesterday, the Secretary is not reading the report correctly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has not got to that part of the report as yet. He is reading the more formal part of it. The statement to which the Chair presumes the Senator from Georgia refers is required by the rules of the House of Representatives to accompany the report. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report, which entire is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. "The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared suitable and special stamps denoting the tax herein imposed, to be affixed and canceled in such manner as he, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe; and in the absence of such stamps from any bottle or container containing wine, liqueur, cordial, or compound taxable under the provisions of this section, sold or offered for sale or consumption, shall be prima facie evidence that the tax thereon has not been paid, and all such wines, liqueurs, cordials, or compounds shall be forfeited to the United States.

"There shall be levied and assessed against the maker or producer of all wines fortified under the provisions and conforming to the requirements of the sections of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, as amended, and as further amended by this act, a tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him in the fortification of such wines: Provided, however, That the maker or producer of such fortified wines shall, under regulations and suitable bonds, to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, have assessed against him monthly the said tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him during the preceding month, which assessment shall be paid within 90 days from the date of notice thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as exempting any still wines, cordials, liqueurs, or similar compounds from the payment of any stamp tax provided for in this section.

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations to make effective the provisions of this section.

"That sections 42, 43, 45, 46, and 49 of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by section 68 of an act approved August 28, 1894, and by an act approved June 7, 1906, are further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 42. That any producer of pure sweet wines may use in the preparation of such sweet wines, under such regulations, and after the filing of such notices and bonds, together with the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, wine spirits produced by any duly authorized distiller, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in determining the liability of any distiller of wine spirits to assessment under section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, is authorized to allow such distiller credit in his computations for the wine spirits withdrawn to be used in fortifying sweet wines under this act: Provided, That such wine containing after fortification more than 24 per cent of alcohol, as defined by section 3249 of the Revised Statutes, shall be forfeited to the United States.

"'SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juice, to which water may have been added prior to, during, or after fermentation, for the sole purpose of facilitating the fermentation and economical distillation thereof, and shall be held to include the product from grapes or their residues, commonly known as grape brandy, and shall include commercial grape brandy which may have been colored with burnt sugar or caramel; and the pure sweet wine which may be fortified with wine spirits under the provisions of this act is fermented or partially fermented grape juice only, with the usual cellar treatment, and shall contain no other substance whatever introduced before, at the time of, or after fermentation, except as herein expressly provided: Provided, That the addition of pure boiled or condensed grape must or pure crystallized cane or beet sugar, or pure dextrose sugar or water, or any or all of them, to the pure grape juice before fermentation, or to the fermented product of such grape juice, or to both, prior to the fortification provided in this act, either for the purpose of perfecting sweet wines according to commercial standards or for mechanical purposes, shall not be excluded by the definition of pure sweet wine aforesaid: Provided, however, That the cane or beet sugar, or pure dextrose sugar so used shall not be in excess of 11 per cent of the weight of the wine to be fortified under this act: And provided further, That the addition of water herein authorized shall be under such regulations and limitations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe: Provided, however, That records kept in accordance with such regulations as to the percentage of saccharine, acid, alcoholic, and added water content of the wine offered for fortification shall be open to inspection by any official of the Department of Agriculture thereto duly authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture; but in no case shall such wines to which water has been added be eligible for fortification under the provisions of this act, where the same, after fermentation and before fortification, have an alcoholic strength of less than 5 per cent of their volume.

"'SEC. 45. That under such regulations and official supervision, and upon the execution of such entries and the giving of such bonds, bills of lading, and other security as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, any producer of pure sweet wines as defined by this act may withdraw wine spirits from any special bonded warehouse in original packages or from any registered distillery in any quantity not less than 80 wine gallons, and may use so much of the same as may be required by him under such regulations, and after the filing of such notices and bonds and the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products and the disposition of the same as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, in fortifying the pure sweet wines made by him, and for no other purpose, in accordance with the foregoing limitations and provisions; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized whenever he shall deem it to be necessary for the prevention of violations of this law to prescribe that wine spirits withdrawn under this section shall not be used to fortify wines except at a certain distance prescribed by him from any distillery, rectifying house, winery, or other establishment used for producing or storing distilled spirits, or for making or storing wines other than wines which are so fortified, and that in the building in which such fortification of wines is practiced no wines or spirits other than those permitted by this regulation shall be stored in any room or part of the building in which fortification of wines is practiced. The use of wine spirits for the fortification of sweet wines under this act shall be under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall provide by regulations the time within which wines so fortified with the wine spirits so withdrawn may be subject to inspection, and for final accounting for the use of such wine spirits and for rewarehousing or for payment of the tax on any portion of such wine spirits which remain not used in fortifying pure sweet wines.

"'SEC. 46. That wine spirits may be withdrawn from special bonded warehouses at the instance of any person desiring to use the same to fortify any wines, in accordance with commercial demands of foreign markets, when such wines are intended for exportation, without the payment of tax on the amount of wine spirits used in such fortification, under such regulations, and after making such entries, and executing and filing with the collector of the district from which the removal is to be made such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security to prevent the use of such wine spirits free of tax otherwise than in the fortification of wine intended for exportation and for the due exportation of the wine so fortified, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and all of the provisions of law governing the exportation of distilled spirits free of tax, so far as applicable, shall apply to the withdrawal and use of wine spirits and the exportation of the same in accordance with this section; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe that wine spirits intended for the fortification of wines under this section shall not be introduced into such wines except under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever transportation of such wine is to be effected by land carriage the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as to sealing packages and vehicles containing the same, and as to the supervision of transportation from the point of departure, which point shall be determined as the place where such wine spirits may be introduced into such wines to the point of destination as may be necessary to insure the due exportation of such fortified wines: Provided, That where, in accordance with regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, wines fortified under the provisions of this act with brandy taxable at 55 cents per proof gallon are exported directly from the winery where fortified, there shall be allowed an abatement or refund of tax equivalent to 55 cents per gallon on each proof gallon of wine spirits contained in such wine at the time of exportation, which amount of wine spirits shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per centum thereof.

"'SEC. 49. That wine spirits used in fortifying wines may be recovered from such wines only on the premises of a duly authorized grape-brandy distiller, and for the purpose of such recovery wine so fortified may be received as material on the premises of such a distiller, on a special permit of the collector of internal revenue in whose district the distillery is located; and the distiller will be held to pay the tax on the product from such wines as will include both the alcoholic strength therein produced by the fermentation of the grape juice and that obtained from the added distilled wine spirits: Provided, That when application for such special permit for redistillation shall be made by the producer of any wines fortified with brandy subject to the tax of 55 cents per proof gallon, before such wine shall have been moved from the premises of the winery where fortified and the redistillation is had under regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, an abatement or refund of the tax assessed against said producer shall be allowed equivalent to 55 cents per proof gallon of brandy contained in said spirits at the time of redistillation, which amount of brandy shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and wine spirits so recovered may be used in the manner provided by law for the fortification of other wine: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per centum thereof.'

"That section 3 and section 6 of the act of June 7, 1906, amending the laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to assign at each winery where wines are to be fortified such number of gaugers or storekeeper gaugers, in the capacity of gaugers, for special duties as may be necessary for the proper supervision of the making and fortifying of such wines, and the compensation of such officers shall not exceed $5 per diem while so assigned, together with their actual and necessary traveling expenses, and also a reasonable allowance for their board bills, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but not to exceed $2 per diem for said board bills. That bonds hereafter given under the provisions of the aforesaid act of October 1, 1890, as amended, shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on all brandy removed thereunder and not used and accounted for within the time and in the manner required by law and regulations, and for the payment of all taxes imposed on the brandy so withdrawn and used for fortifications; and the said bonds shall contain such other conditions as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

"'SEC. 6. That any person who by any process recovers from wines fortified under the provisions of the aforesaid act approved October 1, 1890, as amendments thereto, any brandy or wine spirits used in the manufacture or fortification of said wine, otherwise than is provided for in said act and its amendments, or who shall rectify, mix, or compound with distilled spirits or other materials, except as provided in this act, such grape brandy, fortified wines or wine spirits unlawfully recovered thereform, shall, on conviction, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000. But the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, relating to rectification, or other internal-revenue laws of the United States, shall not be held to apply to or prohibit the mixing or blending of pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act with each other or with other wines: Provided, That the pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act may be used in the manufacture of cordials, liqueurs, and similar compounds on which an internal-revenue tax of 24 cents a gallon is imposed, and otherwise the provision of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall remain in full force and effect.'"

F. M. SIMMONS,
WM. J. STONE,
JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
OSCAR UNDERWOOD,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hardly think it necessary to take the time of the Senate to do more than point out the more important changes made by the conference in the bill as it passed the Senate, because there is in the RECORD to-day not only the report, but a statement explanatory of the report and the changes made by the conference.

The first change of any importance is that with reference to the tax upon fermented liquor. As the bill passed the Senate the tax upon this product, commonly called beer, was $1.75 a barrel—an increase of 25 cents a barrel over the House rate. The conference agreed to restore the House rate of $1.50 a barrel.

The bill as it passed the Senate carried an amendment imposing a tax of 5 cents per gallon on rectified spirits. The conference decided to eliminate that and the Senate receded from its amendment.

The amendment with reference to wine as presented by the Senate was practically adopted. There were certain unimportant changes, mostly with reference to the tax brought forward in the amendment from the former act in order to conform it to the subject matter. I do not think it necessary to go further into that subject.

One of the chief controversies before the conference was that with reference to restoring the House provision imposing a tax of 2 cents a gallon upon gasoline. A large part of the time of the conference was taken up in the discussion of that subject and in the discussion of the subject of a tax upon rectified spirits and increasing the tax over the House rate upon beer. As I have stated, the result of that controversy was that gasoline was left out of the bill, the tax on rectified spirits was left out of the bill, and the House rate upon beer was adopted.

The House bill imposed a tax of $50 upon brokers. The Senate struck that paragraph out of the bill altogether. The conference decided to restore the paragraph and fix the license tax at $30 instead of $50, as in the House bill.

There were some slight changes made in the tax upon theaters. As provided in the Senate amendment to the House bill, the tax was a graduated tax of $25 upon theaters having a seating capacity of more than 300. The conference report changed that and imposed a tax of $25 upon theaters having a seating capacity of not more than 250. The Senate provided a tax of $50 upon theaters having a seating capacity of more than 300 and less than 600. The conference changed it to a tax of $50 upon theaters seating more than 250 and not exceeding 500. The Senate amendment imposed a tax of $75 upon theaters having a seating capacity of more than 600 and not exceeding 1,000. The conference changed it so as to impose a tax of $75 where the seating capacity exceeds 500 and does not exceed 800. The Senate amendment imposed a tax of $100 upon all theaters having a seating capacity of more than 1,000. The conference changed it so as to impose the same amount of tax upon all theaters having a seating capacity of more than 800.

The Senate added a new paragraph imposing a tax upon commission merchants. That was done because the courts had decided that commission merchants were not included in the term "commercial brokers," as was thought at the time the former act was passed and as was held by the department. The conference, adopting that amendment of the Senate, added this proviso, so as to avoid the possibility of a double tax:

Provided, That any person having paid the special tax as a commercial broker shall not be required to pay the special tax as a commission merchant: Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to commission houses run upon a cooperative plan.

There were only two amendments made with reference to the tobacco schedule. The Senate adopted an amendment to the House paragraph with reference to dealers in tobacco, imposing a tax of $4.80 upon each dealer. The Senate adopted an amendment exempting from the operation of that section persons whose annual receipts from sales of tobacco do not exceed $600. The conferees thought that was too high, and we reduced the exemption from $600 to $200.

The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment graduating the tax upon manufactures of cigars and cigarettes and tobacco and snuff, and added:

In arriving at the amount of license tax to be paid hereunder, and in the levy and collection of such tax, each person, firm, or corporation engaged in the manufacture of cigars, cigarettes—including little cigars—or tobacco shall be considered and deemed a single manufacturer.

There was a slight change of some little importance, though not of very great importance, in the paragraph with reference to telegraphs and telephones. The Senate amendment required the tax to be paid by the sender. The conferees changed it so as to require it to be paid by the person paying for the message or conversation. The sender might not be the person paying for the message.

I think, Mr. President, those are all the important amendments, except the amendments changing the dates. The House provided that the bill should go into effect the day after its passage. The Senate provided that it should go into effect 20 days after its approval. The conference changed that and restored the House provision, so that, as provided in the conference report, the bill would go into effect the day after its passage and approval, except wherein otherwise expressly provided.

The stamp taxes, both in Schedule A and Schedule B, according to the conference report, changing the Senate amendment in that regard, will go into effect the 1st day of December. Both the subdivisions of the bill entitled special taxes and on tobacco dealers and manufacturers will go into effect, according to the conference report, on and after the 1st day of November.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was the date when these two sections would go into effect provided for in the Senate bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. You mean the stamp taxes?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; in the Senate bill, the special taxes, on and after November 1, 1914.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the other provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. With reference to tobacco?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it goes into effect in December?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that goes into effect also November 1, but the adhesive-stamp taxes go into effect on and after the 1st day of December. It was provided in the Senate bill that the tax should go into effect November 1, but the conference changed it to the 1st day of December.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was wondering whether that was before the conference committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that was before the conference, because the Senate had made the change in the House date.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina whether there is anything in the conference report that was not before either the Senate or the House at the time of the passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that we were very, very particular about that. I do not think there is a single amendment made by the committee of conference that would be obnoxious to the objection that it was not a matter of disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator says there was not anything that would be obnoxious.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean that was not a matter of difference between the two Houses, and was not under the rules of the Senate clearly amendable by the conference. As I said to the Senator, I think we were unusually particular about that, in view of a recent departure here.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to find any fault with the phraseology of the Senator from North Carolina, but when he suggested that there was nothing obnoxious in the changes I want to suggest to him that the whole bill is obnoxious to me and to many Members on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not discussing whether the bill was agreeable to the Senator from Michigan or not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question before he takes his seat. My colleague, perhaps, wanted to ask him a question.

Mr. WEST. I have a few remarks that I should like to submit; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, if the effect of the change as to when the bill goes into operation is to put all of it in immediate operation except the stamp tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. All except where there is in the bill some provision fixing a different date to go into effect. There is not only the adhesive-stamp tax, for which a different date is fixed, but a different date is fixed as to the stamps that are provided for in Schedule A and in Schedule B. There is also a different date fixed in reference to the tax imposed upon tobacco manufacturers and dealers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When does that go into effect under the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. As I said, the 1st of November. There is also a different date fixed for all the special taxes—that is, on bankers, brokers, and commission merchants.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When do they go into effect?

Mr. SIMMONS. They go into effect the 1st day of November.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator point out what was exactly the change made by the conferees as to the time when the various schedules go into effect?

Mr. SIMMONS. There was really no change, except the Senate had stricken out the House provision and put in a different date, and the conference restored the House provision, so that it will go into operation November 1.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Practically all of it goes into effect November 1 except the stamp tax, which goes into effect December 1.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is mistaken about that. All the bill goes into effect the day after its passage except those sections where there is a special provision that it shall go into effect on a different date. That date, in this case, is the 1st of November. In the case of adhesive stamps and stamps provided in Schedule A and Schedule B it is the 1st day of December. There are one or two other instances in which it goes into effect on a specified date; but, with those exceptions, all the other provisions of the bill go into effect the day after the approval of the act.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to sections 29 and 30, on page 13, particularly the last paragraph on page 13 of the small print I have. I wish to call the chairman's attention to section 29 as amended by the conferees. It levies a tax on all dealers in tobacco not specially provided for of a certain sum where the amount of sales exceed $200. The next section, section 30, provides a tax of $4.80 on all dealers who have stores, shops, or places of business. What I wish to ascertain is whether it is understood that all dealers who have shops, stores, or any other places of business are subject to a tax of $4.80, without reference to the amount of sales.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should take it that each one of them would be entitled to an exemption of $200.

Mr. WHITE. The exemption provides only for those who are not otherwise specially provided for, and those who have stores, shops, and places of business are specially provided for. So, as I read it, all dealers who have places of business will pay a tax of $4.80, and dealers who have no places of business, such as peddlers or those selling from samples, will not pay the tax unless they sell as much as $200.

Mr. SIMMONS. I may have misunderstood the Senator. I thought he had reference when he said "place of business" to the amendment which was put on in the Senate to the paragraph with reference to dealers in tobacco, to the effect that a store, shop, or other place in which tobacco in any form is sold. Is that what the Senator has in mind?

Mr. WHITE That is what I am talking about.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is covered by the words "dealers in tobacco not specially provided for in this section." That means if there is no special provision for any tax upon the dealer anywhere else in this section except in that paragraph he would pay, upon receipts from sales of tobacco exceeding $200, a tax of $4.80, and that each place where he sold it would be treated as a separate subject of taxations, and $4.80 would be imposed upon each store, and likewise the $200 exemption would be allowed each store. That would be my construction of it. Of course it is a matter of construction.

Mr. WHITE. It occurs to me that amendment No. 30, on page 14, imposes a tax of $4.80 on all dealers who have a place of business, a shop or store, and that the previous amendment, No. 29, would only cover peddlers or those selling from samples, and they would have to sell as much as $200 before they would be subject to a tax. That is the construction I place upon it, but I may be wrong.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is wrong about it. I think all we meant and all the courts would say was the intent of Congress with reference to this amendment was that each dealer should pay $4.80, but that for the purpose of defining the meaning of dealers in tobacco every man who might have several stores or a company that might have several stores should be, for the purposes of this section, regarded as a dealer with reference to each store, and should pay the tax of $4.80; and, of course, he would be entitled to the exemption.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, when I took occasion a few days ago to submit some reflections upon the then pending war emergency revenue bill I did not think any condition would arise rendering it necessary for me to make any further observations in this Chamber before final adjournment: but I find myself confronted with a situation, on account of the position I took in reference to the amendment, known as the cotton-bond amendment, introduced by the senior Senator from Georgia, that it is made imperative, in order to rescue myself from the criticisms made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on the floor of this Chamber, who said:

> Any southern Senator who votes against this amendment, regardless of whether there is a doubt as to its constitutionality, will be looked upon by the people of the South as a traitor to them in the hour of their suffering and distress.

And who further said:

> To stand here, with the world convulsed in war and the credit of the South dead, and quibble about constitutional amendments is a disgrace to a southern Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WEST. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I took occasion the other day to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the incorrect interpretation that had been placed upon the exact statement that I did make. I did not have time to correct my notes and they went into the RECORD in the shape as though I said regardless of whether there was a constitutional question. What I really did say was, regarding the fact that there was a difference of opinion as to whether it was constitutional or not, the southern Senator who would not give his section the benefit of the doubt and vote for this provision was a traitor to his country.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I accept the explanation of the Senator from South Carolina.

It is not worth while for me to bandy words with the Senator from South Carolina in reply to the charges made against southern Senators who could not give their indorsement to this amendment. I am not assailing his sincerity, and, as to mine, I am willing to leave it to the people whom I serve.

In replying, however, to this unwarranted vilification I wish to say in the first place, as I understood it, each Member, unless he then and there so declared, was to be bound by the caucus action. This I understood, and I was so informed by the chairman, referred to any additional amendments to the bill as well as the bill as it came from the conference or caucus. This is the reason why I did not support the amendment of the junior Senator [Mr. OVERMAN] of North Carolina proposing to return to the South the cotton tax collected from the southern people from 1862 to 1868. I have always believed with a firm and unalterable conviction that this tax was in violation of the fundamental organic laws of this Union, and a palpable and unwarranted infringement of the rights of the States not delegated in any sense to the exercise of the General Government.

The South has always believed this tax was wrongfully extorted from the people, and that the General Government should square itself with the people of the South by hastening the day of its return to the States. The people of the South stood as a unit in opposition to the imposition of this heavy and unprecedented tax. It was a part of the gall and wormwood that soon after the War between the States was regarded as the common inheritance of the South. The United States, in all fairness to the South, should pay this money back to the States from which it was extorted, and had I deemed the war emergency revenue bill at this hour the proper place for this amendment, it would have had my hearty and uncompromising support. The United States took from Georgia alone in collecting this tax something more than $11,000,000.

Now, had I not been precluded in the action of the conference it was my purpose to offer an amendment allowing the State banks, as well as all national banks, to lend to the farmers as much as 5 cents per pound, middling grade, on cotton-warehouse receipts. This would have been absolutely safe, for there would have been the cotton-warehouse receipts, the farmer's note to the bank, and the credit of the bank added. In doing this it is clear the farmer would still retain an equity in his cotton, which would induce him to plant less acreage in order to enhance the value of the equity he still has in the cotton. As 5 cents per pound is about half the cost of production, the Government would be perfectly safe in advancing this much per pound on lint cotton in bales. It would be as good as gold to secure the Government from loss, yet by severe economy it would tide over the farmer until there was a demand for his cotton, and, as I have said, the less planted the larger would be his equity when there was a demand for the cotton.

This would be eminently preferable to taking away the rights of the farmer in limiting by legislation his acreage and taxing all over some definite amount fixed by the proposed law. If the Government has the power to circumscribe the acreage, it has the power to place limitations on all crops at its own will; indeed it would have the power to stifle production if it so decreed.

I am an interested farmer myself; and, knowing my own troubles, I should be glad to succor the oppressed seeking relief at the hands of the Government; but let not Members tell me my oath to support the Constitution stands for naught. More than 50 years ago a sad lesson was taught this country, and if the lawmaking power is led to disregard the Constitution and laws of this great Government, as has been suggested in this Chamber, then in the end we shall have presented to our gaze another and a sadder lesson taught in the political magic lantern of our country and manifest in the dissolving scenes of American freedom. Let us cherish the hope that this great Republic shall stand the trials to which it is destined to be subjected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Smith, Mich.
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Lewis	Pomerene	Stone
Camden	McCumber	Saulsbury	Swanson
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Thompson
Fletcher	Myers	Shields	Walsh
James	Nelson	Shively	Warren
Johnson	Norris	Simmons	West
Jones	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.	White
Kern	Overman	Smith, Md.	Williams

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is less than a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. PAGE, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. THORNTON answered to their names when called.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL]; and I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I will ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not like the conference report. It seems to have cut out some $20,000,000 of revenue which we were advised was necessary. I do not know why that has been done; no explanation has been given of it; and those of us who are wedded to the action of the Democratic conference—I did not have the pleasure of being in the Democratic conference that formulated this bill—are shocked at the suggestion and change from the action of the conference.

Mr. President, my real purpose, however, in rising was to call to the attention of the Senate the necessity, before adjournment, of at least considering three bills that are now pending in the House. These measures have already been passed by the Senate, and as reported by the committees in the other body they are pending there in modified form. One of them looks to the Government licensing, on application, cotton warehouses. Another is an amendment to the currency law. As we passed it, it permits the national banks to take advantage of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to the extent of 75 per cent of their capital and surplus, based upon commercial paper, and we added in the Senate a provision extending the same privilege to the State banks.

I have called to the attention of the Senate the fact that our situation in the South, so far as the farmer is concerned and so far as agricultural products are concerned, has been little helped by any measure which has passed this Congress. The bill which we passed on August 4 reached the State banks and authorized them to take advantage of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, but the construction erroneously put upon it by the Treasury Department was that it had not removed the 10 per cent tax on the notes of those banks, and that when we said that they should have the benefit of the provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act we meant that they should issue notes as members of a currency association, paying for them the tax provided for in the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, and that they should also pay the 10 per cent tax on notes issued by State banks. I do not know what lawyer undertook to defend such a position. I hope his name will never be known, for if he has any reputation, he certainly would lose it.

We provided in the recent amendment to the currency bill which we passed that the State banks should have the benefit of the enlarged currency which the Aldrich-Vreeland Act permitted. That bill is pending in the House. The legislation which would have substantially helped the situation in the cotton States was the provision of the act of August 4, extending the benefits of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to the State banks; and that, as I have said, was wiped out by a construction on the part of the Treasury Department. The Senate specifically provided in the amendment to the currency law which we recently passed that State banks should have that privilege, amending, in that respect, the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee. That bill, with that amendment, is now pending in the House. We shall hear from it during the day; the House will act upon that measure in some way and send it back to us to-day.

The only specific hope I have at this time of any action that will be worth much to the cotton States is that currency bill.

If the House rejects our amendment which admits the State banks to currency associations—the Banking and Currency Committee of the House has rejected it, and the House is to vote upon that question very shortly—if that provision is rejected and we send the bill to conference, we can still do something that will help; perhaps not a great deal, but help some.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgie yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to get the Senator's idea more definitely, I want to inquire if he means that if we send the bill to conference with the provision eliminated which the Senator desires, and for which I voted and would be glad to see it put into the law—I refer to that provision that permits State banks to become members of currency associations—the only way, as I understand, in which we could get legislation at this session that would assist would be to insist on that particular provision in this bill, and if the conference report came back to us without that provision in it we would have to reject it? In other words, we would have to insist absolutely on that particular provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. I think some such provision in a modified form, which might be agreed to by both bodies, could be presented to each, and I was just going to explain what I felt that might be.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As we passed the bill the State banks were to have the privilege of issuing their notes as currency, guaranteed by the national currency associations through their admission to such associations, and they were to issue those notes until July 1 of next year, when the Aldrich-Vreeland Act expires. I believe that we might perhaps obtain, if not quite that, at least something that would be helpful.

The objection urged by the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by a number of members of the Reserve Board, who appeared before the committee in the House, was that it would be extremely embarrassing to admit all State banks to currency associations already formed; that it would be impossible to prepare notes for them; and that altogether it would involve an enormous inflation of the currency to be presented to the Treasury, which the Government would be back of. In the first place, we might eliminate the trust companies and let only the State banks unite with the currency associations, which would cut off two-thirds of those who could join. What I was really interested in was the State banks. Or we might even add a provision that up to July 1 of next year the notes of State banks should be freed from the 10 per cent tax. That would be in line with the subject of disagreement, and that, I believe, the House would accept.

Now, let me say one word on that subject to the Senate.

The national banks, with few exceptions, have no relation to the agricultural interests of most of the States of the South. Texas is the exception, for in Texas there are more national banks than State banks. Both in number and in capital they exceed State banks in Texas; but elsewhere than in Texas, national banks are the commercial banks that deal with large institutions, are not found as a rule in the smaller cities, and have practically no relation to the agricultural interests of the States. It is the State bank alone—not absolutely, but almost alone—that handles the problem of the farmer and the cotton of the Southern States, with the exception of Texas.

Now, what is the situation? I grant that most important is the problem of marketing. Most important is the fact that, our European market being largely cut off, we have lost the demand for nearly one-third of the crop. I grant, and I believe that the ideal action was found along the line of the amendment that was offered to this bill and that was defeated last Saturday night—a provision that would not have cost the Government a dollar, that was absolutely surrounded with measures which made it certain that if the Government sold the 5,000,000 bales of cotton for more than it cost the Government, the Treasury kept the money, and if it did not sell for as much the tax levied upon cotton production made up the deficit. I have no doubt that that was the ideal course to have been pursued. I am prepared to defend it anywhere. I am prepared anywhere to defend the proposition that where a foreign war has stricken down the greatest commodity of export of a nation, it was fully justifiable and the duty of the Government to handle the problem; and we presented a plan by which the Government, with no tax upon the Treasury, could interpose and handle it.

We presented a plan that would have appealed to any other country in the world and ought to have appealed to this country. We were told by the representatives of Great Britain here in Washington during the past two or three days that the only reason their spinners fail to take cotton and settle the $200,000,000 balance that we owe, that is embarrassing our New York banks to-day, is because nothing is done here to retire part of the crop and thereby give a stable price to the balance. This great Government was not able to do for one-fourth of her citizens, and her greatest agricultural product so far as export was concerned, and her greatest of all exports, what the little Government of Egypt was able to do for the cotton growers of Egypt.

I grant that that was the intelligent business way to handle the problem; but with no chance to force the consideration of that subject further, what confronts us?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Let me suggest at this point, before the Senator goes to the other phase of the matter, that I believe it would be interesting and illuminating and instructive generally to the country to know what Egypt did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand, two things were done there. I gather it from the press. One was a plan for curtailment of the crop for next year of 42 per cent, and the other was a provision to take care of the surplus through the action of the Government. The price was saved, the farmer was saved, and we pay for Egyptian cotton that we bring in here now practically a normal price. We import about $25,000,000 worth of cotton, principally Egyptian, each year for our American mills. As I gathered, the suggestions have been, both from the president of the International Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association and the representatives of Great Britain who are here negotiating about our indebtedness to Great Britain, that a stable price or a stable condition of this commodity would at once cause the absorption by Great Britain of the quantity she needs, three million and a half to four million bales, which, at 10 cents a pound, would be $200,000,000, which would practically cover the international balance troubling us.

I fear some of the Senators were just afraid to vote for that proposition, and it was a bad time to discuss it just before an election. It was no precedent for valorization. We were perfectly willing to accept the proposition of buying at the market price, not in excess of 10 cents. The absorption of 5,000,000 bales would have left the balance where it certainly would have sold for 10 cents, because it is conceded that 10 cents is practically the cost of production, and cotton has averaged 12¾ cents for the last five years.

I was coming, however, to my reasons for desiring the Senate to remain in session until we could pass the amendment to the currency bill, in the hope that, at least, if we could not induce the House to accept our provision which admitted the State banks to the national currency associations, in order that they might issue emergency currency, we would be able at least to induce the House to relieve the State bank notes from the 10 per cent tax until July 1 next, when the Aldrich-Vreeland Act ceases to exist.

Let us see what help that would be. Let me call your attention to what is the condition. I have explained how the national banks reach the agricultural sections only to a small extent and how they are absorbed with their own custom. County after county in Georgia, rich and prosperous heretofore, has no national bank. The State banks have done the business of the farmers. The country bank, the merchant, and the farmer exhaust their resources and their currency by the time the crop is produced. During the month of September it is not a matter of outgo, it is income, as cotton begins to sell. By the last of October debts are freely paid, balances in the community are settled; and by the 1st of December the bulk of the cotton is gone, the debts of the section have been wiped out, and the banks have a surplus of currency, but on the 1st of September they have none. It has been absorbed by other sections for things that have been bought in connection with the production of the crop. Sixty days or ninety days produce a complete revolution and a change from currency scarcity to plenty, as this crop, worth a billion dollars normally, pours the wealth of the world into the rural sections of these nine States, while it wipes out our international balances and frees the whole country from its liabilities across the ocean, bringing, as it did last year, $610,000,000 to the credit account of the United States in foreign countries.

This year September is gone, October is nearly gone, and there has been practically no market. In several counties in my State, with an absolute lack of currency, they have gotten up the device of putting cotton in warehouses and issuing a warehouse receipt for the cotton, about the size of a $1 bill, and stamping on it the statement that so many pounds of cotton are in the warehouse, and having upon it the statement of the banks that they will accept this warehouse receipt as a deposit, but reserving the right to pay deposits in the same thing, and with the signatures of the merchants upon it that they will accept this receipt in payment of their bills and for the purchase of goods, and with the statement of the railroad in the county that it will take this receipt for transportation. I had one of the receipts, but I left it in my room.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Would it disturb the Senator from Georgia if I sought at this point, right where he is, to get his opinion as to a method which to my mind seems practicable, but which I am not quite so sure will be so, in view of my having been removed from the cotton situation for some time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be glad to explain just a little further the value of this State-bank issue, and then I would appreciate the Senator's suggestion. What I am seeking to do is to show to these empty benches and the few Senators who remain the absolute want of currency in the country counties.

I have been told in reply that there was not a lack of currency; that it was a lack of credit. Well, there is plenty of credit in New York City to get currency, but they have not the kind of stuff that it takes to get currency there. They got up this warehouse receipt in the good county of Screven, from which the wife of the Senator from Illinois hails, and they appealed to me to know if it is subject to a 10 per cent tax.

I have at least a dozen applications from different parts of my State to know if they can issue the same kind of notes and use them as a circulating medium without being subject to the 10 per cent tax. My answer is, "Use it, and we will consider that question hereafter"; for a Government that declines to do anything for a people in their position, and an administration that does so, would scarcely hunt for a chance to break down their only way to furnish a medium of exchange and to enforce the 10 per cent tax on them. But what we want to have is at least a suspension for a few months of the 10 per cent tax on State banks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. On that point I wish to ask the Senator a question. As I understand it, if this 10 per cent tax on the issue of money by State banks was repealed, it would permit any State bank in the United States anywhere to issue money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I would be willing to put in a provision of this kind: That they might do so when they secured the notes by staple agricultural products, so as to make a limitation of the amount of issue——

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to make this suggestion, and that is the reason why I asked the question. Would it not meet the contingency if a provision were put in the law that this repeal of the 10 per cent tax——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would be a suspension, not a repeal.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, a suspension. For the time being it would be the same as a repeal. I was going to suggest that it should apply only in cases where currency was issued under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. As I understand it, the Treasury Department does not refuse to permit State banks to go into the currency association, but it holds that if they do go in all the currency they issue must pay the tax. If the suspension applied only to cases where they were in currency associations under this act, would not that reach the difficulty rather than to make it general?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They can not go into it at all. The act expired in 15 days. The provision of August 4 required the State banks within 15 days to signify their purpose to join the Federal Reserve Association. The 15 days have gone. They commenced at once applying to join and offering to contract to join and were notified that even though they joined the Federal reserve system they could not join the currency association without being subject to a 10 per cent tax on their notes as well as the tax provided for in the Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

Mr. NORRIS. We could very easily in the same act repeal that 15 days' limitation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we could get it through the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Why could we not do it in this same bill? For instance, if the conferees on the bill the Senator speaks of agreed to reject that amendment with an amendment, and in that amendment provided that this limitation should be extended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course that would be desirable if it could be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I only wanted to know if that would not be a practical way to reach it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have about reached the conclusion that we can not get through the House or through that committee any legislation that in any way will let the State banks into the National Currency Association.

What I have had in mind was to permit the State banks to issue their notes for eight months, suspending the 10 per cent tax on them, provided they secured those notes by proper warehoused staple agricultural products. I would be perfectly willing to say cotton, but I am afraid if I would say cotton it would kill any legislation that was offered.

I would be willing to say cotton, if you prefer, or I would be willing to say staple agricultural products. I would be willing to put it in such a way as to curtail the banks that may issue it. All I want is the privilege for my own State and these nine States where it is desired to issue these notes during the next eight months.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. WEST addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska first, and then to my colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. I only want to attain the same object and to get relief. I should like to have the Senator give attention to this point. It seems to me, as I look at it, that it is more practical than the method he suggests. As I understand it now, the reason why State banks can not issue currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as extended by the present Congress is the 10 per cent tax and on account of the expiration of the limitation fixed for going into the currency association.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because there is no law that warrants it.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any now, but if we would pass a law we would let them in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To let all of them in. That did let them in.

Mr. NORRIS. It did not, as a matter of fact.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The law let them in, but they were kept out.

Mr. NORRIS. The construction placed upon it of course excluded them. If that could be changed, and, it seems to me, it is possible to change it——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not the slightest hope of it, because the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and the national banks do not want them to get into the National Currency Association.

Mr. NORRIS. If the chairman of that committee and the national banks are sufficiently powerful to prevent the passage of that kind of a law, will they not for the same reason prevent any other relief?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so, because this does not interfere with them at all. It would simply be a local currency to meet a present local need that they are not willing themselves to relieve.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the reason why I think it would be more difficult to pass it, and it would not give as good satisfaction to the country, because in my judgment it is not as good. I think the currency is not backed up quite as well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I so stated in the discussion on this subject when that amendment was before the Senate. It is not as satisfactory; it is not as good a currency. It is simply a local currency that will circulate only in a few counties in the neighborhood where it is issued; that is all. It may go to a dozen counties. I believe it was agreed to take the Screven County warehouse receipts as currency in three or four counties, and it is practically the only currency they use in three or four counties. The farmer brings his bale of cotton to the warehouse and they give him a certificate to the amount of 7 cents a pound on his cotton. He goes to the merchant and pays his debt with it, and he goes to the bank and deposits it. He takes his cotton to the warehouse, and it is there stored until such time in the future as he desires to sell it.

Now, take the county of Sumter in Georgia. I want to read a few words from a letter I received to-day from the leading business lawyer of a city of about 15,000 inhabitants in that prosperous county, one of the richest agricultural sections of the United States:

> Over half of the farmers of Sumter County have already informed their laborers that they will not be able to take care of more than half of them for next year. These negroes that constitute the white man's burden will, many of them, be left without any means of support next year because the whites will not be able in this all-cotton country to give them work and to pay them for their labor.
> We have had three public meetings here of farmers, and every one of them has prayed for relief. Our merchants are failing every day; most all of the guano companies are now broke. The furniture stores and jewelry stores are on the brink of ruin. It seems that the South is the stepchild of this Republic. Money can be appropriated for everything except to relieve the greatest calamity that the South has had since the Civil War.

Now, on the subject of currency I desire to read a letter written by the president of a national bank. This is a country national bank in a city of about 10,000 inhabitants in another rich agricultural county. The bank has a capital of $200,000 and a surplus of $100,000. I want to show how relief is going through the Treasury and how relief is not going through it:

> Some time since this bank applied for $90,000 emergency currency, secured by our bills receivable. After a long wait we got something over $50,000. The Secretary of the Treasury stated that our allowance had been cut down to this amount, and rejected as security which we had offered a large percentage of notes of small State banks in this vicinity, to whom we have loaned money.

Here was a national bank that was seeking to help the State bank and go to the farmer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from Georgia understand that those were the obligations of the State banks, or were they rediscounts of the State banks?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They were notes of the State banks to the national banks for money loaned to the State banks by this national bank.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And under the authority of the laws of Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely.

> I have written the Secretary of the Treasury, but can receive no reply. What I want to know is, whether this bank can obtain further emergency currency; and if not, why not? I also want to know the method to pursue to get more money.
> You probably know that this is the greatest cotton-producing county in Georgia—

It is the county to which I was referring a moment ago as probably the largest cotton-producing county in the State.

> We have loaned this season over a quarter million dollars to small banks in this vicinity. If any bank in the South is in position to give relief through emergency currency, we are certainly in that position. We are not only not hoarding, but our reserves are entirely insufficient, and it is a heavy strain on us under present conditions.
> I can not understand the attitude of the Treasury Department in this matter.

Mr. STONE. What bank is that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a national bank. I will let the Senator see it, with pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I do not care to look at it. I do not doubt the Senator. I thought he would have no objection to giving the name of the bank.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not. It can not have any more trouble than it has had, although I intend to call to-morrow morning and see if it is possible to induce an issue of additional currency to it. It uses emergency currency to help the small State banks around in that section, and when the notes of those banks indorsed by this bank passed the credit committee of the currency association of the State of Georgia they were held up for quite a length of time at the Treasury Department, and their $90,000 application was reduced to $50,000, when every dollar of the money they were seeking to obtain was to go to the State banks, where it might do some real good.

I concede that the State bank notes secured by deposit of cotton in warehouses would not be a currency of general circulation. It would meet only a local want that nobody now is providing for. It will compete with nobody, because it will fill a place that others decline to occupy. What attitude are we in? We are denied in the House a bill that would issue an increase of national currency to State banks. We are denied here the plan submitted by Senators from the cotton-growing States that would withdraw without the possibility of the risk of a dollar by the Government 5,000,000 bales from the market, leaving the market normal, to adjust itself and to care for the interests of the whole country. Then, when we come and as a last resort ask that the only agency that can furnish local currency that will help in a measure the burden that rests upon these people through no fault of their own, when we ask simply the suspension for eight months of the 10 per cent tax on notes issued for currency by our State banks, I suppose again we will receive a stone.

Mr. President, it should not be surprising if Senators whose people are so treated are indifferent about increasing tax bills of any kind and are a little indifferent about what goes into the National Treasury. If they were they would merely feel as their constituents have the right to feel.

Talk to me about Democratic caucuses or conferences and my being bound by them. We are called recalcitrants. I did not express myself in reply Saturday night. I simply felt it would do no good, and I was unwilling to trust myself to say what I thought.

Mr. President, I at least ask that the Senate remain in session until we can hear from the Senate bills now in the House. One is the warehouse bill. The others are bills amending the currency act. I would be willing to go this far: If the warehouse bill passes I would be willing to limit the note issue of the State banks, which is to be free from the 10 per cent tax for eight months, to notes secured by warehouse receipts from Government licensed and bonded warehouses. I am willing to narrow it so that it will be restricted, but I am ashamed to go home and tell the people of my State—the second largest cotton-producing State in the Union—that Congress has adjourned and even denied them the right to use their own notes for exchange purposes.

I have been appealed to because Senators wanted to get to their campaigns. What is that compared to the needs of a great people? What importance is it as to who is elected Senator or who is elected Representative in Congress anywhere compared to the demand that this Congress should not fail to regard the condition of this vast part of our country? I shall not uselessly delay adjournment, but I shall do what I can to prevent it until we have an opportunity to test out these measures pending in the House.

Let me tell you what is going on in Screven County. The small farmer, the poor tenant, is getting the certificates at 7 cents a pound on his cotton and he is paying debts with them. He is saving his mule and his wagon even at 7 cents a pound, because as soon as he brings his cotton to town he takes it to the warehouse and he gets this note that is being used as a circulating medium. This warehouse receipt, with the names of the banks on it and the names of the merchants on it, goes as money in several counties. That is as far as a good many of the very small farmers are interested.

But you go to some other county, where the banks are afraid of a 10 per cent tax even on circulating warehouse receipts of that kind, and he comes to town and has practically no offer for his cotton. His debts are due, and there is nobody able to help him, and by the time he gets it sold the chances are his cotton will not pay his debts, and his team and his wagon and his cows must be lost also. If it is the larger farmer, it may be his home; and we statesmen, the representatives of the people of this great country, both here and at the other end of the Avenue, lie down supinely and do nothing. I am not proud of anybody who participates in leaving such a condition with no relief, and I do not think they ought to be proud of themselves.

Oh, it is all right; the speculator will get the cotton, and six or eight months hence it will be selling at 9 or 10 cents a pound, as it seems that next year's crop will be greatly curtailed, and the men who got it from the men who made it will earn a rich harvest at the expense of the tiller of the soil; and we great statesmen will have the gratification of knowing that we did nothing!

I would not be proud of a Government that did not have the power to do anything under these circumstances. The fault is not with the Constitution. It is the people who administer it. Time will pass on, and the 8,000,000 people who have their little swept away will turn to dust and be forgotten; the section as a whole will be injured, but not permanently. It is too rich in resources not to grow and prosper. Only the small farmer and the man who is in debt will have his all wiped out. What do they amount to? Who has any sympathy for them? Few, I fear.

Ah, gentlemen, I do not think either House that is willing to adjourn with this situation confronting a large part of the country has anything to be proud of. I shall not vote to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 51) authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 22d day of October, 1914, at 6 o'clock p. m., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 376) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT AND PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to hear the resolution from the House read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution, if there is no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to hear both resolutions read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to hear them both read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (H. Con. Res. 51), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 22d day of October, 1914, at 6 o'clock p. m.

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 376) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and directed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, borne on the annual and session rolls, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of October, 1914, on the day of adjournment of the present session. The Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized to pay to Members and Delegates on that day their allowances for clerk hire for the said month of October.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it has been suggested that the first resolution must be referred to some committee of the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the usual course is for such resolutions to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia entered the Chamber.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Virginia is now present.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Does the Senator refer to the resolution providing for final adjournment at 6 o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir. The Senator will be able to tell whether the business before the Senate justifies action on that resolution at this time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will suggest that perhaps it would be well for the Chair not to lay the resolution before the Senate at this moment and that we may progress a little further before any action is taken upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution, then, without objection, will lie on the table.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have been exceedingly interested in the presentation by the Senator from Georgia of what all must admit is a most serious and a most regrettable situation in many of the sovereign and great States of our Union. The Senator from Georgia has in his own observations alluded incidentally to the sentimental relations which naturally I bear to one—in fact, to two—of the States of the South, one by my own birth and rearing and the other by the birth and rearing of members of my family. Naturally, Mr. President, I have some other sentiment than merely the casual sentiment of a mere citizen of the country, and I wish to say that I have been invited to very serious reflection by the remarks of the Senator from Georgia as to the necessity of some kind of action for the relief of the cotton States so far as the Government can contribute it.

Mr. President, representing a Western State and speaking for that State, I presume I was in harmony with Senators from the Western States in the reason I had for not being able to support the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, ably aided by the very full and logical argument of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and that was that the moment we admit that it shall be the policy or province of the Federal Government to become a lender to any one set of citizens or any one kind of produce or property because such be embarrassed by a temporary condition, we will be compelled to admit the precedent as necessarily applicable to any other kind of property in any other locality upon any other emergency, however large or small. That being so, it seemed impossible to my mind that I could pledge my State and my country to a precedent that seemed fraught, to my thinking, with such harm and future danger.

Now, I ask the able Senator from Georgia, knowing his experience in matters of finance, his attainments in matters of legislation, and particularly the value of his opinion in matters of practical business, what legitimate objection would there be to the expanding of the Federal reserve act for the relief of the people of Georgia and the people of the South—referring to the cotton States—in the following manner: That there be associations promptly organized in the cotton States coming within the meaning of the definition of "associations" in the Federal reserve act; that then cotton from the farmer be put into the custody and control of these associations; and that these associations then be permitted to draw relief from the Federal Reserve Board, under the provisions of the law based upon this cotton in the hands of these associations as collateral. Then, at the proper time, when the collateral shall come due, if it shall appear that the sale of the cotton would be to the sacrifice of it, the loans then be extended from time to time until such natural conditions would arise as the Senators had in their minds when they offered the proposition that the Government become a lender direct.

Then, I ask my able friend from Georgia, where would there be a violation of the Federal reserve act in the procedure, and why would not that temporarily assuage the severe condition of the South by letting the farmer pay off his debt, save his crop, and hold his cotton in abeyance until conditions, which we all hope may be speedy, shall give him the rescue of a rising market by which he may sell his cotton, pay his debt off permanently, and have a residue, which I hope will be to his independence?

May I ask the able Senator if he sees objection within the law to some course like that? And, if there be objection, may I then ask a second question, Is there not an amendment we might promptly add to the law here to meet the situation so as to avoid the objection? The virtue to this proposition, as I see it, is that it is as applicable to future emergencies, whether of cotton, corn, wheat, or any other necessity of existence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am glad to answer the Senator. In the first place, if the law permitted what he suggests, it would be a complete remedy; and so far as the extension of credit is concerned, it would be vastly better than taking the tax off the State banks, because it would require a provision by which an association being formed for the storing of cotton, the reserve banks would extend a loan direct to the holders of that cotton or to the association holding it, which would enable them to carry their immediate burden. That is the suggestion of the Senator, as I grasp it.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; keeping in view that if such a course is legal and appropriate, it should be so provided as to apply to the grain produced in the State of my able friend from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and likewise to the corn produced in my State of Illinois; and in such emergency the relief would be uniform in its operation and not wholly limited to cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That it would be of great service, and that it would largely relieve the situation so far as an increase of currency could relieve the situation, is undoubtedly true. The difficulty about doing it is that I am familiar with no provision in the banking and currency law that permits anything of the kind. As I understand the banking and currency law, only member banks can deal with the Federal reserve banks. A State bank can not deal with a Federal reserve bank unless it has taken stock in the Federal reserve bank and has become a member bank, in which event its own system of business must, to a considerable extent, cease, and it must conform to the requirements as to the mode of conducting business, which the Federal Reserve Act places upon banks which become members of the Federal reserve system. Only a bank which is a member of the Federal reserve system can deal with the Federal reserve banks. It would require a most elaborate amendment to our banking and currency law as we adopted it last year to permit what the Senator from Illinois suggests as a remedy. I give my own opinion of the meaning of the act and of its terms. Of course, if the Senator is familiar with any provision of the law that does not occur to me, I do not desire to express an opinion without having that provision before me; but I know of no provision in the banking and currency law that would permit anything of that kind.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I now wish to ask the Senator a question from the standpoint of one who believes neither in any further inflation of our currency upon the ground that we have got all the money that we need if we can invest it with proper security, and from the standpoint of one who does not believe in the Government going into the business of purchasing a commodity for the purpose of upholding its value. Now, what objection would there be to a proposition of this kind: I am not afraid of the Government issuing bonds; I am perfectly willing that the Government should issue bonds to the amount of $250 000,000 or $400,000.000 or $500,000.000, if necessary; and if that money be deposited with the State banks and Federal banks in the cotton-growing States, that it be loaned to those banks at a certain rate of interest, that it be reloaned by the banks to the farmers upon their cotton crop in storage at a reasonable additional rate of interest, enough to secure the banks, which ought to have patriotism enough to assist the people without very much interest accruing to themselves; then let the Government hold a lien upon the cotton, let the payment be made in a year or two years or three years, or until we can assume at least that the war in Europe will be over by reason of the exhaustion of the armies engaged? What objection could there be to a scheme of that kind, if you base the loan not on the selling price of the cotton, but upon, say, 65 per cent of the usual selling price of the cotton? If I go down to the Union Trust Co. or to any other investment company in Washington, I can not borrow more than 60 or 65 per cent upon what is the real value of the best real estate.

Now, with this cotton upon a basis, we will say, of 10 cents a pound, the farmer ought to be able to secure enough at least to tide him over. The Government, then, has not gone into the speculative market; it has merely loaned its credit, taking the bank for its security, and, in addition to the bank, taking the cotton itself for security. The bank would be protected by having a lien upon the sale of cotton.

I have always been willing—although I am not much inclined to vote generally for the Government itself going into the loaning business—in this particular instance and under a condition which probably might never happen again, to extend the credit of the Government in the shape of a loan to go directly to the farmer himself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Dakota for the view he has presented, but I am inclined to believe from his statement that he has not kept up with what has been going on in the House of Representatives in the past two days.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may correct the Senator, I understand that something along that line has been considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has almost stated the proposition which those interested in the cotton situation worked out in the other House.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may trouble the Senator again, I will state that I made that statement four or five days ago, when I was discussing the cotton situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not mean that the Senator took it from the House action. What I meant was that he had stated practically what we had agreed upon or what our representatives in the House had agreed upon as a conservative way of handling the situation, and they presented a bill substantially as outlined by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator right here if their provision did not go a little further and compel an advance upon cotton at its regular selling price, or at about 10 cents a pound?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They omitted that on the floor; there was a division about that, and it was amended, as I understand, upon the floor of the House. There was a provision made for 2 per cent bonds due January 1, 1916. I approve of the limitation of the loan to that date. I feel that the cotton farmers ought to take care of themselves after making another crop. If they have not judgment enough to meet the situation and curtail the crop, then they will have to take the consequences. If it were a situation that they walked up to with their eyes open, I would not be here asking for any assistance. If next year we raise in the South another big crop, God save the farmers; legislation can not and should not. I would not be here asking for legislation but for the fact that the cotton farmers have acted sanely, they have acted normally, and the European war is the one thing that has stricken them down.

The bill presented by the cotton-growing representatives in the other House provided for a bond issue on a 2 per cent basis, due January 1, 1916. It provided that the bonds should be loaned to the banks, and that the bonds were to be in small denominations, so that they could be used as currency and as legal tender. They were to become due at the Treasury January 1, 1916. They were to be loaned to the banks payable in December, 1915, by the banks, so that the Government was to have the money back in the Treasury to pay off the principal and interest before the bonds fell due.

The banks were required to loan at such rates as might be approved by the department to the producers on their cotton, and the banks were to deposit their warehouse certificates which they took as security, or the other security, in the shape of a lien upon the cotton which they took, with the Treasury back of their notes, so that the Treasury was to have the responsibility of the banks and the security which the banks had taken; and the limitation was made that the loans should be to the producers alone.

The bill provided further that the bonds should be distributed throughout the States in limited quantities to each one of the producers. So that the bill embodied even more care and limitation, as to the cotton producer, than the bill outlined by the Senator from North Dakota which he would be willing to support. Unfortunately, after a splendid presentation of the measure, it was defeated by the House yesterday afternoon. That bill was offered as an amendment to the currency bill pending in that body.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, was that after a favorable report by the committee, or did the proposition go to the committee with a favorable report?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Banking and Currency Committee did not approve it. The Rules Committee presented it; the Banking and Currency Committee fought it; the chairman of that committee fought it. The Rules Committee, however, reported a special rule to consider the currency bill and this amendment; and the amendment in effect was presented, as I understand, by the Rules Committee. I do not exactly comprehend the practice of the House, but that is my understanding of what took place, and it was debated.

In the Senate we sought to withdraw 5,000,000 bales of cotton with a provision to protect the Government. In the House, as the Senate had declined to accept the withdrawal plan—which as a business proposition was the safest for the Government and as a business proposition the best for the Nation—as the Senate declined to accept that, there was proposed in the House a measure somewhat similar to that which the Senator has outlined, not quite so generous as the one suggested by him, for he said he would let the issue extend for one, two, or three years, while our friends there took the position that they would not ask for it to extend over longer than the last of next year; that the farmers would then have a chance to take care of themselves; that, if they would cut their crop and reduce their cotton production to meet the surplus which the European war has caused, they would need no further help; that, if they do not do so, they have had a chance by their own action and by their own initiative to save themselves; and that we would not ask Congress to save them from bad judgment on their part; we would not ask Congress to help retrieve a situation which they might have handled for themselves. We were only willing to ask that they be assisted against a condition which they could not have foreseen and to which they in no way contributed, but which a foreign war produced.

I see no chance of any legislation unless we at least stay together until the currency bill comes over from the House and put on it a provision suspending the 10 per cent tax on State banks for 8 or 12 months.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WEST. Has the Senator any assurance that the House will agree to the proposition he has submitted here, and has he any assurance that, if it passes through the Senate, it would meet the approval of the President? I refer to the provision repealing the 10 per cent tax on State banks for a term. I think myself that it is an admirable proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the first place, I am not one of those who think it the duty of a Senator to find out what the President wants before he legislates. I did not consult the President about the amendment I offered to the other bill. I wish to carry my own part of the responsibility; I do not know as to the attitude of the President, but I have too much confidence in him to suspect for a moment that he would veto such a measure.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I understood the other day—perhaps I was mistaken—when the Senator with others and myself were in conference with the President, that he would not agree to anything of that sort.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have never made it a practice to confer with the President and discuss his views. I think he should always be left to present them himself to the public, but I will say to my colleague that I did not understand the President to commit himself to any such proposition.

Mr. WEST. It may be that I was mistaken, but I so understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Going one step further, I will say that I did understand that the President was opposed to any permanent repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State banks; but I did not understand that he was opposed to a suspension of the tax guarded, as I have suggested, for 12 months or 8 months; but I would not hesitate a moment to support a measure if I thought it was right, even if I believed the President would veto it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have a right to pass bills over his head, have we not, under the Constitution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not hesitate a moment to do as the Senators on the other side of the aisle did two years ago, when they carried through the Senate a motion to pass the immigration bill, with its restrictions and its literacy test, over the then President, and Democrats and Republicans joined to pass it over his veto. I think they did right then. I really think it is fortunate now and then for Congress to legislate by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bill which the Senator just mentioned was a very meritorious bill. I refer to the immigration bill. The Senator will remember that the motion to pass the bill over the President's veto did not prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It did pass the Senate, however, I think.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But it did not become a law. A similar bill—practically the identical bill—is now pending, and it is just as good a bill now as it was then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I am going to vote for it in every stage that it comes before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would not this be a very good stage to bring it before the Senate and talk about it and insist upon its passage?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be gratified to see that done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know of any bill in which the people of the country generally are more interested than they are in that bill, and yet we are about to adjourn here presumably without any attention being paid to it whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be delighted myself to stay here a couple of weeks longer and take up that bill and debate it and pass it. It is not, however, pressing so much just at this time, because the European war has stopped immigration. Before the war began, I will say to the Senator, that in the Democratic caucus any effort to exclude that bill from consideration at this session was defeated, and it was left to be taken up by the Democratic caucus, to be added to the list of measures we then contemplated considering. The only reason it has not again been pressed is the fact that the European war having practically suspended immigration for the time being it was not an emergency measure.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. JONES. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I read into the RECORD a short time ago what purported to be an interview with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who has charge of that bill, in which he was quoted as saying that he proposed to insist upon the consideration and passage of that bill before adjournment. I have been waiting anxiously for some activity along that line.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as I am personally concerned, I am ready to join with a majority of the Senate to vote against adjournment this evening, and go on with that measure to-morrow.

Mr. President, I wish to beg Senators not to agree to adjournment as this matter stands now. Give us at least an opportunity to hear from these measures in the House. What I would like for you to do would be not to adjourn until we have really done something substantial. I think it is more important to save 4,000,000 people, white and black, both, who have practically nothing but their teams, from having their little swept away from them, than it is to elect a Republican or even a Democratic Senator or two or three Members of the House of either party.

I did not feel badly the other night when some of my colleagues grew so excited about some of us being recalcitrants. Their mock heroics really amused me. They did not know on what thin ice they were treading; they did not know how much more to us were the suffering people whom we were trying to serve than were the appalling threats of Senators.

I beg the Senate not to adjourn and not to agree to this resolution. If the report came from the House now bringing with it these measures, I would be ready to suspend my remarks and would be glad to participate in their consideration. I do not mean by this that I expect to-day to emulate the example of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and send for my dressing gown and slippers to wrap up at 11 o'clock to-night while somebody else occupies the floor. I do not mean that he did it, either. I saw the statement in the press, and if he did it, it was all right. I do not mean to criticize him if he did do it. It would not appall me at all to have my colleagues criticize me if I did it. If I thought I could obtain legislation by occupying this floor without leaving my feet until this time to-morrow, being several years younger than the distinguished Senator from Ohio, I think I would stay on my feet.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In view of the fact that on that side, as on this, there seems to be a disposition to credit the statement in the press to the effect that the efforts I made to bring up the immigration bill were a joke, I now move, as there is no bill pending——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a bill pending—the conference report on the war-revenue bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I serve notice now that immediately upon the conclusion of the debate on this conference report I shall move to take up the immigration bill. I hope those who are of the same opinion as myself—that it is very necessary that that bill should become a law, in view of the fact that the war may cease at any time and we will be deluged with a flood of those unfortunate ones, and we are unfortunate ourselves—will vote to take it up.

I serve notice now that immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of this conference report I shall call for a vote on taking up the immigration bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall cordially support the motion of the Senator from South Carolina when he makes it, because I should be delighted to see the immigration bill considered and acted upon at this session of Congress. There has not been an hour since the Congress met when it would have failed to give me pleasure to vote for that measure. I am for it, and I am stronger for it now than I was 12 months ago. The more I think about it, the more I consider it, the more I study the illiteracy or the literacy clause, whichever it is called, the more I am satisfied that that is perhaps the only way we have to protect this country against a great flood of men unprepared to be assimilated by our people.

I am not opposed to immigration. I am glad to see those prepared to join with us to carry with us our burdens come among us and enjoy our privileges, but I think it only fair that as we seek to train, at least with common-school education, our own boys and girls we should require some educational qualifications from those who come from other countries. It is scarcely fair to our country to carry the burden as it is carried now.

I know it is claimed that we will not keep out the criminals, that we will not keep out the objectionables, by this literacy test. It is difficult to obtain any plan that accomplishes it thoroughly. It is almost impossible to devise a way that would bring about complete success. The best plan that has been found, I think, is the literacy test. Unless we have heard from the House in the meantime, and the House has acted upon the currency bills and the warehouse bill, so that we can perfect them and pass them, unless we have those measures before us ready to act, I shall support with great pleasure, the motion of the Senator from South Carolina. I hope this Congress, at any rate, will not adjourn next winter until we have made law, substantially as it is now written, the immigration bill.

I take this occasion to say these few words in its behalf, because, under our rules, when the motion is made to take it up, that motion is not debatable. I present my views in favor of that motion in advance in order that Senators may have the benefit, if it is a benefit to them, of knowing the importance of voting for the measure when it is presented.

I believe, under the rules, the joint resolution for final adjournment can not be considered to-day; that under the rules a point of order made upon it carries it over until to-morrow. I am opposed to the passage of that resolution until we have an opportunity of voting upon these House measures. I would almost be justified in an effort to detain the Senate indefinitely and do what I could to prevent adjournment at all, in view of the situation in the State which I represent. It is not my purpose at this time to enter into such an effort. I have talked twice as long as I had any idea of talking. I really expected to occupy the floor for a short time only; but as there seemed to be nothing else before the Senate, and as I have usually addressed myself exclusively to the subject before the Senate, and have not before indulged in any wandering from the immediate subject under consideration, I feel excused for varying just this once from a practice that perhaps is better than the one I have followed to-day.

Mr. VARDAMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia a single question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia, if the currency bill passes the House, and its terms are not such as to relieve the situation, whether he proposes to offer an amendment to it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I propose to ask for a conference and to seek in that conference to obtain some measure of relief along the lines I have been presenting to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Along the line of the temporary repeal of the tax on State bank notes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and I have been presenting the matter to the Senate at this time, because I did not think this time was as precious as the time would be a little later on. I thought I would save discussion at an hour when Senators wanted to get away, and occupy time that otherwise would not be occupied.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I yield to no man upon this floor in my devotion to the people of the South, and my very great desire to promote their interests surpasses the power of language to express. They are suffering from a depression of business which is without a parallel in the industrial history of this Republic, brought about by causes for which they are in no way responsible. The utmost care and thought have been given to the consideration of that question. All the strength of mind and soul and will which I possess has been devoted to the solution of it. A large number and variety of guesses and solutions have been proposed. Nothing new, I imagine, can be said upon the subject. We have swept the horizon of expediency to find a way out of the difficult situation. The American Congress is fully informed as to the condition in the South. The Congress understands the limitations of its powers—the will to do has been manifested, and I think the legislative mind is made up. In other words, Mr. President, the matter has been discussed in all of its phases, and every sane mind has been brought to see it in its due proportions.

I thought that the only practical solution was offered in the amendment presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which was the work of the southern Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. That matter was presented to the Senate. It was within the power of southern Senators to have either made it a part of the revenue bill, and in that way to have secured relief for the southern farmer, or to have prevented any additional burden of taxation being put upon him. Certain Senators failed to improve that opportunity, and I believe when they did they failed in the performance of a sacred duty, not only to the people of the South but to the people of the entire Nation.

Having failed in that, having refused to use the advantage which we had—having thrown away the only lever we had to raise the farmer from the depths of poverty to which misfortune has suddenly reduced him—with all due respect to Senators, the further discussion of this question is but sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. You can not fool the people. They understand the situation here as well as you do. You can not do anything along the line proposed in that amendment now. It is too late; and you know it. It has the opposition of the White House and the Secretary of the Treasury; and every Democrat upon this floor knows that that opposition is sufficient to defeat the measure. Then, why all this talk about keeping Congress in session? I can not believe that you are ingenuous in your protestations. You might stay here for six months, and then, in the end, you will do the bidding of the President. The revenue bill has passed. You have no lever by which to coerce anybody, and therefore no good will come from the further consideration of this question; and I want to say that I for one am in favor, in the language of the plowman, of "taking out."

I am tired of listening to discussions which "keep the word of promise to the farmer's ear and break it to his hopes." I have done all that I could. I have gone to the end of my tether. I have given my voice and vote; I have given my counsel. I have given the subject the best thought of which I am capable, and, so far as I am concerned, I am through with the fight for this session. I am in favor of voting for the resolution brought in from the House to adjourn at 6 o'clock this evening, and I sincerely hope that we may go home, and when we get there we may be brought to realize, I trust, that all political power in this country is, or should be, derived from the consent of the governed. I sincerely hope that gentlemen who threw away the opportunity to serve their constituents may yet be brought to understand that it is better to serve their constituents and deserve the plaudit, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," than to enjoy the patronage of presidential approval.

It is said, Mr. President, that in the great wrestling contest between Anteus and Hercules that Anteus, who derived all of his strength from Mother Earth, was, as long as he could keep his feet upon the ground, a foeman worthy of his great antagonist. The fight was fast and furious, the issue doubtful; but at an unguarded moment, by a trick of the wary wrestler, Hercules raised Anteus from the earth and, with the source of his strength cut off, suspended in midair, he crushed him as you would crush an eggshell. I hope that when Senators go back to their respective homes that they may be brought to understand that all strength and authority which they have is derived from their constituents, that they are servants and not masters, and that their responsibility is to the people. And when they shall come back with this new inspiration and take up the thread of work which they are now about to lay down that they may have the courage in their hearts, with the approval of their intellects, to vote their honest conviction for the protection of the people's interest, and be able at all times in the performance of their official functions to rise equal to every emergency, to reach the full stature of exalted American statesmanship, and spurn "with contumely that power which only crooks a coward's knee and forces from the lips of fear the lies of praise." God give us more independence and a deeper sense of our obligations and personal responsibility to the people.

I honor the man born and taught,
That serveth not another's will,
Whose armor is his honest thought
And simple truth his utmost skill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I sympathize very much with the situation in the South. I was willing to take an exceptional course to assist them in their trouble and distress, and I voted for the proposition they presented to us a few days ago. I think it very strange that our Government seems to be unable to take care of a situation so deplorable as that in the South seems to be. It seems that there is something wrong with the Government if we can not protect in cases of emergency 20,000,000 of people and a vast expanse of territory so afflicted as they are, which affliction will be visited also on the other parts of the country and become a Nation-wide calamity. I am willing, as I said, to accept exceptional measures—emergency measures, if you please, measures to meet a peculiar and particular situation—without insisting upon the regular lines that we usually follow in the case of important legislation, and I have very much hoped that something might be done to help out that situation.

I do hope that some good will come out of the situation that afflicts them. I hope that those people will realize that there is something fundamentally wrong in the condition in their territory; and while I am not going to discuss a proposition upon which we differ and upon which they have always taken a different view from myself, I do want to suggest to them that they should consider in this hour of distress and extremity the fundamental proposition that I think, if carried out, would save them from a situation like this hereafter. I believe that what they need in the South is a diversity of their industries. They ought now to be in a position to manufacture the clothing of almost all the world. They have the raw product, and there is no reason why they should not manufacture it into the manufactured product and have the diverse industries that come up under a system of protection to American industries, which has in its practical application demonstrated its benefits and its necessity for the people of this country.

However we may denounce and condemn what we may consider as a principle that looks to some special benefit, yet it does seem to me that the present situation has demonstrated the practical necessity and the practical importance of the application of this system to all sections of the country. I hope that a party fetish will not lead the people to disregard what I think is fundamentally necessary to insure their prosperity and guarantee them against any recurrence of the present unfortunate condition. The people themselves who are so vitally interested in their own prosperity should not permit party prejudices to blind them to the adoption of a policy that is necessary to national stability and prosperity. If their representatives will not give heed to the situation, the people have it in their power to see that a change is made.

Mr. President, in my judgment the bill that is embraced in this conference report is an absolutely unnecessary measure. This Congress has appropriated many millions of dollars more than ever before. That money has not yet been expended. The appropriations were largely made before this emergency came upon us, and in my judgment all that is necessary to tide over this situation is for the administration to practice economy in the expenditure of the money that we have appropriated. As to many of the items for which we have appropriated, no suffering or distress or interference with the administration of the Government will result if the expenditure is delayed for some time. So, instead of going down into the pockets of the people to take $100,000,000 from them, instead of imposing this tremendous burden upon them, under the conditions and circumstances from which we are all suffering, and when they are less able to bear it than for many years, it seems to me it would be far better for us to expend this money more economically, and withhold expenditure whenever it can be done without injury or without affecting the efficiency of the service, and, as necessity demands, slowly take from the banks the $75,000,000 of money, or a part of it, that the Government has deposited there on call to meet the demands of the Government. This money, if taken from the banks, is not taken to the Treasury to hoard there, but to be sent out in the ordinary business transactions of the Government, and it will eventually get around again to the banks. So I think this legislation is not only unnecessary but unwise at the present time and under the present conditions.

There is one other point that I desire to notice for just a moment. It seems that while this conference report is up we can take up various subjects, and yet what I want to refer to has, to a certain extent, a connection with this proposition.

A terrific war is raging 3,000 miles away. The President in clear, concise, elegant, and proper language has urged upon our people strict neutrality. His partisans, through the press and on the stump, are loudly proclaiming his wise and patriotic action, and because we are not involved in this struggle the people are urged to stand by the President at the polls. I would not take from the President a single meed of praise for the wisdom with which he has been and is handling this delicate situation. It is a slur upon the intelligence, humanity, and patriotism of our people, however, to insinuate that the President is the only man who appreciates our duty toward those engaged in this conflict and dares to do it. He has acted wisely and patriotically. Who would have acted differently? Of our 90,000,000 of people, every man at all worthy to be President of the United States would have done exactly as he has done. There is no issue over this. There is no partisanship in our support of the President in this matter. You do not need to ask anyone to stand by him in this. We are all with him, we are all behind him. In matters of this kind we cease being partisans and become patriots. It is only partisan despair that leads to this appeal, and it ought to feel the resentment of every honest, patriotic man.

We must preserve our neutrality. From every nation involved have come to our shores some of her best sons and daughters, who have become loyal American citizens. They have not forgotten their mother country, and we do not ask them to do so. We do not ask them to love their mother country less, but we have a right to insist that they love the country of their adoption more. We should do nothing to disturb our concord at home and nothing to embroil us abroad. We can rather afford to overlook technical infringements of neutral rights than endanger the peace of our people. We would better not insist upon technical rights in the midst of the hellish passions of war than be drawn into the terrible cataclysm.

The greatest danger to us comes from the greed of men. Insidiously advantage is being taken of the war situation to secure legislation of benefit to special interests regardless of the safety of the Nation. Danger threatens now from legislation which the President urged, and which many of us feared would lead to complications and danger. With no ships to carry our products when the war broke out, some one proposed to admit foreign-built ships and ships flying a foreign flag to American registry and to sail them under the American flag. They got the ear of the President. He thought it a good thing and urged the legislation. A bill was passed under which the ships of England, France, Germany, or any other country might change her flag and sail under the American flag, and the President was given authority to suspend the laws which have been in operation for over a hundred years requiring watch officers on ships flying our flag to be American citizens. Almost immediately upon its passage, with hundreds of American officers idle and available, he suspended for seven years these laws, and German ships and English, with their foreign officers, have been placed under our flag. Ships heretofore sailing under the flag of one of the belligerents, manned by her crew, and officered by her citizens, are now sailing under the American flag with the same officers and crew and engaged in the same business as heretofore. What could be expected from such a situation? Nothing but trouble and embarrassment can come to us from it. It is coming. Already the honored chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee has uttered a clarion note of warning to other nations not to interfere with vessels flying the American flag. Why? Simply because foreign nations are not respecting the simple transfer of flags on ships of commerce to escape the dangers of war. Seizure after seizure is being made of ships registered under this emergency law. International complications are arising. French men-of-war are stopping American ships and, without protest from British crews, are seizing German citizens who now claim to be Americans and requiring their parole. British warships are seizing former German ships now transferred to our flag without hesitation, and the right of search is again being practiced. This comes not from our failure to stand by the President but from the emergency legislation passed over the warnings of Republicans. Who owns the Metapan, the Brindilla, the John D. Rockefeller, and the other vessels that have been seized? The Standard Oil Co., the United Fruit Co., and the Steel Co. Because it was cheaper to sail under a foreign flag in time of peace they spurned the flag of their country. When war threatened their property and profits they come under it for protection from danger. An insult to our flag will be resented by a united people, but it should not be made the haven of greed. It would be a shameful travesty upon our intelligence, upon our enlightenment, upon our civilization, upon our patriotism, and upon our humanity if the avarice and greed of these great companies shall embroil us in this harvest of death and ruin and bring to our fair land sorrow, bloodshed, death, devastated homes, and broken hearts, and all the other terrors of war. All the crimes of the damned will pale into insignificance before the guilt of those who may bring about such a calamity. Nineteen precious American lives have been sacrificed in a vain endeavor to make a besotted murderer and assassin salute our flag; let us not permit the greed of mammon to hide behind its honor at the expense of horrid war. Yes, Mr. President, we are with the President as patriots in this crisis. Our counsel will be against any step that may lead to complications, that may invite aggression, that may place us in a questionable position. We will in every way aid him to keep us out of trouble and will counsel and warn him against acts and legislation we fear will bring complications. Surely he wants our aid and our help, and he shall have it. Often it has been said on this floor that partisanship stops on our borders. It should do so. In domestic affairs a reasonable partisanship is the mainspring of good government; in our foreign relations it has no place. Let us fight out our domestic differences upon their merits, but let it not be suggested or intimated even remotely that we are anything but a united people behind our President, no matter who he may be, in maintaining our neutrality and preserving peace with all the nations of the earth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Once in a while, Mr. President, I am compelled to come to the defense of the Democratic Party and of good Democrats on the other side of the Chamber, and I feel it is my duty to do so to-day in answering the very severe arraignment of his own party that was made a few minutes ago by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. I think probably a majority of the Senators whom he so heartily condemned on that side voted against the measure which he stated to them might result in their being severely criticized at home. The Senator, I think, has been very unjust to his colleagues in that statement. The Senator omitted to say that the scheme which he had before the Senate was not the assistance of the credit of the Government for the cotton interest, but a proposition demanding that the Government should go into the business of purchasing a commodity to bull its price, and he intimates that some of those who voted against that proposition will have their constituents to face. I expect to face mine, Mr. President, but I could not face them if I had voted for a proposition of that kind.

Two years ago my people, through their representatives in Congress, were appealing to the Senator from Mississippi and his colleagues to defend us against a condition of suffering which we had all of the days from 1891 up to 1897. We appealed in vain. Reciprocity was forced upon us, and we were only saved, not by the patriotism of the American people, but by the patriotic sentiment of the Canadian people for their own country.

We showed to the Senator from Mississippi how we had suffered during all those long years. It was a suffering that was tenfold worse than you are suffering in the South to-day, when we had to crawl into our sod shanties, kill our cattle for food because we could get nothing for them, and take the hay that was intended for them, twist it up into a roll, and burn it to keep ourselves warm during the winter; when we could get nothing for the produce that we were attempting to raise each year and were compelled to call upon the legislature of the State for a law that would enable the State to advance the seed wheat for the next season. All these things were presented to my friend from the State of Mississippi as a sure result of what would follow again with the same kind of a law; but he heeded it not, and he voted to put us upon the free list in every one of our products, and as sure as the sun shall rise to-morrow we will suffer beyond any words of expression the moment this war is over and conditions return to the normal.

The Senator has not helped us out; and when I go back to my people and tell them that the Senator from Mississippi has voted a return of that condition upon our people and that the same Senator has then asked me to vote for a proposition that you will tax these same people in my State——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment—to purchase all the products that he produces at a good, fair price, I confess I would not be able to face them and say that I had so imposed upon them; although I am willing, as I have said before, to use the credit of the whole Government to help them out, to secure for them a loan that will tide them over the hard times. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hesitate to ask the Senator a question, because the proposition he made was so generous, his willingness to join us in putting through this matter was so hearty, that if I had not already risen to ask it, I would not ask it, thinking of that statement by him. But what I wanted to say is this: If the high tariff taxes have enabled your people to make us pay more for the very stuff that we bought from them for so many years than we would have had to pay in the free markets of the world, while we were selling our cotton in the free markets of the world, you might have been willing to have helped us for that reason. I want to add that the suggestion of the Senator as to what he would have done would have helped. I think that must be the reason.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator asked me that question, because it has been answered in the year 1914. If the enhanced price of the raw product of the farmer has increased the cost to the ultimate consumer of the finished product, then it necessarily and logically follows that taking off that tariff and reducing his price must necessarily reduce the cost of the finished product to the consumer. But looking over the facts, they are just as I have always contended; they do not affect the consumer at all; and you have not paid any more for the finished product by reason of the little better price that we have received than you would have paid. You paid the same 5 cents for a loaf of bread when wheat was 45 cents a bushel that you paid when it was a dollar, and when you took away the tariff on our barley you did not reduce the price of your beer by any means.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to disclaim any knowledge about the price of beer or its value.

Mr. McCUMBER. When you took away the tariff on our oats you drove the price down, but you did not lessen the cost of a package of Quaker Oats. On the contrary, they seem to be going up; and while our beef products have gone down a little despite the war, I notice that steak is going up.

By being more prosperous ourselves we have helped you to be prosperous. We bought more of your cotton products. To the extent that we can keep all of our people prosperous and give our own mills an opportunity to keep open and our laborers an opportunity to find employment, just to that extent as we benefit our own people instead of those across the ocean we are able to help you out, and our protection is mutual.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want to say to him that he does not give us the information when he talks about the Quaker Oats and the price of 5 cents for a loaf of bread. We buy our flour. A great many of us do our own work and make our own bread.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right; I will meet you there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the relative price of flour and the relative price of corn that are necessary to carry the proper information.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator there. When we got the benefit of from 10 to 12 cents better for our wheat than the Canadian got for his when it was from 10 to 12 cents a bushel above what you would call the world's level of prices, in a section that constituted the great spring wheat raising section of the United States, flour did not change by reason of 10 cents above or 10 cents below that average. If that wheat should go down 10 cents to-day, your flour would not go down. If it would go up 10 cents a bushel, your flour would not rise in price. There is a steady market for about this much of a price, but that 10 cents a bushel very often makes the difference between failure and success to us upon the farm. That is the answer to that question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to apologize to the Senate because I expect to speak about the bill which is now before the Senate. I want to call attention to one or two things in the conference report, and perhaps elicit a little information from some of those in charge of it.

The bill as it passed the Senate contained a provision in it providing for a tax of 5 cents a gallon on rectified whisky. I understand that tax has been eliminated in the conference report. If I am not right I would be glad to have the Senator from North Carolina correct me.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. As the bill passed the House originally it had no tax whatever upon whisky, so that the 5 cents a gallon put on in the Senate was the only provision of the bill levying any tax on distilled spirits. It seems to me that this is a small tax of 5 cents a gallon, but in the aggregate it would raise a great deal of revenue, and I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina how much revenue it was estimated would be raised by this tax of 5 cents a gallon on whisky.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was estimated that it would yield revenue to the amount of about $5,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Although the tax itself, of course, is very small, a tax that in my judgment could be borne and would be borne without any injury to any person. Most taxes are burdensome, but if a tax on intoxicating liquor has a tendency to decrease the consumption, and I presume it would, it is a benefit even to the man who consumes the liquor. If he will get just a little less of whisky for a dime or a quarter than he used to get, he himself will be benefited. So everybody except the man who has the liquor for sale, and perhaps I ought not to except him, will be benefited in reality by this tax. It is an exception to the ordinary tax. The man who has liquor for sale will probably sell just a little less for the same amount of money, so that he will not be injured.

It seems to me, therefore, that it is one of the taxes which, if you are going to have a tax bill levying a special tax, ought to have been retained in the bill. As the bill comes back to the Senate in the shape of a conference report it will lack fifteen or twenty million dollars, if the estimates are accurate, of raising the amount of money that the President said he desired should be raised and that the House and Senate have undertaken to raise by this special taxation.

A peculiar thing about this particular tax on whisky was that immediately after the bill was reported from the Committee on Finance it became known, I heard it everywhere, that the Senate would have to recede from its amendment levying a tax of 5 cents a gallon on whisky. Immediately when the conferees were appointed it was announced and was known, I think, generally, that the House conferees would under no circumstances agree to the Senate amendment providing for a tax of 5 cents a gallon on whisky.

I have been told by what I believe to be very reliable authority that there have been one or two men in Washington during the entire session representing the so-called Whisky Trust or the whisky interests, and I rose principally for the purpose of calling the attention of the lobby committee to it. I see the chairman of the committee is not in the Chamber at the present time. I wanted to inquire whether the lobby committee had made any investigation or any attempted investigation in regard to anyone lobbying for the whisky interests. It seems to me it would be a very interesting and profitable investigation for them to pursue.

Mr. OVERMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. I see the chairman has come in now, and I will repeat my question. I was asking whether the lobby investigating committee has had its attention called to it or has had any witnesses before it who it was claimed were lobbying for the Whisky Trust or the whisky interests?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know of any lobby for the Whisky Trust. There were suggestions made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that some investigation be made of a lobby interested against the trust bill or some provisions in it and he desired witnesses to be subpœnaed. We agreed to do that when we come back in December. I have heard nothing about the whisky lobby. We expect to make our report, however, next Christmas unless something else is disclosed. If the Senator has any witnesses that he desires to have subpœnaed I would be glad to take it up in December and investigate it further.

Mr. NORRIS. I will give the chairman the names of several persons whom I hope he will subpœna before the committee. Of course, I have no personal knowledge of it. I got the names of several men given to me from a very respectable and reliable source.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not ask the Senator. He can give it to me privately if he does not want to state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps I had better do that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Or, I will say, if any other Senator knows of any lobbyist at all we would be glad to investigate it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am informed that a man by the name of Lewis has been in the city stopping at the New Willard Hotel during the entire session, and that he is accompanied by an attorney who is interested and has been here to see that no tax was placed on whisky. Robert Crain, of Baltimore, is another person who should be subpœnaed. I understand he draws a large salary from the Whisky Trust and that he looks after legislative matters relating to whisky.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad to have the information, and I will say to the Senator that he will be subpœnaed before our committee.

Mr. NORRIS. As I looked at it, inasmuch as the bill as it comes from the conference is going to be short in revenue from what it was desired to raise; inasmuch as the tax on whisky provided in the bill was only 5 cents a gallon; inasmuch as that possibly under no circumstances, as I view it, at least, will it harm anyone in anyway—from the man who drinks the whisky to the man who makes it—it seems to me it ought to have been left in the bill, assuming that we should have a bill of this kind. Of course, I have been one of those who believe that this bill was unnecessary, and I do not want to be classed as one who would be opposed to extra taxation if I thought our Government would be embarrassed without it; but from the amount of money that we have deposited in the banks, and from the fact that a part of the difficulty, at least, as I look at it, and it is only a part of the difficulty—the European war—was temporary in its nature, and in my judgment the conditions brought on, as far as they were brought on by that war, would be relieved perhaps entirely within a short time. I think they are even now getting gradually better, and that we should hesitate in our attempt to levy additional taxation upon the people.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I do not rise to say anything as to the policy of the bill the Senator has been talking about or any feature of it, but to say just a word with respect to the intimation made by the Senator that some one had been lobbying, presumably, I imagine, with the Committee on Finance, against the imposition of a tax on whisky. I am a member of the Finance Committee, and was a member of the conference between the two Houses on that bill. I wish to say in the most emphatic terms that neither Mr. Lewis—I believe the Senator mentioned some one by that name—nor any other person, as far as I can recall—I think I will put no qualification on it and say with unqualified emphasis that no person ever addressed a word to me, verbally or in writing, about the tax on whisky, either as a member of the Finance Committee or as a member of the conference committee. Whether any other Senator was approached on that subject I do not know; but if he was, I never heard of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri understands that when I say there was a lobby here or that there is some indication that there is one in favor of or against any particular legislation it does not imply that I am casting any reflection upon a Member of the Senate or the House. If that be true, if that is to be drawn as a conclusion, then every Member of Congress has a charge to make against the President of the United States, who at the beginning and before a committee was appointed openly and publicly charged that there was a lobby on various things. Whether it is whisky or whether it is some other thing that a man is lobbying for, it does not follow, as a matter of fact, that he is engaged in anything that is dishonorable or disreputable. There are men—and I presume they would be called lobbyists—favoring and opposing various kinds of legislation. They have a right to be here. I am not saying that the whisky men have not a right to favor or oppose by representatives here any legislation that they want to enact or want to defeat; but the very fact that this tax of 5 cents a gallon was put on in the Senate by the Finance Committee and approved by the Senate ought to be a pretty good argument that I am not charging the Senate Finance Committee with having been influenced by a lobby, because they put the tax on; and I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am charging anything wrong against the House committee. Lobbyists do not do their business that way if they are shrewd. It is true that all the facts that were developed by the lobby investigation only, as far as I know, disclose that there was one Member of Congress who had been guilty of practices or conduct that were not perfectly honorable, although a great many lobbies had been discovered and exposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a rather candid question here? Does not the Senator believe that every citizen of the United States whose interest is affected one way or another by Federal legislation has a right, either by telegraph, mail, or personal presence, to present his side of the case; and ought we to attempt to discourage the right of a citizen personally to come to Washington and present reasons why he thinks this bill ought not to pass as affecting his interest, or why a certain tax upon his industry might be injurious and unjust?

Mr. NORRIS. I have said in substance the same thing; that is, I have answered the Senator's question before he asked it. I will say that we ought, if anything, to encourage the citizen to let his wishes be known in any way he sees fit that is honorable and fair. At the same time everyone knows, and I think the Senator from North Dakota will be one of the first to admit, that all that ought to be public and aboveboard. If we were justified in investigating the lobby at all, while it was perfectly proper to go into every investigation or every effort that had been made by anyone either in favor of or against contemplated legislation, it does not follow, because we are going to investigate and find a man favoring or opposed to legislation, that we are going to brand him as being dishonorable or anything of that kind by any means. I presume the Senator himself went on the witness stand in that investigation and was asked what he knew about it. I think they unfolded some conditions and circumstances that added a great deal to the purity of the atmosphere around Washington. I think they did good work. They exposed some things, some methods, that ought to have been exposed; and while they are doing that I should like to see this committee say whether it is true that there has been anyone here representing the interests of the Whisky Trust. It is a little different being here and representing a combination of that kind from coming here in the capacity of a merchant or a farmer or a business man respecting some particular legislation that may more or less affect his business or his trade or occupation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator ought not to be alarmed about that little trifle of a whisky tax of 5 cents a gallon. I think there was a worse thing happened in the bill, and that was to relieve the automobile manufacturer. The House passed the bill taxing them, and if there ever was an industry in this country that could bear to be taxed, it is the men who are earning millions out of that industry and are now having a good market for their product in Europe. The little whisky tax seems picayunish in connection with that automobile tax.

Mr. NORRIS. The little whisky tax would have raised $5,000,000; and, as I have said, it would not have hurt anybody, but would have really been beneficial—that is an exception to the general rule—it would have practically benefited the ultimate consumer, who would get less for his money. As a rule, taxes fall most heavily and are most burdensome upon the consumer. The automobile tax has nothing to do with the whisky tax or with the proposition to investigate the whisky lobby. A tax on whisky should be in this bill, and the circumstances surrounding its elimination from the bill may lead to interesting information if the lobby committee will investigate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. Unless I can secure a transfer, I will withhold my vote, unless it becomes necessary for me to vote to constitute a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was called). The occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is absent. He will therefore withhold his vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and my inability to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote. If necessary to make a quorum, I desire to be counted as present.

Mr. McCUMBER (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. GRONNA]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." If my vote becomes necessary to make a quorum, I am at liberty to vote, and shall then vote; otherwise I will withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." If it becomes necessary for me to vote in order to constitute a quorum, I shall then take the liberty of voting.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (when his name was called). I should have been pleased to have voted for the imposition of a whisky tax of 5 cents a gallon, and I should have been glad to have voted for a tax on automobiles——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But as I can not vote for either of those taxes——

Mr. BRYAN. I raise the point of order that a Senator can not address the Senate while the roll is being called.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. As I can not vote for either of those taxes without voting against the bill, I will vote "yea."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DIL-

LINGHAM] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Being unable to procure a transfer, I am obliged to withhold my vote unless it be necessary to make a quorum, in which case I shall vote

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but there is an understanding between us that, if it is necessary to make a quorum, I may vote. If, upon the Secretary's tally, my vote is necessary to make a quorum, I vote "yea"; if not, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURTON. I am paired with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say, as I said this morning, that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce that on this question my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. Being advised that the roll call has not yet developed a quorum I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The Secretary proceeded to recapitulate the vote, and recapitulated the yeas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to be recorded in the affirmative, having the right to vote to make a quorum, as I understand there is not a quorum. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, as I understand there is not a quorum——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will decline to recognize any other Senator until the announcement is made.

The Secretary concluded recapitulating the vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it being necessary to make a quorum, I desire to be recorded in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the vote to adopt the conference report, the yeas are 32 and the nays are 11—not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky desire to vote?

Mr. JAMES. I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the name of the Senator from Kentucky.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. JAMES, and he voted "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Under the circumstances I desire that my vote be recorded. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Under the circumstances, my vote being necessary to make a quorum, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask, as a matter of inquiry from the Chair, if there are any Senators present who have——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator from Missouri addressing the Chair?

Mr. STONE. I am addressing the Chair. My inquiry is to this effect: Are there not Senators present who have announced that they could not vote for one reason or another, but who under the rules which we have been following could be counted to make a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Several Senators have voted since the Chair made the last announcement. The Chair will inspect the roll call to determine just exactly what condition it is in, and if then the contingency should arise we will dispose of it when we get to it.

The result was announced, as follows:

ADDRESS ON JUDICIAL RECALL.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday there was ordered to be printed as a Senate document an address on "Government by judges," delivered by Chief Justice Walter Clark, of the North Carolina Supreme Court. As an accompaniment to that, I have here an address delivered before the State Bar Association of Missouri by Rome G. Brown, entitled "The dilemma of the judicial recall advocates." I ask that it may be printed as a public document.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from North Dakota will be granted. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of responding to that proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator could not respond until the Chair had submitted it to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that it was necessary to wait for the Chair to submit it to the Senate; all that was necessary was to meet the proposition, and I do not think that it is necessary for the Chair to submit it at all. However that may be—preserving the dignity of the Chair—I do not think that it is well to have every sort of miscellaneous literature——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable. Does the Senator object?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is now stating the nature of the objection, and is stating why——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is very easily done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I had been present I would have objected to the original proposition to which the paper presented by the Senator from North Dakota, as I understand, is an answer. I now object to this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I am sorry the Senator objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session, which was on page 1, line 12, after the word "October," to insert: ": Provided, That the session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be paid hereunder for the entire month of October, and a sufficient sum is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the adjournment resolution, which came over from the House, be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (H. Con. Res. 51) as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 22d day of October, 1914, at 6 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. SMITH of Michigan addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6060, Calendar No. 297, known as the immigration bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that the adjournment resolution can not be supplanted by a motion of that sort. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether there is on the President's desk a resolution coming over from the House authorizing the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President for the purpose of ascertaining whether he has any further communication to make to Congress?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a House resolution to that effect on the Vice President's desk.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to know whether action is now necessary before the adoption of the motion to adjourn is disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A simple resolution providing for the appointment of such a committee may be adopted by the Senate in the event the Senate concurs in the resolution providing for final adjournment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may be indulged a moment, I desire to say that Congress was convened in extraordinary session by the President for the purpose of reducing the tariff, thus exposing American products to foreign competition.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will realize that I am under the duress of the very brief time that remains, if we are going to adjourn at 6 o'clock, and I am compelled to raise the point of order that this motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is perfectly well aware of that; but the Senator from Michigan very rarely abuses the privileges of the Senate, and the Chair conceives that he was addressing himself to the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; if the motion to adjourn is adopted, the other resolution which came over from the House, authorizing the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President, will then be in order, I assume. I dislike very much indeed, if the Chair will indulge me a moment, to vote upon a motion to adjourn until we ascertain whether or not the President has any important matters to lay before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, under the pending resolution, would not adjourn until 6 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For one, I should dislike very much to see Congress adjourn without taking some appropriate action to relieve the cotton States of the South from the deplorable condition now unfortunately surrounding them. We must not acknowledge our utter inability to meet such a grave crisis in the affairs of our countrymen without some remedial legislation upon the part of Congress, and I am keen to know whether or not the President intends to ignore that situation in the South, attributable, as it is, in large part, to the European war and the demoralized condition of the American market by unwise legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is not debatable, except reasonably for the purpose of advising the Chair. Whatever views the Chair might have held about the point of order raised by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], independent of investigation for himself, he must be governed by the precedents of the Senate as the same have been established by the deliberate action of the Senate. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, on the 24th of July, 1897, this situation was presented:

The Vice President (Mr. Hobart) laid before the Senate, for its consideration, the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress at 9 o'clock p. m. this day; when,

Mr. Morgan objected to the consideration of the resolution and raised a point of order, viz, that objection having been made, the resolution, under clause 5, Rule XIV, must lie over one day for consideration.

The Vice President overruled the question of order and decided that the resolution which provided for an adjournment of Congress was a question of privilege, and that the provision of Rule XIV was not applicable thereto.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Allen appealed to the Senate; when, on motion by Mr. Aldrich that the appeal lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 20. So the appeal was laid on the table. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, pp. 2940–2947.)

So the point of order raised by the Senator from Virginia is sustained. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope this resolution will not prevail. It is only an hour and a half until 6 o'clock. The House has certain other important matters before it, which I am exceedingly anxious to see the Senate pass upon before adjournment takes place. I think it would be a great mistake at this time to act upon this resolution. We are not obliged to act upon it at this time. We may hear from the House, and we may find that it will take us longer than an hour and a half to dispose of the bill that the House is considering. The House was in the act of voting at 4 o'clock on two measures that are of great importance. One is the warehouse bill, which provides that parties applying to the Secretary of Agriculture may obtain Government licenses for warehouses. It applies to all staple agricultural products. It is the bill originally passed by the House, amended and passed by the Senate, and amended in the House.

It will be remembered that there was quite a debate upon it in the Senate. It has been changed in a number of important respects by the House. I am not sure that in the language in which the House will pass the bill the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] or the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] will be satisfied with the measure. I do not know whether they have examined the bill as it has been reported by the Committee on Agriculture of the House. The Senator from Minnesota will remember——

Mr. NELSON. I remember that bill very well. I do not know what the House has done with it. Can the Senator inform me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I am not sure that the House bill carries language which would be satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that that part of the bill which relates to the licensing of cotton warehouses in the South is quite satisfactory to me. I think you need it down there. So far as grain warehouses are concerned, we are well provided with them in the Northwest. Our warehouse receipts are accepted by the banks there as security for loans. The terminal warehouses issue final receipts; those warehouses are licensed, and they insure the wheat.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I trust that the rules of the Senate will be enforced. This debate is not in order, and the Chair has ruled that it is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not ruled that debate was not in order, because the question was not raised. Debate can proceed by unanimous consent if no Senator objects.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I raised the point of order that this resolution was not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, a proposition for adjournment sine die, as I understand, is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seems to be no direct precedent on the subject. By analogy it is not debatable, because all the rules we have regarding the question of adjournment, either from day to day or finally, specify that a motion relating to adjournment shall not be debatable. In a commentary upon our rules the digestor says:

> In parliamentary practice, especially in earlier days, it was generally laid down as a rule that "a motion to adjourn is always in order," and that the question must be decided without debate. Few, if any, legislative bodies of to-day hold fast to the first proposition, while all concur that the question is not debatable.

But the Chair assumes that the Senator from Georgia was not filibustering—that he had a statement of high importance to make—and so the Chair was disposed to hear him reasonably.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly have such a statement to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will exercise such discretion as he may have to hear the Senator. For about what length of time does the Senator think he would care to keep the floor? As the Chair is going to hold that the question is not debatable at large, but any statement that the Senator from Georgia would make would be a serious statement, and the Chair feels satisfied it would be made in good faith, he will be glad to hear the Senator, and will concede that much to him so far as the Chair has discretion; but, as a matter of parliamentary law, the Chair is satisfied that the question is not debatable, and if forced to make a ruling at this time, the Chair will so hold.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Chair does not so rule at this time, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia reasonably.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wanted to say, Mr. President, to the Senate that the House has three measures before it, the consideration of which we will cut off if we adopt this adjournment resolution for 6 o'clock. The first is the warehouse bill. As the committee of the House has reported it, it applies to grain as well as to cotton. Mr. President, surely Senators would not wish, after we have been here this long, to press an adjournment at 6 o'clock and cut off action by the Senate on that measure. The House is now trying to get a quorum.

There are two other bills. One of the other bills is a bill recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, and it is a measure of great importance. It provides that the banks, members of reserve associations, may deposit all of their reserves with the reserve banks. This is of vast importance, especially at this time, because it increases the capital of the reserve banks and gives them additional strength to handle the business of the territory falling within their jurisdiction. I trust no motion will pass which would force an adjournment before the House acts upon that measure. I hope the Senate will give us an opportunity to consider it.

The third measure is the bill—and I beg Senators on this side to listen to me—which allows member banks in national currency associations to use their commercial paper up to 75 per cent of their capital as a basis for note issues. This was recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, so that the banks in agricultural sections, which have not the bonds and securities of the banks situated in New York and Boston and Chicago, might use their commercial paper as the basis for currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. We amended it here, it is true, and gave the State banks also this authority. It is of very great importance that this bill be passed before we adjourn. It was through this bill the Secretary of the Treasury claimed that in agricultural States it would be practicable to enlarge the volume of currency to meet the needs of present conditions.

Now, Mr. President, do Senators intend to adjourn or now fix the hour for adjournment, so that those measures can not be considered? Are we obliged to act on this resolution? Has it precedence over all other matters? Is it not a question to be taken up by motion, as other matters before the Senate?

I ask the Chair for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, in its orders heretofore, has treated the motion as a privileged question. It has specifically declared it to be a privileged question by a vote of 36 to 20. Therefore it has precedence over questions that are not privileged questions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, though it is privileged, are we obliged to act upon it instantly?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if a majority of the Senate desires to do otherwise.

Mr. SMITH or Georgia. Then I desire to ask the Chair what character of motion would enable us to postpone the present consideration of this resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To vote it down would be one way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate may not wish to vote it down permanently, but they may wish to know——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same result can be accomplished by laying it on the table, or by a suggested postponement.

Mr. OVERMAN. An amendment would be in order to, say, 12 o'clock to-night, or 11 o'clock to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the resolution is subject to amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I then move that we lay the resolution on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that does not dispose of it. We can take it from the table later, if we desire.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Georgia——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves to lay the pending resolution on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Page	Smith, S. C.

Burton	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter	Swanson
Camden	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Thomas

Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ga.	Williams
James	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia to lay the House concurrent resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 5.30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will not the Senator withdraw that motion, in order that we may have an executive session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate take a recess until 5.30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 5.30 o'clock p. m.

At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be attended to when the Chair signs the enrolled bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think the bill can be signed until the question of a quorum is settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces his signature to an enrolled bill, the title of which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Swanson
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Thomas
Chilton	McCumber	Sheppard	Thornton
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Shields	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Warren
Culberson	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	West
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.	White
Gore	Overman	Smith, Mich.	Williams
James	Page	Smith, S. C.
Jones	Perkins	Stone

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HUGHES, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. ROOT, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SHIVELY, and Mr. VARDAMAN responded to their names when called.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. LEE of Maryland, Mr. MYERS, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. POINDEXTER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask to be recorded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona desires to be recorded as present. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the adjournment resolution be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proper motion would be to take it from the table.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the resolution be taken from the table and laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas was called). The occupant of the chair has a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). In view of my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] and my inability to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]; but in view of the fact that my vote will be necessary to make a quorum, as disclosed on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] and withhold my vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as before and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and for that reason I feel called upon to withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], but under the terms of that pair I have a right to vote on questions of this kind. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], but I have the right to vote if my vote is necessary to make a quorum. Apparently that necessity exists. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I consider myself at liberty, notwithstanding the pair, to vote on this question. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THORNTON (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay," in order to allow the President to get here to sign the bill. Otherwise I would let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Upon reflection, I do not think this is the character of question on which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] would care to have me consider my pair, and I think I really am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I omitted to announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]; but this is the kind of question on which I have a right to vote, and I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GORE. I announce my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and desire to be counted as present if necessary to make a quorum.

The roll call resulted—yeas 12, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Clapp	Norris	Sheppard	Smith, Mich.
Jones	Overman	Shields	Smith, S. C.
Myers	Poindexter	Smith, Ga.	White

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion of the Senator from Georgia the yeas are 12 and the nays 35, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] being present and not voting. The motion is lost.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I now ask that my motion be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate take from the table the concurrent resolution proposing a final adjournment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I do not think that motion is in order. This is a privileged motion—a motion to adjourn without day—and with the exception of a simple motion to adjourn, it can not be supplanted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regrets that he can not take that view of it. He thinks the Senate has control over its own sessions. The Chair feels obligated to submit the motion to the Senate. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former ballot, I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and my inability to secure a transfer, I abstain from voting.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made upon the former roll call, and having an understanding that I may vote at any time my vote is necessary to constitute a quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote, as I am unable to obtain a transfer.

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his named was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement on the preceding roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). With a repetition of the announcement made by me upon the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORE. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and ask to be counted as present.

The motion is lost.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is a motion before the Senate to take the adjournment resolution from the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion can be put to proceed to the consideration of executive business pending the consideration of that motion. A motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is a privileged motion. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORE. I repeat my announcement and ask to be counted as present.

Mr. JAMES. Making the same announcement as on the former roll call, I vote "nay."

THANKS TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he sends to the desk. If there is no objection, it will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 482) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, for the dignified, impartial, and courteous manner in which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Some time during the afternoon a resolution came to the Senate from the House which in terms provided for the appointment of a joint committee to visit the President and inquire of the President if there were other matters of legislation that should be disposed of before adjournment. I should like to inquire what disposition was made of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has been misinformed. No such resolution has been received. The Senate has received a resolution, which the Secretary will now read for his information.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, October 22, 1914.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some communication to make to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the regular sequence a similar resolution will be adopted by the Senate. The Chair takes it for granted that that will be done when the Senate comes to adjourn finally.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to inquire of the Chair, if, in order of precedence, the committee to visit the President would not precede the adjournment resolution instead of following it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice has been universally otherwise.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The inquiry made of the President, as I understand from the resolution, is whether or not he has any communication to make to Congress. Of course, Congress can not act upon any communication after it has adjourned. I think it would be very important to ascertain from the President whether the President is in favor of Congress adjourning without passing one of the bills which the Senator from Georgia has described as pending in the House of Representatives.

Mr. JAMES (and others). Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withdraw my motion to take a recess, in view of the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business was voted upon.

Mr. STONE. There has been business since then. A resolution has been adopted since the motion was voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADDRESS BEFORE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the address of the President of the United States before the American Bar Association on Tuesday last may be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 619).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Florida is granted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask that the address of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, chief justice of the Dominion of Canada, on the "Constitution of Canada," may be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 620).

Mr. ROOT. I ask that the address of Ramulo S. Naon, ambassador from the Argentine Republic to the United States, delivered to-day before the convention of the American Bar Association may be included in the request (S. Doc. No. 618).

Mr. FLETCHER. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. CLAPP submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 483), which was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE, President pro tempore of the Senate, for the dignified, impartial, and courteous manner in which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, October 23, 1914, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 22, 1914.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who dost guide the destiny of men and of nations, to Thee we lift up our hearts in response to the invitation in Thy written word, and in the desire of our souls we come asking that we may receive, seeking that we may find, knocking that the chambers of Thy counsels may be opened unto us, that we may fulfill our destiny as individuals and as a people. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord and the people whom He hath chosen for His own inheritance." Thus may we be Thy people and magnify Thy holy name by the rectitude of our behavior. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

"There shall be levied and assessed against the maker or producer of all wines fortified under the provisions and conforming to the requirements of the sections of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, as amended, and as further amended by this act, a tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him in the fortification of such wines: Provided, however, That the maker or producer of such fortified wines shall, under regulations and suitable bonds, to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, have assessed against him monthly the said tax of 55 cents on each taxable gallon of grape brandy or wine spirits used by him during the preceding month, which assessment shall be paid within 90 days from the date of notice thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as exempting any still wines, cordials, liqueurs, or similar compounds from the payment of any stamp tax provided for in this section.

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations to make effective the provisions of this section.

"That sections 42, 43, 45, 46, and 49 of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by section 68 of an act approved August 28, 1894, and by an act approved June 7, 1906, are further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 42. "'SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juice, to which water may have been added prior to, during, or after fermentation, for the sole purpose of facilitating the fermentation and economical distillation thereof, and shall be held to include the product from grapes or their residues, commonly known as grape brandy, and shall include commercial grape brandy which may have been colored with burnt sugar or caramel; and the pure sweet wine which may be fortified

"'SEC. 45. That under such regulations and official supervision, and upon the execution of such entries and the giving of such bonds, bills of lading, and other security as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, any producer of pure sweet wines as defined by this act may withdraw wine spirits from any special bonded warehouse in original packages or from any registered distillery in any quantity not less than 80 wine-gallons, and may use so much of the same as may be required by him under such regulations, and after the filing of such notices and bonds and the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products and the disposition of the same as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, in fortifying the pure sweet wines made by him, and for no other purpose, in accordance with the foregoing limitations and provisions; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized whenever he shall deem it to be necessary for the prevention of violations of this law to prescribe that wine spirits withdrawn under this section shall not be used to fortify wines except at a certain distance prescribed by him from any distillery, rectifying house, winery, or other establishment used for producing or storing distilled spirits, or for making or storing wines other than wines which are so fortified, and that in the building in which such fortification of wines is practiced no wines or spirits other than those permitted by this regulation shall be stored in any room or part of the building in which fortification of wines is practiced. The use of wine spirits for the fortification of sweet wines under this act shall be under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall provide by regulations the time within which wines so fortified with the wine spirits so withdrawn may be subject to inspection, and for final accounting for the use of such wine spirits and for rewarehousing or for payment of the tax on any portion of such wine spirits which remain not used in fortifying pure sweet wines.

"'SEC. 46. That wine spirits may be withdrawn from special bonded warehouses at the instance of any person desiring to use the same to fortify any wines, in accordance with commercial demands of foreign markets, when such wines are intended for exportation, without the payment of tax on the amount of wine spirits used in such fortification, under such regulations, and after making such entries, and executing and filing with the collector of the district from which the removal is to be made such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security to prevent the use of such wine spirits free of tax otherwise than in the fortification of wine intended for exportation and for the due exportation of the wine so fortified, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and all of the provisions of law governing the exportation of distilled spirits free of tax, so far as applicable, shall apply to the withdrawal and use of wine spirits and the exportation of the same in accordance with this section; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe that wine spirits intended for the fortification of wines under this section shall not be introduced into such wines except under the immediate supervision of an officer of internal revenue, who shall make returns describing the kinds and quantities of wine so fortified, and shall affix such stamps and seals to the packages containing such wines as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Whenever transportation of such wine is to be effected by land carriage the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe such regulations as to sealing packages and vehicles containing the same, and as to the supervision of transportation from the point of departure, which point shall be determined as the place where such wine spirits may be introduced into such wines to the point of destination as may be necessary to insure the due exportation of such fortified wines: Provided, That where, in accordance with regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, wines fortified under the provisions of this act with brandy taxable at 55 cents per proof gallon are exported directly from the winery where fortified, there shall be allowed an abatement or refund of tax equivalent to 55 cents per gallon on each proof gallon of wine spirits contained in such wine at the time of exportation, which amount of wine spirits shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per cent thereof.

"'SEC. 49. That wine spirits used in fortifying wines may be recovered from such wines only on the premises of a duly authorized grape-brandy distiller, and for the purpose of such recovery wine so fortified may be received as material on the premises of such a distiller, on a special permit of the collector of internal revenue in whose district the distillery is located; and the distiller will be held to pay the tax on the product from such wines as will include both the alcoholic strength therein produced by the fermentation of the grape juice and that obtained from the added distilled wine spirits: Provided, That when application for such special permit for redistillation shall be made by the producer of any wines fortified with brandy subject to the tax of 55 cents per proof gallon, before such wine shall have been moved from the premises of the winery where fortified and the redistillation is had under regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, an abatement or refund of the tax assessed against said producer shall be allowed equivalent to 55 cents per proof gallon of brandy contained in said spirits at the time of redistillation, which amount of brandy shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and wine spirits so recovered may be used in the manner provided by law for the fortification of other wine: Provided, That such wine spirits on which abatement or refund of tax is allowed shall not exceed the total amount of alcohol in such wine over and above 14 per centum thereof.'

"That section 3 and section 6 of the act of June 7, 1906, amending the laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines, are hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to assign at each winery where wines are to be fortified such number of gaugers or storekeeper gaugers, in the capacity of gaugers, for special duties as may be necessary for the proper supervision of the making and fortifying of such wines, and the compensation of such officers shall not exceed $5 per diem while so assigned, together with their actual and necessary traveling expenses, and also a reasonable allowance for their board bills, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but not to exceed $2 per diem for said board bills. That bonds hereafter given under the provisions of the aforesaid act of October 1, 1890, as amended, shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on all brandy removed thereunder and not used and accounted for within the time and in the manner required by law and regulations, and for the payment of all taxes imposed on the brandy so withdrawn and used for fortifications; and the said bonds shall contain such other conditions as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

"'SEC. 6. That any person who by any process recovers from wines fortified under the provisions of the aforesaid act approved October 1, 1890, and amendments thereto, any brandy or

But the provisions of this section and the provisions of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, relating to rectification, or other internal revenue laws of the United States, shall not be held to apply to or prohibit the mixing or blending of pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act with each other or with other wines: Provided, That the pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of this act may be used in the manufacture of cordials, liqueurs, and similar compounds on which an internal revenue tax of 24 cents a gallon is imposed, and otherwise the provision of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall remain in full force and effect.'"

The provision as amended places a tax on still wines of 8 cents per gallon; on champagne and other sparkling wines and all artificial carbonated wines, of 20 cents per quart; and on cordials, liqueurs, and similar compounds, of 24 cents per gallon. The Senate amendments exempt the stock and bonds issued by all cooperative building and loan associations and of mutual ditch or irrigating companies, and the House agrees to the Senate amendments.

Amendment No. 56: It is believed the Senate amendment would exempt cooperative building and loan associations and mutual ditch or irrigation companies from the payment of all of the taxes provided in this act, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 57: This amendment relates to the administration of Schedule B of the act, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 58: This amendment relates to the penalty for violation of the provisions of Schedule B of this act, and the House agrees with an amendment making the penalties effective on and after December 1, 1914.

Amendment Nos. 59, 60, 61, 62, and 63: These amendments relate to the section numbers of the act, and the House agrees with amendments making the numbers 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 in lieu of 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23.

Amendment No. 64: This amendment provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause the necessary stamps to be distributed as well as prepared, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 65: This amendment becomes necessary because of the addition of Schedule B to the act, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 66: The House provided that the tax should be levied on bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued after November 1, 1914. The Senate amendment struck out November 1, 1914, and levied the tax on all bonds, etc., issued 30 days after the approval of this act, and the House agrees with an amendment making the date December 1, 1914.

Amendment No. 67: This amendment provides that it is not intended by this act to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of stock certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which stock certificates are not actually sold, nor upon such stock certificates so deposited, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 68: This amendment limits agreements of sale, etc., to those for future delivery; and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 69: This amendment exempts the tax upon express and freight in all cases where a charge not exceeding 5 cents is made for transportation; and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 70: The bill as it came from the House had the same provision with respect to the use of bills of lading for bundles of newspapers as did the act of 1898, but since 1898 there has been quite a change in the manner of the distribution of papers, due in large part to the growth in the interurban railway system. Time has increasingly become the essence of the situation in the distribution of afternoon daily papers. The issuing of a bill of lading for each bundle would become vexatious and burdensome. This amendment provides that the publisher of the newspaper in lieu of the stamped bill of lading is to make a return under oath on the 15th of each month of the general bundles shipped during the preceding month, to which return he is required to attach a 1-cent stamp for each bundle so reported. Instead of the stamp on the bill of lading, he makes his return and puts on as many stamps as there are bundles shipped; and the House agrees to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 71: This amendment strikes out the House provision that "no bill of lading, manifest, or other memorandum shall be used in evidence unless it shall be duly stamped," because the Federal Government has no right to say what will be evidence in a State court, and the House agrees to the amendment.

Amendment No. 72: The House bill required the telephone or telegraph company to pay the tax imposed. The Senate committee recommends that the sender be required to pay it, and they recommend that this tax be collected by the telegraph and telephone companies, and at the end of each month they make a sworn statement to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the taxes be settled upon the basis of that statement, and the House agrees to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 73: This amendment limits the tax upon conveyances to only the real interest conveyed, and the House agrees to the amendment.

Amendment No. 74: This amendment provides that nothing contained in this paragraph shall be so construed as to impose a tax upon any instrument or writing given to secure a debt, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 75: The House bill proposed a tax on life insurance for each $100 or fractional part thereof of 8 cents on the amount insured. The Senate struck out this provision, and the House agrees to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 76: This amendment is merely a clerical change, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 77: This amendment refunds the tax paid upon policies which were canceled or upon premiums which were returned, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 78: This amendment exempts cooperative or mutual associations carrying on business not for profit, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 79: This amendment provides that policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the marine, inland, and fire insurance tax, and the House agrees.

Amendment Nos. 80 and 81: These amendments merely relate to clerical changes, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 82: This amendment exempts life, personal accident, and health insurance, etc., policies from the tax, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 83: This amendment makes liability insurance companies subject to the tax upon liability, fidelity, and guaranty insurance, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 84: This amendment refunds the tax paid upon policies which were canceled or upon premiums which were returned, and the House agrees to this amendment with an amendment striking out all of the matter inserted by the amendment except the provision exempting policies of reinsurance.

Amendment No. 85: The House bill taxes mortgages, etc.; the Senate struck out the House provision, and the House agrees to the Senate amendment.

Amendment No. 86: This amendment provides that the tax on passage tickets shall be paid when purchased in the United States, regardless of the port from which the vessel is to sail, and the House agrees.

Amendment Nos. 87 and 88: These amendments are necessary to make effective amendment No. 86, providing that the passage-ticket tax shall be collected when the ticket is sold in the United States, although the vessel may sail from a port in another country, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 89: This amendment exempts passage tickets costing less than $10, to which the House agrees.

Amendment No. 90: This amendment reduces the tax on parlor-car seats and sleeping-car berths from 2 cents to 1 cent, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 91: This amendment reenacts the provisions of the war-revenue act of 1898 pertaining to perfumery, cosmetics, and chewing gum, with sundry minor amendments, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 92: This amendment provides for the renumbering of a section, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 93: This amendment provides that any person liable to tax under the provisions of this act shall keep such records and comply with such regulations as may be issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It further provides a penalty for the violation of any of the provisions of this act, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 94: This amendment appropriates money with which to carry out the provisions of this act. The House appropriated $130,000 and the Senate appropriated $492,000. The conference fixed the sum at $200,000.

Amendment No. 95: This amendment merely provides for the renumbering of the section, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 96: The House provided that the act, unless otherwise specified, should take effect on the date following its passage. The Senate provided that it should become effective 30 days after its passage. The conferees adopted the House provision.

Amendment No. 97: This amendment provides that the taxes levied under this act shall become inoperative on the 31st day of December, 1915, and the House agrees.

Amendment No. 98: This amendment provides that the provisions of the law now in effect with regard to fermented liquors shall be in full force on and after the 1st of January, 1916, and the House agrees.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to have the conference report acted on as speedily as possible, and, if agreeable to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I would like to move the previous question at the end of my hour and give him half of that time, if that is satisfactory to him.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will make a short statement of the changes in the bill and then yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, the bill as it left the House carried approximately $105,000,000 of revenue. The bill as it came back from the Senate, according to the Senate's estimates, carried $107,000,000. The bill as reported by the conferees carries $90,000,000. The original estimate of the President of the United States as to the revenue desired was $100,000,000. The conferees found it almost impossible, at least the conferees of the majority party, to agree on certain items. We realized that the Members of the House and the Senate were very anxious to go home. We realized that on some items it would have brought about a disagreement and a report back to the House and further delay unless certain items went out of the bill. We consulted with the President of the United States as to the situation. He realized the patience of the Members of the House and the Senate and the importance of their return home, and he stated that he thought that the present emergency could be met by a bill carrying $90,000,000. Therefore we agreed to this reduction. The first disagreement between the Houses related to beer. The House reported a bill increasing the tax on beer 50 cents, making the total tax $1.50. The Senate increased it to $1.75, and made a rebate of 5 per cent to the brewers where they paid taxes under certain conditions. The difference between the two Houses in the amount of reduction on that item would have amounted to about $10,000,000. The Senate receded on its amendment, and the conference report agrees to the House bill. The next item of importance was the paragraph relating to wines. The House levied a tax of 20 cents a gallon on sweet wines and 12 cents on dry wines, to be collected from the manufacturer or producer at the time that they were removed for consumption and sale. The Senate levied a tax that amounts to about 8 cents a gallon, a tax on wine in the bottle or container, and further levied a tax of 55 cents a gallon on grape brandy used to fortify sweet wines. With some minor amendments the House agreed to the Senate amendment. The most material of those amendments related to the tax on domestic champagne.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is this tax on wine to be permanent or temporary?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The whole bill will go out of existence on the 1st day of January, 1916.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House when these respective provisions of the bill go into effect?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The last provision I will state to the gentleman, if he will permit me, when we come to it. Amendment No. 6 related to gasoline. The House bill levied a tax of 2 cents a gallon on gasoline, and the Senate struck that provision out of the bill. On this amendment the House agreed to the Senate amendment, and the entire provision has gone out of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman state whether there was any substitute made for that tax? Is there anything put in in lieu of it? What became of the automobile tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was no automobile tax in conference.

Mr. BORLAND. That was only a proposal?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Only a proposal in the Senate. Under the special taxes the Senate reduced the tax on bankers from $2 to $1, and the House agreed to the Senate amendment. There were some minor changes in relation to the other taxes under these special taxes, but no material changes. Under the special taxes on tobacco dealers and manufacturers the highest tax levied by the House bill was $24.

The Senate made a gradual increase of these taxes on manufacturers up to $2,496 in proportion to the amount of tobacco they manufactured, and the House agreed to the Senate amendment.

Under the provisions in reference to adhesive stamps, under Schedules A and B, some minor changes were made in the text of the bill, but none of very great importance. In Schedule A, the important changes made in conference, the House bill provided for a tax on telephone and telegraph messages, to be paid by the corporation. The Senate changed the amendment and provided that the tax should be paid by the sender of the message, and the House finally concurred in the Senate amendment. The Senate struck out of the bill the tax levied by the House upon life insurance policies, and the House agreed to that amendment.

Mr. MOORE. That gets rid of the question of mutual life insurance companies, does it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The whole provision goes out.

Mr. MOORE. There was some ambiguity about it before, because the bill pertained only to fire insurance policies.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the bill is presented to the House there is no tax——

Mr. MOORE. No tax on mutual life insurance?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman while we are on this question, whether it is not also provided in the bill now that mutual building and loan associations are also exempt from the provisions of the act?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the conference report, there is a tax of one-half cent on each dollar of policy on guaranteed insurance, surety bonds, and so forth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. There is no change in the amount. There was a slight amendment made in reference to those policies by providing that the tax should not apply to reinsurance. That is the only change.

Mr. MANN. I notice the change in the Senate amendment exempted certain personal insurance, personal health and personal accident.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. You made the change there, but the surety bonds are not exempt?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. The House levied a tax on mortgages, and the Senate struck the provision out of the bill. The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. As I understand from the conference report on practically all of Schedule A, the tax goes into effect on December 1, except where it is specifically provided otherwise in Schedule A?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All of Schedule A goes in on December 1, but there is a certain portion of the bill, like the tax on beer and wine, that goes into effect on the day after the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why was that distinction made?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because Schedule A was a stamp tax, and it would take that length of time, so the Treasnry Department said, to be prepared to levy the tax.

On Schedule B——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman states the House provided for stamp tax on mortgages?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The House bill did.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the Senate struck that out, and the Senate also included a provision that instruments to secure debts were not to be taxed, did they not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will have to look that up. I have not the papers in my hand.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: The mortgages are exempt, regardless of the amount they secure, are they?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no tax on mortgages at all. The Senate inserted Schedule B in this bill, that provides for the tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and other similar articles, and the House agreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. EDWARDS. What was done with the proprietary medicine tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was stricken out of the bill before the Senate passed it.

Mr. EDWARDS. It was not included at all?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not included in here. There were no proprietary or patent medicines included in this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I say to the gentleman that I think amendment numbered 74 answers the question I asked? It says:

This amendment provides that nothing contained in this paragraph shall be so construed as to impose a tax upon any instrument or writing given to secure a debt, and the House agrees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. I could not just refer to it at the moment. The only other important amendment in the bill is this provision. When the House passed this law it left the taxes in the bill permanent, except the taxes under Schedule A. The House struck that out and provided that the taxes under this bill should expire at the time which the House had provided for the expiration of the taxes under Schedule A; that is, the day after the 31st of December, 1915; in other words, the 1st of January, 1916, the House bill provided that the taxes under Schedule A should expire. The Senate enlarged that provision so as to provide that all of the taxes levied under this bill should expire on that date.

I wish to say to the House, to be candid, that I do not think the results of the European war will be over by that date or that the revenues at the customhouse will be restored by that time. But this bill was intended as an emergency measure. It gives the Government the opportunity within the 13 months of its existence to reenact other legislation or to reduce expenditures, or to adjust itself in some way to the falling off of the revenues at the customhouse. And the House conferees agreed to the Senate amendment, and this bill will expire in all its provisions on the 1st day of January, 1916.

S. 583. An act incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters; and Senate concurrent resolution 33.

Whereas about 500,000 tons of cottonseed meal and cake have heretofore been annually exported from the United States; and

Whereas by reason of war conditions this surplus is without a market abroad, the surplus equaling about one-third of the total output; and

Whereas the dumping of this surplus on existing domestic markets will depress the price of this article both as to raw material and finished product to such an extent as to cause disastrous losses to farmers producing the raw material: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby authorized and requested immediately to investigate the possibility of wider domestic markets for these products, especially in the northwest, northern, and northeast sections of the United States, and to report to Congress at the earliest practicable date a plan for acquainting these sections with the value and availability of these products as a feed for domestic animals, and for the marketing in these sections of the surplus of these products heretofore exported.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 6939. An act to reimburse Edward B. Kelley for moneys expended while superintendent of the Rosebud Indian Agency in South Dakota;

H. R. 13698. An act to correct the military record of Charles A. Coulson.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LEVY. Was there any change made as to real estate conveyances and only taxing equities?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; the House agreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this bill will raise $90,000,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think it will raise practically sufficient revenue to meet the falling off at the customhouses. The original estimate was $100,000,000. This bill will approximate the falling off of the revenue at the customhouses, and within the year, if it is necessary, either by the reduction of expenditures or by the passage of other legislation, the Congress can take care of this situation. This bill is intended as an emergency measure to meet the acute situation that we are facing now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly explain, as I requested before, when the various provisions of this act will take effect?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the provisions in reference to beer and wine will take effect on the day after the passage of the bill. The special taxes on bankers and brokers and theaters will take effect on November 1, 1914, and also the special tax on tobacco dealers on that date; but the stamp taxes under Schedules A and B will not take effect until December 1

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Are bonds issued by mutual drainage or ditch or irrigation societies exempted under this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; the House agreed to the Senate amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. The tobacco taxes will take effect on December 1?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the matter of taxes upon theaters and places of public amusement and entertainment the Senate made certain amendments on a graduated scale, determined by the seating capacity of the various places, as I understand it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. And also exempted Chautauquas and lecture associations and things of that sort, which will include the large Chautauquas which get large sums of money and are conducted as matters of business and not so much as matters of education. You know there are associations formed all over the country that make large sums of money and pay large amounts of money to lecturers who are secured, and although they do a great deal of good in reference to education, it is chiefly as a matter of business to those who engage in it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the Chautauqua associations were not taxed in the House bill. They thought they were taxed, and under that impression they raised a lot of trouble, thinking they were taxed.

Mr. BARTLETT. As did the beer and whisky people and other people.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill did not tax the associations. The theaters were taxed, but the associations or the people performing in the theaters or holding lectures or amusements were not taxed. It was the theaters that were taxed.

Mr. BARTLETT. One other question and then I will be through. The Senate reported an amendment which taxed tobacco dealers a certain amount regardless of sales, and they taxed the place of the sales. As I understand it, the House has agreed to an amendment which fixes the amount of taxes in accordance with the amount of tobacco sold. A small tobacco dealer, selling less than $600 worth, I think, is exempted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The conferees agreed upon $200 as the limit of exemption.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am glad that is so. That does not tax the little fellow in the country who does not sell more than $200 worth in a year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. Now I yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Chair to notify me after I have consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House conferees—that is, those of them who were present at the conference; I did not have that distinguished honor—on their great victory on the subject of beer. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I think the concession on beer was about the only victory they achieved. Generally, otherwise they surrendered to the Senate.

The House provision on beer was $1.50 a barrel. The Senate made it $1.75, and in the print of the House bill which we had here and which was acted upon in the House a rebate was put on in the Senate of 7½ per cent after the brewer had paid the taxes, which made the net tax on beer about $1.61 per barrel instead of $1.50 as provided in the House bill; so that the House conferees' victory amounts to about 11 cents a barrel.

Of course, you can calculate how much difference in the amount of foam that will make in a glass of beer when you get the number of glasses of beer there are in a barrel. I do not think the ultimate consumer is going to get very much benefit out of that, and that much revenue on beer will be lost.

The Senate amended the tax upon wine and upon sweet wines and changed a provision in the law which had been in operation for a great many years, and which was put there after great deliberation and long hearings, where the committee went into the wine business in every section of the country, allowing brandy spirits used as a preservative of sweet wines to be used at an internal-revenue tax of 3 cents instead of $1.10, as would have to be paid on such spirits under ordinary circumstances. This equalized somewhat the conditions for the production of wines in different sections of the country. In California the grapes are sweet enough to distill this brandy from the grape for a preservative of their sweet wines. In New York and other Middle States they are not sweet enough and they have to be fortified with brandy purchased. In New York that brandy is purchased from the manufacturers in California. I think in the State of Ohio the wines are fortified with spirits of brandy made from the refuse of the wine vats mingled with sugar and fermented in that shape, so that it does not make so much difference with them. This provision which they have put into this bill comes particularly hard on the sweet-wine producer in the State of New York. In the endeavor to do something for California—and when we consider what they did to California in their tariff bill, perhaps they ought to let up just a little on the wine industry in that respect—they put a tax of 55 cents a gallon on grape brandy used in fortifying wines by a new provision in the Senate bill, which the House retained.

But the joke of the thing is that, while this provision goes into effect at once, it does not affect this year's production of sweet wines in California. The sweet wines there are already manufactured, are all fortified, and they were fortified with free spirits. In other words, they do not pay any of this 55 cents a gallon on the brandy used in their wine product for this year in the State of California. And then, looking after the interests of California—for I can not see any other reason for it—they changed the general provision of the bill, and the whole thing expires on the day following the 31st day of December, 1915. Inasmuch as they do not manufacture sweet wines in California in the meantime, this 55 cents a gallon does not affect those people over there at all. I congratulate the people of California on this little recognition of the State. Perhaps this committee in the Senate have heard of the revolution in political feeling in the State of California that is about to make itself manifest a week from Tuesday next.

Well, the people in the State of New York have to pay this 55 cents a gallon, as against the free spirits in California. We do not commence to manufacture in New York for some time yet. We have got to fortify all of our product. Of course it simply means the wiping out of the business for the present in the State of New York, until some time in the future—I hope not very far away—when we shall get more equitable legislation and better legislation that will not be destroying business here and there and often by the wholesale in different parts of the United States. But as it stands to-day the proposition is utterly defenseless. Why did they change this date to the 31st day of December, 1915, instead of making it permanent law? I heard the explanation of the chairman of the committee, but it did not seem to explain. Why change this date? Have they forgotten that on the 1st day of May, 1916, the sugar proposition goes into effect, and after that not a penny will be collected on the imports of sugar, while now, even under the reduction made on the 1st of March last, we collect over $40,000,000 per annum? That hole is to be made in the revenue commencing with the 1st day of May, 1916, and they come in here with a bill to bolster up the revenue under that tariff bill and patch it up and try to make up for the deficit that stares them in the face, war or no war, and really if we were without war during the coming year; and then, for some reason or other, they cut out of this bill after the 31st day of January, 1916, the revenue under this bill, having already cut out $40,000,000 of sugar revenue after the 1st day of May, 1916. Why, with all the chapters of bungles that we have had for the last 18 months, it seems that this caps the climax in bad Democratic legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They have restored Schedule B and put a tax on medicines, cosmetics, and things of that kind. They copied the revenue bill of 1898, when we had a war. I see that they have impudently put on the first page of this print the words "War-revenue bill." Why print this falsehood in the proceedings of Congress? It is not a war-revenue bill. We have no war. They are boasting that we have no war. They claim it as a part of the credit due the Wilson administration that we have no foreign war. I would like to have some gentleman get up in his place and tell me where there has been any opportunity to get into a foreign war, except by some criminal act on the part of the administration or of the people of the United States since this war commenced on the 1st day of August. They say this is a war-revenue bill. Oh, no. Why are they not honest? Why do they not admit that their Underwood revenue bill is a failure and that we need to put this in operation to meet the failure in revenue because of their tariff bill? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, they are going to have a nice time putting these stamps on proprietary articles sold in drug stores. They have a provision that on the 1st day of December, when it goes into effect, every druggist in the United States, big or little, is bound to put a stamp on every article taxed under this bill. You put it off until the 1st day of December. If you had made it applicable now, there is not a druggist in the United States who would have voted your ticket, no matter how much dyed-in-the-wool Democrat he might have been. They will not all of them forget it, either. Why put them to all this trouble just for one year. You assume that it will bring a million or two dollars of revenue. Why do it? If it was intended to be permanent, as you intended in the first place, that would be another question; but why put these people to all that trouble and expense just to collect this pitiful sum for the period of one year? Druggists are pretty well taxed now; anywhere from 400 to 1,000 per cent on alcohol. And how about the people who make gum? We put a duty of 10 cents per pound on chicle, the raw material. They have doubled it and made it 20 cents, and the manufacturers have got to pay that. They put a tax of a cent a package on chewing gum. What will the girls and boys do for chewing gum if you raise the price in that way? The retailers can not sell it for 5 cents a package, or if they do they will have to cut down the chew, and it will take twice as much money to buy a package of gum. These conferees that you sent over to the Senate to disagree to that amendment have agreed to it, and agreed to the amendment that will limit the life of the bill to the 31st day of December of next year. I do not think those conferees have served you very well. I am glad they did not call me into conference, because I would have felt it my duty to talk from now until next December, if they would listen to me, unless they took some of these miserable things out of this bill. Why limit the time to the 31st of December? I hope some gentleman will answer that. The chairman of the committee did not, but I do not believe the chairman of the committee was in favor of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman objects to limiting this bill to the 31st day of December, 1915, but he opposes any tax at all. Now, how is that consistent? If he objects to the tax, how can he object to cutting it off as quickly as possible?

Mr. PAYNE. When you require the levy of the tax to meet your extravagant expenditures, do not try to fool the people by limiting it to the 31st day of December, 1915.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York claims it is not necessary to impose any tax at all, and then he complains because it is proposed to limit it to one year.

Mr. PAYNE. I talked an hour here, and my colleague was not here, or he would not say that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I heard the gentleman's remarks, and I read his speech, and even then I was not convinced.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not take all my time. I said if it was not for your reckless extravagance or if you would cut your expenses down now it would not be necessary. Your President could call his Cabinet together and ask them to cut down expenses, because they are not required to spend all the money you appropriate for them. If they would do that, they could get along without this revenue bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The gentleman has used 15 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will take two minutes more. I do not want to take any more time, for I have agreed to yield the time now.

Mr. Speaker, I was opposed to this bill. I said they ought to wait until the next session and see whether they needed any bill or not; and if they did, how much they needed to meet the deficit they would meet under ordinary circumstances by the Underwood bill, with the reckless way they are appropriating money. They could provide for a temporary deficit by a short-time loan; they should not tax the people now, without any knowledge and without examination of the subject, and blunder along through and put this heavy burden of taxation added to what is already upon the backs of the people. That is what I said, and I agree to it now; but here you add this to your revenue bill, and then you provide that it shall be discontinued, just as everybody knows there will be not only a deficit but a big deficit in the succeeding year of 1916. Oh, you congratulate yourselves on what you have done. The President writes a letter telling what good boys you have been and how you ought to be reelected. You are desperate, trying to get votes, and what a disappointment you will meet a week from next Tuesday, for all over the United States the tide is rising against you. The Cabinet are now out telling the people what a great man the President is and what has been accomplished, and telling what good boys you fellows have been here, following along like little children after a schoolmaster, doing what you are told to do. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But all of that will not save you. We may be called upon to originate a revenue bill right here after the 4th of March, and I do not know but your judgment may be correct on that account. Maybe you want us to originate a sensible revenue bill to meet the deficit which, according to your provisions, you can only meet by bonds after the 31st day of December, 1915. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the leader of the majority in this House, upon his election to the Senate of the United States. [Applause.] The record he has made here is about to draw to a close, and it is a fitting climax to his brilliant career as a successful leader of his party that he should go to the Senate. Over there he will no longer be called upon to create tariff legislation, nor will he be obliged to hold together the contending elements of his party.

Mr. Speaker, this is the saddest day in the history of the revivified Democracy. Yesterday was sad enough, when a large part of the party, led by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], had to go back on its constitutional traditions as to State rights and responsibilities and then atone for its breach of faith with Thomas Jefferson, its patron saint, on the question of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] It undertook yesterday to put the cotton monopoly in control of the Treasury of the United States in defiance of its own pretenses of fair play to the common people. To-day, after its failure of yesterday, it faces the consequences of its futile tariff legislation and takes the logical step following the enforcement of the Democratic tariff act of October 3, 1913, and passes a bill not "to lift the burdens from the backs of the American people," as it promised so often to do, but to put a burden directly upon the backs of the American people, and at a time when they are poorer than they were when the alleged relief act of October 3, 1913, was passed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, proud of the record the Republican Party has made in lifting burdens from the American people by a wise and helpful system of protection, did not participate in the conference that brought in the report we are now considering. Although a member of the conference committee, he was not invited to take part in the day's work. I am glad he was not, for the taxation imposed upon the people by this bill was not of Republican making.

The responsibility for it is wholly and solely with the Democrats of this House, who undertook by their act of October 3, 1913, to remedy the alleged defects in the Payne Tariff Act. They have afforded no remedy. They have made conditions worse. Instead of relieving the people they have added to the burdens of the people; they have reduced the wage-earning power of the producer and increased the expenses of the consumer; they have forced taxation upon the business man and the laborer by injuring the trade of one and cutting the wages of the other. They have taken away from the laborer the work he had under a Republican tariff, and now, by this bill, they are adding new burdens to his already depleted resources.

One citation is sufficient to demonstrate the injustice of this bill. The conferees have restored as a taxable commodity proprietary articles sold in drug stores which are so much in use in the households of the country. The poor woman who buys her 10-cent bottle of cough medicine or essence or extract must pay a tax upon it, while just above the cosmetics and other articles provided for in Schedule B we find in the paragraph relating to palace cars that every seat sold in a parlor car, and every berth sold in a sleeping car, shall be taxed only at the rate of 1 cent per seat. It makes no difference whether the passenger rides in a Pullman palace car from Baltimore to Washington, at the rate of 25 cents, or whether he rides on one continuous trip from the Atlantic to the Pacific, all the Pullman Palace Car Co. is expected to pay is 1 cent on each ticket. But the 10-cent drug store specialty used by the poor must pay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this conference report, as I was opposed to the original bill, because I think that it is entirely unnecessary to pass a bill taxing the people at this time. If there is any necessity for it, it has been caused by the extravagance and inefficiency of the Democratic Party. I do not believe that we ought to pass a law directly taxing the people in time of peace when it could be avoided by reasonable economy on behalf of this Democratic Congress, or when the Government has money loaned to the banks of the country that could be used for this purpose. I am opposed to taxing the people to put money in the National Treasury as long as the National Treasury has money loaned to the banks of the country at 2 per cent interest and permitting these banks to loan this same money to the people at from 6 per cent to 12 per cent interest.

The other day our good President, in his eulogistic letter to Mr. UNDERWOOD, said, speaking of this tax, "for war, and only war, is the cause of it." If it "is war, and war only," that is the cause of it, I wish that some one would explain how it is that the customs revenues of February this year, compared with the corresponding month of last year, decreased $9,800,000, while the customs revenues for the month of September this year, two months since we have had the war, decreased only $9,500,000, as compared with September, 1913.

They tell us that the necessity for this war tax is because the customs revenues have fallen off. What made the tremendous decrease in the month of February, which was even more than it was in the month of September? The total loss of revenue from all sources for the month of September, 1914, as compared with a year ago, was only $4,102,000. I have a table showing the revenue for the month of September in detail. It is as follows:

Revenue from customs, September, 1913	$26,794,494.25
Revenue from customs, September, 1914	17,225,887.03
Loss	9,568,607.22
Internal-revenue tax, ordinary, September, 1914	$31,466,609.08
Internal-revenue tax, ordinary, September, 1913	25,619,284.43
Gain	5,847,314.65
Corporation income tax, September, 1914	404,038.54
Corporation income tax, September, 1913	83,340.35
Gain	320,698.19
Miscellaneous, September, 1913	3,576,278.02
Miscellaneous, September, 1914	2,874,859.95
Loss	701,418.07
Total, September, 1913	56,073,397.05
Total, September, 1914	51,971,394.60
Loss	4,102,002.45

I have not the figures of the imports into this country of all industries since the war as compared with the months immediately preceding, but I do have the figures showing the imports into this country of lumber and shingles from British Columbia, and it shows that the imports of shingles, logs, lumber, and laths were very much greater in August and September than they were in June and July, the two months immediately preceding the war. These figures are as follows, being the imports from British Columbia into the Puget Sound collection district:

1914.	Shingles.	Logs.	Lumber.	Lath.
	M.	M.	M.	M.
June	21,054	2,356	None.	288
July	16,912	5,810	809	90
August	34,400	4,938	1,191	618
September	35,534	10,709	4,458	782

I have here an interesting document published by the Department of Commerce. It is a report by R. E. Mansfield, consul general at Vancouver, British Columbia, and is published under date of October 13, 1914, Daily Consular Report, pages 216, 217. This entire report is illuminating, as showing the effect, not of the war but of the Underwood tariff, upon the shingle and lumber industry of the State of Washington. As it is short, I will insert it in full, and I trust that those who have been claiming that the present Democratic tariff law has not injured the lumber and shingle industry of this country will read carefully this statement published by a Democratic Secretary of Commerce.

The report of Consul General Mansfield is as follows:

[From Daily Consular and Trade Reports, October 13, 1914.]

BRITISH COLUMBIA SHINGLE AND LUMBER INDUSTRY.

(Consul General R. E. Mansfield, Vancouver, Canada, September 11.)

There are in British Columbia 61 shingle mills, with a total of 313 machines, each machine having an average daily capacity of 25,000, making a total capacity of the mills in the Province of 7,825,000 shingles per day. The maximum number of machines in one mill is 23 and the minimum 1. American capital is interested in 15 of the plants, operating 84 machines, with a total daily capacity of 2,100,000 shingles. The following table gives the number of mills and machines in the Province:

Shingle mills in British Columbia.

EXPORTS PRACTICALLY ALL TO UNITED STATES.

Invoices covering shipments of shingles from British Columbia to the United States certified through this consulate general show a large increase in the exports during the past year. The exports from Vancouver to the United States for the first three quarters of 1913 were 53,569,505, as compared with 64,994,647 for the corresponding period of the previous year. The exports during the last three months of 1913 were 90,899,865 shingles, as compared with 24,590,320 for the corresponding period of 1912.

The exports for the first six months of 1914 were 313,584,035, as compared with 144,469 370 for the entire 12 months of 1913. The shipments of shingles from this port to the States for the last quarter of 1913 and the first half of 1914, covering the three quarters, show a total of 404,483,900, as compared with 78,159,825 for the corresponding periods of 1912 and 1913.

Practically the entire output of the British Columbia shingle mills is now exported to the United States, the industrial depression prevailing in Canada during the past year having seriously affected building operations in the western Provinces.

The financial conditions incident to the war recently caused the shingle manufacturers in the Province to reduce the wages of employees, which has enabled them to compete more successfully with the shingle mills in the United States, and in order to keep the plants in operation the manufacturers in British Columbia are devoting their energies to the extension and maintenance of their export trade, the bulk of which is to the United States.

OUTPUT OF LUMBER MILLS.

There are 43 lumber mills in British Columbia, with a daily capacity of 2,826,000 feet b. m. The maximum output of an individual plant is 350,000 feet and the minimum 10,000 feet per day of 10 hours. American capital is interested in 6 of the 43 mills, the total daily capacity of which is 524,000. The following list gives the number and daily capacity in 1,000 feet b. m. of the mills in the Province:

Mills.	Output.	Total daily capacity.	Mills.	Output.	Total daily capacity.

The lumber exports to the United States invoiced through this consulate general during the December quarter, 1912, were 205,724 feet, and for the last quarter of 1913 the exports amounted to 1,703,534 feet, an increase of 1,497,810. Exports for the last quarter of 1912 and the first half of 1913 were 1,861,100, as compared with 12,030,799 for the last quarter of 1913 and the first half of the year 1914, an increase of 10,169,799. The total exports to the United States for the year 1912 amounted to 1,009,123 feet; the total for 1913 was 4,186,600 feet; and for the first six months of 1914 the shipments invoiced through this consulate general show a total of 10,327,265 feet—nearly ten times more than for the entire year of 1912 and approximately two and one-half times more than during the 12 months of last year.

There is little demand for lumber in western Canada at this time, owing to the depression in the building trade, and the millmen are depending largely upon the market in the United States for an outlet for their products.

[The consul general sent lists of the lumber and shingle mills in British Columbia which are owned by Americans or in which American capital is interested.]

In the same letter to Mr. UNDERWOOD the President says:

Business has already adjusted itself to the new conditions with singular ease and elasticity.

Yes; the lumber and shingle mill business of the State of Washington have adjusted themselves to the new conditions, but I doubt if it has been with ease or with elasticity. The mills have closed, the men are out of employment, and the markets of this country, as Mr. Mansfield says, have been largely taken by the manufacturer in British Columbia. All the lumber and shingles, of course, come in free. The Government is losing the revenue, the American citizen is losing the work, and nobody is benefited. Instead of a direct tax upon the people to meet the expenses of government, if Democratic extravagances must have further revenue, then I think that we should place a duty upon lumber and upon shingles and upon other articles that compete with what we produce in this country. Let the Government have the revenue, reduce the imports, and again open up our own mills and factories.

On yesterday the President assured us that he would not use the word "psychological," but that the very serious business depression throughout the country was largely due to lack of confidence.

And why should there be any lack of confidence at this time, for the Democratic Party has been in power for over 18 months? They went into power promising that they would reduce the cost of living, that they would free business, that they would give us greater prosperity than we have ever had before, and what are the facts? To-day we are in the midst of great business depression; mills and factories are closed or running on short time; idleness and poverty is everywhere. This has always been true whenever the Democratic Party was in power.

As the people to-day look upon present conditions, as they remember the conditions that came under another Democratic administration, is there any wonder that there is lack of confidence in the country? Whatever may be the cause, one thing is certain, that whenever the Democratic Party is in power we have panic, depression, and hard times, and when the Republican Party is in power we have prosperity. There may be some ground for argument as to what produces the result, but there can be no doubt as to the fact.

When the people look over the record of this Democratic Congress, after over 18 months of continual performance, and then remember the history of their country, it is no wonder that there is a lack of confidence throughout the Nation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he has more than one speech?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will conclude with a very few words.

Mr. PAYNE. I have a little more time, and I want to yield to one more gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will conclude with the last speech.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time has the gentleman?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I have four minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire more time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the President is reported yesterday to have said that the trouble with the country was lack of confidence. I am glad to note that the President has discovered, at least, that there is trouble. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have so repeatedly denied on the floor here that there was any trouble in the country that evidently they had not received the right tip from the President. Of course the trouble in the country, when there is trouble in the country, comes from a lack of confidence.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, let us have order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Of all days in the session the last day ought to be an orderly day.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, as it never is and never will be, I am not complaining.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order whether the gentleman from Illinois wants it or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen on the other side are settling matters of more importance. Lack of confidence! Of course there is lack of confidence. Why should not there be? Whenever the Democratic Party is in power and has an opportunity to legislate or attack the business of the country through the administration there necessarily comes a lack of confidence. [Applause on the Republican side.] And as long as you are making legislative assaults upon the integrity of the country and its business there will inevitably be a lack of confidence. The only way that the people can overcome the present difficulty and restore confidence in the country is by restoring the Republican Party to power. [Applause on the Republican side.] We had a Democratic administration within your memory, and there was the same lack of confidence then that there is now. Then we come along with another Democratic administration, which came in when the country was more prosperous than it had ever been before, and at once a lack of confidence developed. Why should it not develop? There has been no legislation since Mr. Wilson became President which tended to restore confidence. A year ago we were here, kept by order of the President, in order to speedily pass a currency and banking bill which was to remove all evils, and up to date, nearly a year after it went into effect, so far as the passage of the law was concerned, they have not dared to put it into effect practically. When they will do that will be after the election. They have not dared to organize the Federal reserve banks before the election because no one knows what will happen when they are organized. And meanwhile I commend to our southern friends, who were worrying about the disaster which threatens their section of the country because of the cotton situation, I commend to them the "watchful waiting" attitude of the administration—"watchfully waiting" for bankruptcy in the South and not offering a single suggestion to prevent it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], in reviewing this conference report, stated that it discriminated between the producers of wine in California and those in the State of New York by reason of the fact that this year the wine producers in California would have little tax to pay and the producers of New York would have all the tax to pay. I read in the report of the proceedings of the Senate several days ago a letter put in the RECORD by Senator STONE, of Missouri, signed by all the large manufacturers of wine in this country, advocating the passage of this Senate amendment, and in the list were included the large manufacturers in the gentleman's State. So I do not imagine that they are seriously injured.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I have letters from the largest manufacturers in the State expressly protesting against it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt the gentleman has letters of that kind, but, nevertheless, if the gentleman will refer to the RECORD——

Mr. PAYNE. Then, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that they expected the law to be permanent, and all put on an even basis, but you have stricken that out and exempted entirely the California wine interests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the Senate put into this law that provision relating to wine, and it has been agreed to, and at the same time the Senate put in a provision that this bill should be repealed on the 1st day of January, 1916. So they had both staring them in the face at the time they signed this letter.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say just one word there, namely, that this letter does not say that they knew the law was only to last a year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I presume they knew what was in the RECORD.

My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was misinformed with reference to this conference report, and I recognize how he could be, because he only came in in the last few minutes, when he states that this will tax proprietary or patent medicines. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that which I said in my opening statement, which he evidently did not hear, that under the law reported back by the conferees there is no tax on either proprietary or patent medicines in the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the distinguished leader of the party, says something as to lack of confidence. I wish to say in passing that the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to congratulation both by this side of the House and by the country on the fact that in the last few days, when it has been difficult to maintain a quorum in this House, due to the fact that men on both sides desire to go to their districts, he has endeavored to help the majority to maintain a quorum, and his side has furnished its pro rata of the membership of this House, and, speaking for the majority, I desire to extend the thanks of the party in power for its patriotism in aiding to furnish a majority to pass the necessary legislation that the Government needs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois states that the President says the conditions of the country are due to lack of confidence. True, but not to lack of confidence in the Democratic Party. There is no return from hamlet or State that has indicated a lack of confidence by the great masses of the American people in the party in power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic Party when it came into power inherited a cesspool of privilege that had grown out of legislation that had been written on the statute books of this country by our political opponents for 40 years. It was our duty to clean out the Augean stable; it was our duty to cure the patient; it was our duty to protect the American people from the grind of privilege and the grind of class. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And in the 18 months that we have been in power we have kept the faith; we have kept our pledge; we have wiped from the statute books the concessions that you gave to monopoly in your tariff legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have written on the statute books a banking system for the whole people of the United States [applause on the Democratic side], and not a banking system for aggregate wealth and special class. We have kept our pledges to the American people, and we have not only indorsed the trust legislation that was on the statute books by the orders of a Democratic Attorney General of the United States, but we have written on the statute books within the last few months legislation that will vitalize the Sherman antitrust law [applause on the Democratic side], and enable the Government of the United States to punish the guilty and point the true road to the innocent, that all men may be free not only in their individual lives but in their business transactions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Of course, special privilege and class may have lost confidence in the Democratic Party, because the Democratic Party stands with the mailed hand of justice to punish the offender against the law. So it is not that lack of confidence which affects the country. There is a lack of confidence in general business conditions that exist the wide world over. For generation after generation the Bank of England has been the clearing house of the world. There the world exchanged its bills of lading, there the world cleared, the Orient against the Occident; but when this great calamity in Europe happened and half of the world went to war, the Bank of England suspended specie payments, and the clearing house of the world was closed, and necessarily confidence in business conditions was disturbed, and must be restored again. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the House that a good many Members think as soon as this report passes the House that they are at liberty to start for home. There are some things that may need a quorum here until adjournment, and I hope everybody will stay.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, they will not as long as the Speaker has made that statement. You might as well understand there will not be a quorum.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I did not quite catch the statement of the gentleman. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that everybody will stay here. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] asks for a division. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 52.

The SPEAKER. The conference report is agreed to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the passage of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PAYNE. Pending that, would it not be well to make some arrangement about printing copies of the new act?

PRINTING COPIES OF EMERGENCY REVENUE ACT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has called my attention to the fact that there would probably be a large number of copies of this law requested, and I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may write a joint resolution providing for the printing—what is the usual number of copies that we print?

Mr. MANN. This act affects every druggist in the United States. Of course, I suppose the Treasury Department will print plenty of copies.

Mr. PAYNE. I think at least 10,000 ought to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And 5,000 for the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Ten thousand could be printed for the House, probably, without a joint resolution.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to ask what is the regular order. Is not the regular order the consideration of the bill that the House had under consideration when the House adjourned yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is offering a resolution of the highest privilege—not about this printing business, however.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we can print 10,000 copies for the House on a House resolution, I think that is enough for the present. I move, then, Mr. Speaker, that 10,000 copies of this bill be printed and placed in the folding room for the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that 10,000 copies of the law be printed and placed in the folding room for the use of the Members. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 659.

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States to notify him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some communication to make to them.

[Applause.]

Mr. HENRY rose.

The SPEAKER. Without objection——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, was unanimous consent asked to pass this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is of the highest privilege.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is a privileged resolution. It goes with the resolution for adjournment.

Mr. HENRY. The adjournment resolution has not been passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the resolution for adjournment will be passed very suddenly. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a letter from the President, just received by special messenger, in which he states that he hopes the Congress will not adjourn until the warehouse bill is passed; and therefore I shall make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make his point. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-seven Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this call 223 Members, a quorum, have responded to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. The regular order is the resolution presented by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. HARDWICK. That under the operation of the special rule all the general rules are suspended, and the special rule must be exhausted before any other matter can be taken up.

The SPEAKER. Questions of higher privilege are not abrogated by the special rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. There are no questions of higher privilege when the House is operating under a special rule.

The SPEAKER. The question of the adjournment of Congress is a question of the highest privilege. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, this is not a proposition to adjourn; and, then, I do not think, with all deference, that the Speaker's statement is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated before this roll call that that matter about the printing of that bill was not a privileged matter, and so stated, so as to cut that out.

Mr. HARDWICK. The proposition I make is that no matter of privilege under the general rules of the House can operate until the special rule is exhausted, because the special rule suspends the operation of all rules. We have adopted it, and we are operating under it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. MANN. Is not a motion to adjourn the House ever in order under this rule?

Mr. HARDWICK. A motion to adjourn from day to day is in order.

Mr. MANN. How does it come to be in order if all rules are suspended by the special rule?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is necessary for the physical convenience of the House while it is executing the special order.

Mr. MANN. It is no more necessary than the right to quit and adjourn finally.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VARE. Is a question of personal privilege in order?

The SPEAKER. Not while this one is up.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States to inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn unless the President has some communication to make to them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in making this motion I realize that Members desire to go home. I realize that it is important for them to return to their constituencies before the election next week. I also realize the importance of the legislation pending. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be very glad to see the bill that is being considered, presented to the House by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], pass before adjournment. I should be most glad to see the warehouse bill become a law. Not only would I be glad to see it pass, but I am on record as having voted for it, and I should most cheerfully vote for it again. But I recognize that we are now in a condition when we can not expect to hold Members much longer, and I was hoping that after we had passed these resolutions the House, in its good nature—because that is the only way in which we can transact business in the closing hours of a session of Congress—would let these two bills, which all Members on both sides of the House understand, because they have been fully debated heretofore—come to a vote and let the majority express its opinion.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LEVER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he submit to the House a request for unanimous consent to give a limited time to the consideration of the bill offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and a very much less time to the warehouse bill, which will be in my charge. I believe, as the gentleman suggests, that in the good nature and good feeling of the House both bills can be passed very easily this evening and go to the Senate and be agreed to. Certainly the warehouse bill can be, because we know the temper of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. POU. A large majority of the House voted for it once.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A majority of the House has voted for that bill once before, and it failed to pass simply because on a motion to suspend the rules it did not receive a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will yield, I want to be good-natured, and I hope I have been on all occasions. We are operating under a special rule to pass two currency bills. The chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. GLASS] says they are very important bills, and I want to hear him fully on those bills. I have not altogether made up my mind upon them, but it is important that we should consider them. After they are passed the President urges that another very important matter should come up, and I want to read a letter just received by me on the floor by special-delivery messenger, so that the House may understand the attitude of the President. That letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 22, 1914.

Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HENRY: The passage of the cotton warehouse bill seems to me an essential measure for the relief, or the partial relief, of the South. It is one of the concrete things that we can do and should do. May I not urge that you use every endeavor to promote its immediate passage?

Sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Now, in the face of that letter I can not agree that we shall adjourn precipitately, when the fortunes of the people of the South are at stake. This warehouse bill should at least be considered. With some amendment I might be able to support it. A special rule has been reported to bring that bill before the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not that letter refer to the Lever bill that the gentleman from South Carolina is now seeking to call up?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Then why not submit a request for an agreement to take up the bill?

Mr. HENRY. I do not know how long it is going to take to pass the other bill, and I do not want to modify this special rule by any exceptional agreement.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I do not desire to debate this other bill. I am perfectly willing to abrogate that requirement of the rule that we shall have an hour of general debate and half an hour on amendments under the five-minute rule. All I ask is for a vote. I want to say that I never should have yielded to the unanimous-consent proposition to let the revenue bill take precedence of these bills had I known there was going to be any trouble about the passage of these bills—had I supposed that gentlemen who had promised to support these measures of relief would resort to tactics of delay. The Secretary of the Treasury, from his sick bed, called me up twice last night to insist upon the passage of these two bills designed to afford increased credit facilities to the southern people of approximately $500,000,000. So impressed is the Secretary of the Treasury with the necessity of passing these bills that he called up the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and asked him to let these bills take precedence of the revenue bill. If the House will just give me a vote, I do not want a moment's time to debate. The bills are simple, needing no discussion. They will afford infinite relief in the distressed parts of the country, and should long ago have passed.

Mr. COX. Let us vote now. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield for a question, I desire to say that the warehouse bill is in this situation: As we all know, it has passed the Senate. It has been thoroughly debated in the House, and a majority has registered in favor it. That will afford some relief to the condition of our people which has been described here time and again, and it does look to me as if we can afford to stay over here for two or three hours and get a vote on that measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, I will say that we expect to stay here for two or three hours more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there will be four or five hours more time for the passage of bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who opposed the warehouse bill. I shall ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the bills under consideration in the special rule the warehouse bill be taken up in the House and considered as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. They have a rule already prepared for the warehouse bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That will avoid the necessity for taking time on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I think, if we can, we had better vote on these bills and get through with them, and get this Congress away this afternoon.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet put the request.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that the House may now vote on the two bills that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has here, and that immediately after the disposition of them, no matter which way it goes, the warehouse bill shall be in order, that there be one hour's debate on the bill, and that it then come to a vote.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I also reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. One at a time.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I think I made the first reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the vote is to come on the first bill, S. 6398, with a motion to recommit that I have, I have no objection, as far as I am concerned, to that program.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We will do that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there never will come any time toward the close of a session of any Congress when a lot of gentlemen will not insist that the passage of certain bills is absolutely necessary for the country. That time never has been and never will be. There are a great many bills on the calendar that gentlemen desire to pass The bills referred to now have been before the House for quite a while. They have not been acted upon, but if these bills were all disposed of, other gentlemen will have bills that they want to dispose of, and if we are in a position where anybody can hold us up, then anyone can have his bill disposed of. I am unwilling to adopt any such procedure. I endeavored to the best of my ability to get a quorum here to dispose of the war revenue bill. It was stated by the President, so the newspapers stated, and other gentlemen prominent on the majority side, that when the war revenue bill was disposed of, Congress, in the opinion of the President, might adjourn. Now we have something else, and there always will be something else that somebody else wants passed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we can avoid that situation by having the agreement provide that after these bills have been considered, as indicated by the gentleman from Alabama, there shall be immediately considered the resolution of adjournment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama can offer his motion to adjourn now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand, but that would dispense with the possibility of other things coming up.

Mr. MANN. It would not dispense with the need of a quorum. Gentlemen are seeking now to take advantage of the House upon the theory that there will not be a quorum present. Very well; let them take that attitude if they want to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself entered into a gentlemen's agreement——

Mr. MANN. But that does not bind. I have discovered that entering into gentlemen's agreements with a dozen gentlemen on the Democratic side does not bind everybody over there.

Mr. HARDWICK. Or on that side either.

Mr. MANN. Nobody on this side has broken any such agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. Nor on this side.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; they have. It is being broken now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state that if this agreement is entered into I shall offer an adjournment resolution to adjourn at 6 o'clock to-night and send it to the Senate, and I shall cooperate with the gentleman from Illinois to see that there is no other business transacted except these three bills and the signing of the necessary bills that come to the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. But any Member is in the position where he can hold up the House if he wants to when a quorum disappears. There will not be a quorum in the city in two hours, and I doubt whether there will be a quorum on any other roll call.

The SPEAKER. Then you had better pass the adjournment resolution while you have a quorum here.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if it is the desire on the majority side of the House to take that responsibility, let them take it. It is only a short time until we meet in December.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that, so far as I am concerned, I desire absolutely no debate on the bill, nothing but a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to make an inquiry——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the two bills—S. 6398 and S. 6505.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. GLASS. At the end of debate; but I am asking that it be considered as ordered now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on both bills named in the special rule. Is there objection?

Mr HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, with the understanding that we are to vote also on the motion to recommit when we vote on the bill S. 6398, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You can not shut that out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on this resolution.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. HEFLIN demanded a division.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that is dilatory. There has been no business transacted since the presence of a quorum was developed.

The SPEAKER. There has been no business transacted. The roll call showed a quorum, and a large quorum. The Chair thinks a quorum is here now. [Applause.] The question is on this resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HARDWICK) there were—ayes 125, noes 59.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-five Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 85, answered "present" 2, not voting 199, as follows:

The SPEAKER announced as the committee on the part of the House, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. FITZGERALD, and Mr. MANN.

ADJOURNMENT OF SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk:
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 51.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 22d day of October, 1914, at 6 o'clock p. m.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen suggest that we make it 8 p. m. So far as I am concerned, I would like this business to be voted on. I have agreed, and we have all had an understanding, and especially I had the understanding with the gentleman from Illinois, that he would furnish a quorum here to pass the revenue bill if we would adjourn and let his people get home when it was through. So far as I am concerned. I am going to try to live up to my understanding; but I would like a part of these bills to be voted on, and I will be glad to have the resolution amended so as to read 8 o'clock p. m. Of course it would not be passed until the Senate got through with its business. Then, after the passage of the resolution here, we could take up these other bills and have a vote on them.
Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.
Mr. MOORE. Day before yesterday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] sought to bring up a bill which the State Department very much desired to have passed. There was temporary objection to its consideration, but the gentleman gave notice that he would call it up immediately after the passage of the other bill.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. That can go over until December.
Mr. MOORE. That bill, then, is not included in the arrangement the gentleman is now asking for?
Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. I ask that we adjourn in peace and let everybody go home. I would like to change this resolution to read 8 o'clock.
Mr. MANN. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, if the Senate does not act, we can not help it.
Mr. MANN. Now, quite a number of the trains go out in the evening before 8 o'clock. There will not be any quorum here after 6 o'clock; there will not be any quorum in the House, speaking unofficially, after 4 o'clock, and I do not think there will be one after 3 o'clock, and I doubt if there will be one after 2 o'clock. So it practically makes no difference, except that certain gentlemen on both sides of the House, who have their tickets and sleeping-car reservations to go on the afternoon trains, might be discommoded if they have to wait over if this resolution is changed to 8 o'clock. Gentlemen on both sides of the House have made this statement to me, hoping they would be able to get home. So far as I am personally concerned, it is a matter wholly immaterial. But without a quorum business would not be transacted except by unanimous consent.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. I agree with the gentleman. There are plenty of gentlemen on both sides of the House who will probably get out this evening.
Mr. MANN. After 8 o'clock there is not much convenience in the way of going west, anyhow. You can go to New York most any time, or get out of it any time, which most people like to do, and to the South, perhaps.
Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I want it understood that I am not undertaking to violate any agreement the gentlemen may have made. And, although I am not a party to that agreement, I would not be willing to see this side of the House violate any agreement that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has made. [Applause.] But I do not think the gentlemen ought to manifest too great an anxiety to get away from here when vital public business is engaging the attention of the House. I have been here in Washington for 26 months, with the exception of 2 weeks that I have been absent on account of sickness, and I am willing to stay here, and other gentlemen, notwithstanding they have purchased their railroad tickets, ought to be willing to stay here and pass upon these bills that are of vital importance to a great part of this country.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], so far as I am personally concerned, I would most cheerfully do so. I am willing to stay right on until December, so far as I am concerned. But I am looking at the question from a practical standpoint. I know if we do not adjourn this House now when we have a quorum, we will have no quorum to-morrow. You can not keep men away from their districts within a week of election, and what I am trying to do is to arrange it so that these bills may be voted on. We have six hours, and if there be no unusual delay they may all be voted on, and I have not seen any indication——
Mr. GLASS. The gentleman will certainly acquit me of any participation in unreasonable delay or any sort of delay.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am anxious for the gentleman's bills to be passed. I would most cheerfully vote for them, and I would like to aid him in doing so. But I said to the other side of the House that if they would stay here and furnish a quorum we would adjourn after the business the President said he desired was completed. I am not a shadow to dodge in and out. I have got to stand by what I have said.
Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] knows that Congress meets again in December, even if we adjourn now. That is not a long time and not a long rest for the Members who are entitled to one. The fact is that the other day there was no quorum here. So far as I could see, there was not any chance to get a quorum back here except by the personal efforts of the gentleman from Alabama, and the whips, and gentlemen on this side, or by readopting the docking resolution, which I do not think could have been adopted. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], when objection was made to sending the revenue bill to conference in the first instance, and when it was sent to committee, said to me that he would like to have a quorum.
I said that I would cooperate in getting a quorum here on Wednesday—that was yesterday—and keeping them here until the conference report on the war-revenue tax bill was passed in the House. I thought that was fair to the Members of the House, although I was personally very much opposed to the bill. I notified gentlemen quite peremptorily—more so than I have ever done before—from a large section of the country, asking them to come back here and break their campaign engagements, and they came. They made up the quorum yesterday, and they made up the quorum to-day; and when they came I told them they could go away as soon as the conference report on the war-tax bill was disposed of. I shall keep my agreement with them, whatever the House may do. I do not think that there will be a quorum here. Of course, the gentlemen on the other side have the power to inconvenience every other Member of Congress and probably keep us here without letting us pass the resolution to adjourn, but I hope they will not do it.
Mr. GLASS. I am not going to be a party to that, and I hope also that no gentleman on this side will interpose any objection under the regular order to voting on these bills.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that if this resolution be passed he will have the time between the passage of this resolution and 6 o'clock in which to pass his resolution, which, if it can go through at all, will go through in that time. If it will not go through at all, it will not go through in that time. That is apparent.
Mr. MANN. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to this situation: If the point of no quorum should be made during the afternoon—and I apprehend such a point would be made if these currency bills should come up—and there should be no quorum here, the Speaker could not lay the enrolled copy of the revenue bill before the House to-day, anyhow. It would have to go over until to-morrow. In the absence of a quorum the Speaker can not lay the enrolled bill before the House.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.
Mr. GLASS. Does that mean that my friend from Illinois is going to break his own agreement and not insist upon gentlemen staying here to make a quorum?
Mr. MANN. I have not made an agreement with anybody to stay here after the conference report is agreed to. I have stated that I thought there would be no quorum here when the enrolled bill was presented to the House, and if anyone on that side desired to prevent the enrolled bill being laid before the House in the absence of a quorum they would have that responsibility.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I expected to pass this resolution in the usual way and notify the President and have final action on the adjournment resolution held in the Senate until the bill was signed.
Mr. MANN. I understand that part of it.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course this resolution will not go through the Senate until the bill is signed by the officers of the two Houses.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the purpose of it is to facilitate the public business.

Mr. MANN. I think this resolution is proper.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to give these gentlemen a chance, and if we can pass the resolution under these circumstances without delay and give additional time for the consideration for these bills, I would be very glad to change it to 8 o'clock. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to amend his resolution or not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that is satisfactory. I wanted to avoid a roll call.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] demands a division. Those in favor of the resolution will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-one gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 121 and the noes are 31. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-one Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 76, answered "present" 1, not voting 210, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

OCTOBER SALARIES OF HOUSE AND SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution (H. J. Res. 376) to pay the Senate and House employees their salaries on the day of adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 376) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and directed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, borne on the annual and session rolls, and including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of October, 1914, on the day of adjournment of the present session. The Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized to pay to Members and Delegates on that day their allowance for clerk hire for the said month of October.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Are the session employees to be paid for the full month of October?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure. I think the legislative act——

Mr. MANN. I do not think the legislative act covers so long a session as we have had.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It fixes the length of the session, so far as session employees are concerned.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I understand. But that time has long since expired. I am inclined to think myself that the session employees ought to be paid for the full month of October. That may be the case, for aught I know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is in the usual form, and is a convenience to the employees.

Mr. MANN. I do not think anybody could tell from that resolution whether the session employees are to be paid up to to-day, if Congress adjourns to-day, or for the full month of October.

Mr. BARTLETT. It says their October salaries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may be able to modify it.

Mr. CARLIN. I will ask the gentleman if he has any objection to giving an additional month's pay to employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That can not be done. I have no objection to providing that session employees shall be paid their salaries for the full month of October.

Mr. MANN. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there be no objection, I will ask to amend the resolution by placing at the end of it the words—

Provided, That session employees shall be paid a full month's compensation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I have absolutely no objection to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the suggestion, because the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations calls my attention to the fact that it would be ineffective unless some provision were made to pay it out of the contingent funds of the two Houses.

Mr. CARLIN. Let us do that.

Mr. MANN. Why would it be ineffective if the money has been appropriated? There has been an indefinite appropriation for session employees down to the day of adjournment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been an indefinite appropriation to pay the session employees up to and including the last day of the session.

Mr. MANN. That is all right; and if we say they shall be paid for the full month of October, and that is an act of Congress, that indefinite appropriation will apply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not unless the resolution carries words appropriating sufficient money to do it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARLIN. Let us do that, too.

Mr. MANN. We simply make that definition of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall withhold the resolution for a moment, with the consent of the House, to prepare an amendment for that purpose, if it be the desire of the House to pay the session employees the entire month's salary.

Mr. MANN. You had better pass the resolution in its present form, and then fix that up in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall ask the House to act on the resolution, and then I shall have an amendment attached to it in the Senate that will carry out that purpose.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE] asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a personal matter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, the North American, a daily newspaper of Philadelphia, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of this week published an editorial statement of information purporting to have been given to its editors by Senator BOIES PENROSE, to wit, that I, WILLIAM S. VARE, had conveyed large sums of money to John E. Reyburn, the then mayor of the city of Philadelphia, and actually had personally paid $5,000 into said John E. Reyburn's hands.

If Senator PENROSE or any other person made such a statement to the editors of that newspaper or elsewhere, it was an absolute lie, without the slightest foundation in fact or in truth, and was made to injure my candidacy for mayor of Philadelphia at that time and for no other purpose. If Senator PENROSE did not give this false information to the North American, it is up to him as a candidate for the United States Senate to so deny it that the public will be satisfied of its falsity. [Applause.]

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of Senate bill 6398.

Mr. MANN. A motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. BULKLEY. Under the rule, has not the previous question been ordered on S. 6398?

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

The SPEAKER. Under this rule you do not have a vote on either one of those bills, S. 6398 or S. 6505, until you get through with the debate on both of them. It is a very peculiar situation and a very peculiar rule.

Mr. BULKLEY. Has not debate been exhausted on S. 6398?

Mr. MANN. On this bill there is pending a motion to reconsider the vote by which section 2 was stricken from the bill, and a motion to lay that motion on the table. That is a matter pending before the House.

Mr. BULKLEY. The motion to lay on the table was passed last night.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Chair remembers that he himself voted in order to make a quorum.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does not that exhaust the consideration of S. 6398?

The SPEAKER. It does not exhaust consideration of it.

Mr. BULKLEY. But all debate is exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Yes; all debate is exhausted. A motion to table the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to reconsider was carried, and of course that is the end of that. But this rule provides that after all debate is exhausted on these two bills the previous question is ordered upon them, and that they shall be voted upon.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then does the Chair hold that the bill S. 6505 has to be debated before we can vote on the bill S. 6398?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; that is the rule.

The SPEAKER. If anybody desires to debate it; yes. If gentlemen want to waive debate, there is no way on earth of compelling anyone to debate it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are not going to waive it. If they waive the bill, we will waive debate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill 6505.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the Federal reserve act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"'The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to permit member banks to carry in the Federal reserve banks of their respective districts any portion of their reserves now required by section 19 of this act to be held in their own vaults.'

"That section 16 of the Federal reserve act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"'The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to devise and put into operation a system of clearances of national-bank notes between the Treasury, the Federal reserve banks, and the member banks, and for that purpose to designate Federal reserve banks as agents of the United States.'

"Amend the title so as to read: 'An act to amend sections 19 and 16 of an act to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, etc., approved December 23, 1913, and commonly known as the Federal reserve act.'"

With the following committee amendments:

"Amend, page 1, line 3, by striking out the word 'eleven' and inserting the word 'nineteen.'

"Amend, page 1, lines 6 and 7, by striking out the words 'The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to permit' and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'For a period of 36 months after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in any district, as provided in section 19 of the Federal reserve act.'

"Amend, page 2, line 3, by striking out the word 'to' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'may.'

"Amend the title so as to read: 'An act to amend sections 19 and 16 of an act to provide for the establishment of Federal reserve banks, etc., approved December 23, 1913, and commonly known as the Federal reserve act.'"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is recognized for 30 minutes, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the rest of the time.

Mr. GLASS. This bill (S. 6505) was amended by the House committee and favorably reported several weeks ago. It has the imprimatur of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Senate, and will promptly receive the approval of the President of the United States. The design of this bill is to make immediately available to the regional reserve banks rediscount facilities that these banks would acquire only after three years under the existing Federal reserve act. The House will recall that under the Federal reserve act a period of three years is provided in which the reserve requirements of the act may be complied with—three years in which the shifting of reserves from many thousands of banks throughout the country to the 12 regional banks shall take place. Had there been no disturbance caused by war, with its consequent dislocation of public and private credits, the new reserve system would have gone along to perfection within the required period; but in view of the existing situation and the exigencies created thereby it has been thought desirable that the act should be amended as here contemplated in order that we may immediately strengthen these regional reserve banks.

INCREASED FACILITIES.

As originally planned, the system was to begin with a capital of but $18,000,000 and reserve funds of $250,000,000. At the end of the three-year period the capital is expected to reach $54,000,000 and reserve funds $684,000,000. You can thus readily see the vast difference in the strength of these 12 regional banks at the end of three years as compared with their initial year. The purpose of this bill is immediately to increase—to immeasurably amplify by contrast—the credit facilities of these great reserve banks, so as to render them capable of dealing effectively with exigent difficulties which could not have been foreseen.

There can be no question that it is desirable to do this. Not only does the somewhat alarming situation in the South suggest the necessity for strengthening the Federal reserve system at once, but the general situation in the whole country seems to demand it. Were member banks of the system to act on the permission granted by this bill to transfer their impounded reserve funds to the regional reserve banks, such a course would disturb in no degree the facilities of member banks to transact business, but would add an additional loaning power of $700,000,000 to the regional banks.

I would not favor this practice as a permanent thing, nor would the House committee; hence we have proposed it as a temporary relief, for a period of three years.

A FRIGHTFUL RESPONSIBILITY.

I have a particular purpose in stating specifically what effect the passage of this bill will have on the cotton and tobacco situation of the South, because it has repeatedly been intimated in discussion that I am not sufficiently moved by the distress of my own people. Mr. Speaker, it is on this bill that I have relied to relieve that distress, and if obstructive tactics shall bring about its defeat, those guilty will have assumed a frightful responsibility, for not only is this bill sure to pass if submitted to a vote of the House, but is certain to be approved by the President. Thus it is a measure of real and certain relief, and no theatrical illusion, designed to deceive those not behind the scenes.

$396,000,000 OF NEW CREDITS.

I subjoin a table which shows at a glance what will be the strength at the start of the five regional banks which will be in intimate business contact with the cotton and tobacco growing States, and what would be their immediate strength should this bill be enacted into law:

District.	To be deposited in Federal reserve bank.	Vault reserve required.	Present loaning power.	Additional loaning power if law amended.

With the increased facilities thus afforded to the five regional reserve banks in immediate business contact with the cotton and tobacco growing sections and the increase of facilities to the other regional reserve banks in various parts of the country doing business incidentally with the South, it is estimated that the passage of this bill and Senate bill 6398, now ready to be voted on, would increase the credit facilities to the South in this exigency to an extent approximating $396,000,000. Of course, the bills would afford vastly increased facilities to business of all kinds in all parts of the country. In brief, this particular bill would give the regional reserve system immediately a large part of the facilities that otherwise would only be afforded after a period of three years, unless this bill should be passed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much in gold would it take from the banks that form a part of the system?

Mr. GLASS. Theoretically, about $400,000,000; but for practical purposes it would not take a dollar of gold from the member banks, because the member banks would count their transferred reserve as if it were gold in their own vaults, and the regional banks would likewise use the fund in extending credits.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but I am asking how much actual gold it takes from the local banks, not what they count in place of it.

Mr. GLASS. The figures are given approximately in a table inserted in the report of the committee, and I have just indicated the effect of the proposed alteration on the five regional reserve banks in the South.

GREAT RELEASE OF RESERVES.

In addition to this special aid which the passage of S. 6505 would afford the regional reserve banks doing business with the South, the great release of reserve funds in all the national banks of the country will tremendously expand credits in the South. That this may clearly be understood by those who entertain a real anxiety to help the situation, I present a statement showing reserves held by national banks in the 12 Federal reserve districts, as of September 12, 1914; also showing the reserves required under the present law, the reserves required under the Federal reserve act, the reserves held in excess of the amount required under the old law, and the reserves in excess of the amount required under the Federal reserve act.

A SPLENDID RECORD.

In view of this marvelous record and these heartening facts, in conjunction with other things acomplished, can it fairly be charged that there is no available relief for the situation in the South? Why, sir, this Congress and this administration are entitled to praise for what has been done and is now reasonably proposed rather than censure for omission. Let us sum up:

Reserves released and available for new credits under the Federal reserve act, $464,000,000, of which the five regional reserve banks doing business immediately with the South will have	$96,000,000
Emergency currency facilities made available under S. 6398, as amended	150,000,000
Additional facilities under S. 6505, as amended	196,000,000
Incidental credit facilities under general release of reserves	85,000,000
Total increased credit facilities for the South	437,000,000

Furthermore, as pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, there is held by the national banks of the Southern States $16,065,000 of regular Government deposits and, since August 1, 1914, $11,337,500 of crop-moving deposits, making a total of $27,402,500.

Thus the Treasury Department has issued to national banks in the Southern States since the outbreak of the European war—

Additional national-bank notes	$68,000,000
It has deposited with national banks in the Southern States during the same period crop-moving funds aggregating	11,337,000
It has on regular deposit with national banks in the Southern States	16,065,000
Total	95,402,000

Aside from this the Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the issuance, since the outbreak of the European War, to national banks throughout the country, additional national-bank circulation aggregating $348,795,210, a large part of which found its way to the South, New York City national banks alone lending to southern banks more than $40,000,000.

In the face of this impressive exhibit, Mr. Speaker, showing that this Congress and a Democratic administration have afforded and tendered additional credit facilities to the South aggregating about $600,000,000, I am amazed that there are gentlemen on this side who seek to have it appear that nothing has been done for that section!

HUMBUGGING TOBACCO PLANTERS.

Just a few words more, Mr. Speaker, and I am through. At the expiring hour of Congress, after repeatedly having their attention called to the omission, the proponents of this measure have tagged on tobacco as one of the two products upon which loans may be made; and I am reminded here that this measure is designed to help my people in Virginia. I want it distinctly understood that I would not compromise my intellectual integrity by voting for a measure which I regard as utterly vicious and unsound, even if I could think that it might in some way confer a special advantage upon my constituents. My vote can not be secured for this unsound proposition by any such bait. The tobacco growers of Virginia would never get a dollar under this bill; but, whether they would or not, I would not do violence to my judgment and my conscience by voting for a proposition which, in the end, would immeasurably add to their present distress by the inevitable impairment of public confidence, a stupendous constriction of commercial credits, and the consequent ruin to every description of business throughout the country.

BELATED SOLICITUDE.

Tobacco is in this latest-revised scheme, Mr. Speaker, merely as a last desperate expedient to get votes here for a doomed proposition, and not through any anxiety of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] for the tobacco planters or eagerness to help them. His first bill of relief was presented as long ago as August 6. In the interval between that date and this day the gentleman eight times altered his program, never once seeking to remedy the distress of the tobacco industry, but confining his benevolent attention to the cotton situation exclusively. Time and again this omission was pointed out; but never did the gentleman evince the least concern for this great domestic and export product which pays the Government millions of dollars annually in internal taxes and affords subsistence for hundreds of thousands of people.

In his first bill of August 6 the gentleman from Texas ventured to take care of "corn, wheat, and oats," as well as cotton, but not tobacco. In his bill of August 28 he again carefully excluded the tobacco grower from his paternalistic consideration. In his bill of August 31 he made "wheat, corn, oats, tobacco, and food products," as well as cotton, a basis for the distribution of Federal reserve notes to States producing these crops for export; but he very adroitly provided that these notes should be loaned only to cotton planters and not a dollar to grain and tobacco growers. Then on September 3 the gentleman from Texas gave birth to another bill to help the cotton planter exclusively, and on September 22 still another bill; but never a suggestion of relief in any of them for any farm product but cotton. Altogether there were eight of these remarkable bills; but not until the last moment was it sought to write "tobacco" into the law, and then with no guaranty whatsoever of a profitable price for the product, as in the case of cotton.

ATTENUATED BAIT!

It is with this attenuated bait, this utterly transparent pretense, in the very closing hours of this congressional session, that the gentleman maneuvers to get support for his eight-times revised remedy for a situation that demands serious action and not a series of dress parades! He would valorize cotton at 12 cents per pound, next at 10 cents, then at 8 cents, and finally at a pitiful 6 cents; but never, until the last stages of legislative effort, would he aid tobacco at all; and then he fails to accord it the advantage of a profitable market price. I frankly suspect it was imagined that this belated legislative postscript might moderate hostility to the main scheme or bring it some support; but I take leave to say that the snare is too plainly visible to catch any Member from a tobacco-growing State who is not willing to presume upon the credulity of his constituents, or not too simple to detect the futility of the enterprise. I represent one of the largest tobacco-growing districts in Virginia, and I am not going to affront the intelligence of my people by asking them to believe that they could get one particle of relief from this magical financial formula.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the temper of the House at the present moment is such that an intelligent discussion of this bill can not possibly be had. I may be mistaken in my estimate of the character of this bill, but to my mind this is the most important bill that has come up for the consideration of this Congress since the passage of the tariff bill and the currency bill. Briefly, what does the bill propose? I take it that in the rush of other matters few of you have studied this bill. Under the Federal reserve act we decreased the reserve requirements of the banks of the country. We decreased them to that point where conservative men thought we came very near the danger line. Of course, it was contended that the decrease of reserves released money that was held in the vaults of the banks and thereby expanded the legitimate credits of the country. That, of course, could be the only justification for the abnormal and extraordinary decrease we made in the reserve requirements of the banks of the country. I do not at the moment recall, nor have I the figures present, but the amount of decreased reserves provided by the Federal reserve act, or rather the lowering of reserve requirements, amounted to a credit extension that was extraordinary, and could be justified upon no other theory than that it was legitimately needed for the expanding commerce of the country.

But even in the Federal reserve act we recognized the fact it was absolutely necessary to still require the country banks to carry a sufficient reserve which the experience of those banks has shown was necessary to meet their demand obligations, that of their depositors, of course, being the primary one. Now, by the bill which is under consideration you propose to say that instead of requiring those banks to keep a certain amount of reserve money in their vaults that they may, with the permission of the Federal Reserve Board, take every dollar of reserve out of their vaults and deposit them in the regional reserve banks.

Now, gentlemen, I want you to get that fact. This bill is intended, and frankly intended, so the committee say, admitted by Mr. Warburg and those gentlemen who appeared before the committee, to take the reserve money from the country banks and concentrate it in these regional reserve banks. Not simply the reserve provided to be deposited in those regional reserve banks, but the last dollar, if thought best, that was required to be kept in the vaults of the member banks might be moved under this act and put in the vaults of the regional reserve banks. But it may be said that these banks certainly will not rob themselves of the necessary reserve. Well, you gentlemen understand what the power of the Federal Reserve Board is. Mr. Warburg appreciates the power, and in his testimony before the committee very frankly admitted that it made very little difference whether they left the power with the member banks or with the Federal Reserve Board. He said if you left the power with the banks, the board could bring sufficient pressure to bear upon the banks to make them do this if the Federal Reserve Board wanted them to do it. Now, gentlemen, will that pressure be brought to bear? I do not believe there is any doubt the point of view of the Reserve Board is such that they think that it is absolutely necessary to draw from every bank in the country the lawful reserves for the purpose of mobilizing them in the regional reserve banks.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. The object of the Federal Reserve Board, frankly stated, and frankly stated in the report of the committee, is to start these banks out with the same amount of gold that they would have at the end of the three-year period under the Federal reserve act. Now, they will start out with $251,800,000 of gold reserve. You pass this act and they will start out with approximately $700,000,000 of gold reserve.

The statement was made at one time, and I think it is true, that if you pass this bill there will not be enough lawful money left in the vaults of the country banks to "wad a shotgun." I am not an inflationist. The House will remember when we had the Federal reserve act under consideration an amendment was pending to amend the banking laws so as to make a sixth exception as to the limit of the liability of national banks, and I at that time protested against the inflation involved in that. What is the inflation involved in this? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] says that it will afford $500,000,000 additional credit facilities to the South. I wish I could hope that would be true. In the same breath yesterday though he charged the banks in the South with having facilities to get emergency currency to the extent of a hundred and fifty-odd million dollars which they were not now using. Why do they want to drain the country banks of all these reserves? Why do they want to increase the danger which is set forth in this report, which partly reads as follows:

When the Federal reserve act was framed it had for its purpose the gradual concentration into 12 Federal reserve banks of the scattered gold reserves held by many thousand banks and the gradual elimination of balances kept as reserves with reserve agents in reserve and central reserve cities. This plan of gradual development was adopted for two reasons: First, because a rapid withdrawal of all reserve balances from reserve agents would have created a dangerous disturbance; and second, because it was thought that elasticity should be added step by step only to our present system lest it should stimulate too rapid expansion.

I submit there is just as much danger in taking all at once over $400,000,000 of reserve money from the banks of the country and mobilizing it in 12 reserve banks as there is to take a smaller sum at once from the banks in the central reserve cities and deposit it in those same banks. What is the cry now at crop-moving time. Is there not now a great demand for money in the country banks? But what is the object of this bill? Any of you gentlemen who have read the newspapers recently understand what the real object of this bill is. Any of you gentlemen who have heard or read the statements of Sir George Paish, who is here now, will understand what the object is.

I picked up the New York World this morning, containing a special from Washington. I will not read it all, because it contains several subjects in reference to the conference of Sir George Paish, who is now here, he says, at the invitation of the Secretary of the Treasury. One of the statements is this:

The problem would be vastly simplified if some way could be found for getting the cotton crop into the hands of those who will need it.

Now, gentlemen, I think that the real opposition to cotton legislation is not predicated upon a fear of inflation, but I think it is predicated upon the mad desire of those who are anxious to meet their obligations in Europe. Sir George Paish says we owe England $250,000,000, I believe it is, and he says that they want cotton or cash. If they can get the cotton, they would rather have it than gold. He is very frank about saying so. I say I believe the opposition in some quarters to affording cotton relief is predicated not upon the fear of inflation, but because our cotton is wanted at sacrifice prices at which to settle this gold demand from Europe.

Now, if they do not get our cotton, they frankly and sincerely believe it is necessary to get what gold you can into these regional reserve banks, so that they can supply that gold and settle these obligations in Europe. Whether that be wise or unwise, I shall not undertake in a limited time to discuss.

What is the inflation in this bill? It is frankly admitted in the committee report it will increase the gold held by regional banks $400,000,000. The basis of issuance of Federal reserve notes is 40 per cent reserve, or $2.50 note issue to $1 of gold. With the $400,000,000 additional gold drained from the country they can, if they wish to do so, issue one billion additional of Federal reserve notes. Of course that is theoretical. It will not all be paid in gold, but it will be paid in an equivalent that can force gold from the Federal Treasury on demand.

Mr. KORBLY. The inflation would involve the amount of commercial paper that might be with the gold.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I agree that there is never inflation of currency as long as you have actual existing value back of paper money. There would be no inflation in taking care of the cotton crop, because you would have back of that currency an actual existing value which would bring the gold, and those who demand gold from us say now that they would rather have cotton than gold. As long as you have actual value back of the instrument there is not much danger of inflation. Do not let any gentleman say that it is to help the South. The object of this bill is to draw from the country banks in Minnesota, Nebraska, Illinois, Tennessee, Arkansas, Texas, and the other States their lawful money in order that these gold obligations can be settled, as we are advised by newspaper report, under some plan that is to be devised and approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to all these schemes to weaken the security of the currency of the country. I refuse to get into a panic over the cotton situation, so that I am not willing to take the risk of running riot in currency that will have to be settled for at some time if the desires the gentlemen have expressed in various matters and various bills before Congress are acceded to. It was well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday that the South met a harder proposition right after the Civil War, not only in reference to cotton, but all the other industries of the South. They went after that question with courage and manliness and hard work, and solved it among themselves, without getting any weakening of security or any inflation of currency. They met it in the regular legitimate way. Since then there has been prosperity in the South. Cotton has doubled and trebled in price.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Would the gentleman from New York characterize as inflation——

Mr. PAYNE. I have looked over the gentleman's report, and I find the object is to realize in some way money to be used in the cotton situation in the South.

Mr. GLASS. Would the gentleman characterize as inflation a credit basis upon a gold reserve of 40 per cent and a secondary commercial-paper reserve of 100 per cent? Would the gentleman call that inflation?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know what that has to do with the question I am trying to discuss.

Cotton has advanced two to three times in value since then, taking into consideration the cotton seed and the value that is attached to that. And I have no doubt the people of the South are thrifty. I do not speak of the negroes. I speak of the white classes of the South. They certainly ought to be. They ought to be forehanded. They ought to have money. Now, it is said that the negro will use up his income every year when he gets it, no matter how large or how small it is. I understand the system is that they let them have some land, and they go to work and cultivate the crop and get a share of it. But men who own the land have to finance them every year. I can not see any other way in which to do it. I have been told by gentlemen holding seats in this House that cotton is a profitable crop at 7 cents a pound—a good, profitable business. In the last five years it has averaged 12 cents a pound all over the South. I know it is not so in some of the old barren lands that have to be fertilized at great expense, but in lands that do not have to be fertilized, and the biggest part of the crop is raised on land that does not have to be fertilized, that is the case. I do not think they are in such panicky condition as politicians would make us believe. I think they can go ahead now and take care of themselves. They have not any harder proposition to meet than some of my own people have who are engaged in various kinds of business. They do not require any more money.

Why, we passed this Federal reserve act. It was compiled largely from a study of 21 years, I understand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. It was a good act when it was passed. I said so then and I say so now. It depends largely on the way it is administered by the Federal Reserve Board. When a disposition was made to establish localities for regional reserve banks I did not like the way the two Secretaries and the comptroller performed their tasks. I thought they had opened up difficulties in the way of carrying out the act according to the intention of it and making it a success. I think they put reserve banks where they ought not to be. They did not put them in the line of ordinary business, in centers where the ordinary business was done, but moved them away from those centers.

They made it a necessity for banks, many of them, to keep accounts in two centers—one of the centers where they did their business and one in the regional reserve center. It served to tie up money. I think it ought to be corrected now; it is not too late. I think we ought to carry out the act as was the original intent of it, as it was studied and thought out and even modified, by gentlemen who are experienced in the banking business in the various large money centers of the United States.

It is time enough to get back onto that now. But do not let us inflate the currency any more. Why, you have added $300,000,000 already, within the past two months. You are liable to add more. If these schemes all pass, no man can say where the end will be.

It is true the House cut out the other day this $250,000,000 of greenbacks that nearly a majority of the House wanted to issue. Now do not under a panic destroy really the only good law you have passed during these 18 months of Congress.

Mr. KORBLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. KORBLY. Will the gentleman explain how it happens that the State of Illinois requires no reserves at all and thereby prevents inflation?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not know whether the State of Illinois requires any reserves or not.

Mr. KORBLY. It has no fixed requirement.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield, so that I can find out from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KORBLY] how much currency the banks of Illinois issue?

Mr. KORBLY. The gentleman from Illinois very well knows that the banks of Illinois issue no currency; and the gentleman from New York knows that this bill is not intended to provide for an increase of currency in any sense at all.

Mr. PAYNE. It provides for currency to pay the debts of the bank—currency or otherwise. That is what it provides for, and you propose to allow it all to go out of the vaults of the bank, where you want it to redeem the debts of the bank, or redeem the notes. I did not think the gentleman referred to State banks or I could have answered his question very readily, and I know and he knows and everybody knows that they can not issue any currency.

Mr. KORBLY. But they issue credits.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, every bank issues credits, of course, but they do not issue credits all payable at the same moment. They issue credits payable on the average at stated times. They prepare for it at stated times; but when you come to currency, it is liable to be demanded any minute, and you can not prepare for it; and if demands are made and you have calls for deposits, why then there is a panic, and the bank, although solvent, will have to go into liquidation.

Now, gentlemen, do not under a panic in these last days of the session, in trying to do something to alleviate the fears and the anxiety of these politicians, no matter what section they may come from—do not in the days of a panic try to destroy the best bill you have passed, and I think the only good bill you have passed, during this session of Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has 9 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KORBLY] 22 minutes.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nine minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] going to use any of his time?

Mr. GLASS. There will be only one speech on this side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as a very important measure to defeat. I think its passage into law would be likely to largely destroy the credit of all the small banks of the country. It would be a notice to every depositor in every bank that the bank reserves were taken away from the banks. It would be a notice that the banks would not be very likely to pay currency on demand.

Now, in the Federal reserve law which we passed we were very careful, following a time-honored attitude of Congress, not to take away from the small banks, or even the large banks, all of their real reserve, and we required that a certain portion of the reserve should be kept in the vaults of the banks. In the country banks——

Mr. KORBLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MANN. No; not unless you give me the time.

Mr. KORBLY. I have not any time.

Mr. MANN. Then I will not yield. I did not restrict the time. I have not the time.

In the country banks 12 per cent of the deposits are required to be kept as reserve, and 5 per cent of time deposits, but practically 12 per cent; and we required that for the first 36 months 5 per cent should be kept in the vaults of the banks, and after the first 36 months 4 per cent of the reserves should consist of lawful money, kept in the vaults of the banks. We provided that 2 per cent of the reserve must be deposited in the Federal reserve bank, and we left to the country bank the option of depositing the other 5 per cent with the Federal reserve bank or with a reserve city bank, I believe, or keeping it in their own vaults.

The country banks now have an option on more than one-third of their reserves, but they are required to keep 5 per cent in their vaults. Why? In order that people may have confidence in the bank, confidence that it has some money. The moment that you advertise to the country that a bank does not have to keep any money on hand, it is rather difficult for it to acquire the confidence which is necessary in order to obtain deposits.

We did the same thing with respect to the reserve city banks. We required that they should keep 6 per cent out of 15 per cent reserve in their vaults. That is, the reserve city banks are required to have 15 per cent of their deposits as reserve, and 6 per cent of that under the law must be kept in their own vaults, and the large central reserve cities are required to keep 18 per cent reserve, of which 6 per cent must be kept in their vaults. That is not a very onerous requirement for safety, that in making these transfers to the Federal reserve bank the banks shall keep some money in their own vaults, and when they run below that it is their business to require some lawful money to be kept on hand as a reserve.

Now, this proposition is to absolutely do away with those requirements. Under this proposition no bank is required to keep any money on hand at all. It would be required to have the reserve just as it is now, but it does not need to keep any of it in its own vaults. It may deposit it all in the Federal reserve bank, while under the bill in form it is left optional with the banks. As stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], it is the announced intention of the Federal Reserve Board—and I think I do not do injustice to the Federal Reserve Board when I say that Mr. Warburg constitutes the board—it is the announced intention of the Federal Reserve Board to bring pressure to bear upon these banks throughout the country to force them to deposit all of their reserves in the Federal reserve banks.

In other words, while the country banks all over the country will be required otherwise to keep some money in their vaults, it is the purpose of this bill to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to have the power, which they intend to exercise, to force all the legal money of the country to be transferred to 12 cities in the country. Of course that is pyramiding reserves, because the Federal Reserve Board banks are not required to keep this money on deposit. They are required to keep only 35 per cent of it on deposit; and while a country bank now keeps 5 per cent of legal-tender money as reserves under the Federal reserve law, under this bill it will deposit that 5 per cent in the Federal reserve bank, and that bank will keep only 35 per cent of that, so there will be less than 2 per cent of real money kept there. Now, you can go on pyramiding reserves, in the way of inflation, for a long time, sometimes, but in the end you meet the crash. Why, gentlemen seem to think that getting more money out, or making a gold basis so that you can take in more securities, will add to the comfort of the people. We have issued $300,000,000 or more of emergency currency within the last two months, and meanwhile credit is steadily going down; and if you pass this bill and it becomes a law at the time when you are changing the system of handling money—from the banks to the Federal reserve banks—the result will be that the depositors of the country will go to their banks and ask for money and money will not be obtainable, not even the emergency currency. There is not the possibility of printing the emergency currency or Federal reserve bank currency to meet all of the demands of the country without credit, and credit is destroyed when people are afraid they can not get their money from the banks.

Mr. KORBLY. I should like to have the gentleman yield to me a minute to ask him a question.

Mr. MANN. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. KORBLY. Will the gentleman explain how it is that the State banks of Illinois manage to have on hand enough money to meet their demand obligations from day to day, when the State of Illinois has no fixed reserve requirements?

Mr. MANN. I can explain it very easily. There is not a State bank in Illinois that does not either keep on hand a large reserve in its vaults or keep on hand in the vaults of the national bank next door a large reserve of cash.

Mr. KORBLY. Not under the law of the State.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know either the law or the facts in Illinois, and I know both.

Mr. KORBLY. The law of Illinois does not require a fixed reserve, and the gentleman knows I am right about it.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference what the law of Illinois requires. No bank can live there at all, no bank can obtain credit, unless the people know that it has a reserve in its own vaults or in the vaults of the national bank next door.

Mr. KORBLY. Then the people of Illinois are willing to trust the Illinois bankers to take care of that situation.

Mr. MANN. The people of Illinois have been trying for a long time to amend the banking laws of Illinois, but I regret to say they have not been very successfully amended up to date. But the solidity of the State banks all over the country depends largely upon the reserve requirement as to the national banks. The people know that the national banks are required to keep some money in their vaults, and they are all correspondents of the State banks. You propose now to fix it so that neither the State banks nor the national banks shall have any money. All they will have will be the right to call on somebody else for money. That will not meet the situation. If you pass this bill, you will regret it. It will not aid the South. Of course, the gentleman makes the plea that it will aid the South. The purpose of this bill, in the first place, was to take care of the stocks and bonds which the Federal Reserve

Board was afraid were going to be dumped on this country from Europe, and that may be a legitimate reason for desiring it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has a total misconception of this bill if he thinks it was designed exclusively to aid the South, and I was very unhappy in my presentation of the matter if I produced the impression that it was so designed. We have just had presented some remarkably inconsistent criticisms of the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] saying it was designed to aid the South, which should work out its own salvation, and my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] contending that it will not aid the South, but was primarily designed to supply the gold demands of New York bankers, to enable them to meet their European obligations. As a matter of fact, the bill was not designed to aid exclusively any section of the country. It was reported by an almost unanimous vote of the Banking and Currency Committee, the member of the committee from New York voting for it. I merely pointed out the fact that it would aid the cotton credits of the South to pass this bill, which is not a currency measure, but a banking measure. The South already has ample currency. What it needs is extended credit facilities.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman, and if he had rather I would not I will not interrupt him.

Mr. GLASS. It is no embarrassment to be interrupted.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman the question if his currency is not predicated upon a credit basis?

Mr. GLASS. That is true; but credit not always or largely on a currency basis.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you get credits unwisely extended, do you not to that extent impair the solvency of the currency that is based upon it?

Mr. GLASS. That is true; but I think the credit basis here proposed is not, under the circumstances, unwise.

While I am entitled to be acquitted of ever having introduced politics into the discussion of banking and currency topics, I think I have occasion just now to congratulate the country, if what my Republican friends have said about this bill is true, that it escaped a Republican currency system. I will remind the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that the Monetary Commission, dominated by Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, appointed by a Republican Vice President and a Republican Speaker of this House, not only proposed to permit the banks to divest themselves of all reserve funds and to deposit them in one single central bank, but it went desperately further and provided that the notes of the central bank might be used by individual banks for reserve, thereby affording possibilities of inflation amounting to the enormous sum of $6,000,000,000. They proposed these things not as temporary expedients, as we propose this for a period of three years to meet an exigency, but as a permanent part of our national banking and currency system. If we are suggesting inflation, in heaven's name what would you call the thing proposed by this Republican Monetary Commission?

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time in order that we may vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERLEY). The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the Federal reserve act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to permit member banks to carry in the Federal reserve banks of their respective districts any portion of their reserves now required by section 19 of this act to be held in their own vaults."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, do we consider the bill for the purpose of amendment by paragraph or by the whole section?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the whole bill may be read and be subject to amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the entire bill be read for amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 16 of the Federal reserve act is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to devise and put into operation a system of clearances of national-bank notes between the Treasury, the Federal reserve banks, and the member banks, and for that purpose to designate Federal reserve banks as agents of the United States."

First committee amendment:

"Page 1, line 3, strike out the word 'eleven' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'nineteen.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia why the number of the section should have to be changed from 11 to 19. It seems to me that anyone reading the Federal reserve act ought to have been able to read the act correctly, so as to get the correct section that is to be amended.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain that in a moment. The bill as it passed the Senate provided that the Federal Reserve Board should have the power to permit the banks to make this shift in their reserves. Being an additional power to be given to the Federal Reserve Board, the Senate proposed that it should be added to section 11, which deals with the powers of the Federal Reserve Board. The House Committee proposed an amendment striking out the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, and leaving the matter to the initiative of the individual banks, and therefore thought that the matter might be more appropriately added to section 19 of the act, which deals with reserve requirements.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is a peculiar thing that when you come to amend an important act like the Federal reserve act the Senate proposes that the Federal Reserve Board shall have power to permit the banks to do a certain thing, and the House committee proposes that the banks shall have the power to do this same thing. What is the occasion for the amendment at all?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, it is the judgment of the House commmittee that the banks should have the discretion themselves, rather than the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. MANN. The banks would have just as much discretion under the Senate provision as they would have under the House provision.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Let me see whether they would or not. The Senate provision was that the Federal Reserve Board should have the power to permit the banks to do a certain thing. That is not any different from our saying that the banks shall have permission to do that thing.

Mr. BULKLEY. But suppose the Federal Reserve Board should refuse to permit them to do it, then what discretion would the banks have?

Mr. MANN. They would not have any.

Mr. BULKLEY. Under our provision they would have complete discretion, whether the board permitted it or not.

Mr. MANN. The banks ought not to have the power to take the money out of their vaults and deposit it in the Federal reserve banks, and certainly not unless the Federal Reserve Board approved of it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then the gentleman disagrees with the judgment of the committee on a matter of policy; but the subject matter of the amendment is so changed by the House committee amendment that it should be attached to another section of the act, and that is why the number of the section is changed.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any reason for the amendment yet. The gentleman may have given a very good reason, but I have not seen it. Of course I am opposed to either provision, but I would a good deal rather the Senate provision prevailed than the House provision. Under the Senate provision there was at least an additional safeguard, that the taking of all of their money out of their own vaults was not to be permitted unless the Federal Reserve Board by regulation permitted it. You let every country bank take the money out—have no legal tender of any kind in its vaults.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to delay the House by any lengthy statement, even were it permissible under the rule, touching this bill, but I can not give my consent to it because I am unconvinced that there is any need for the issue of additional currency or additional facility for credits at this time, and the real purpose of this bill must be that. One of the reasons that it is desired to get the gold or lawful money out of the member banks into the regional reserve banks is that 65 per cent of it may be made the basis for the issue of additional currency. Now, I agree thoroughly with what the gentleman——

Mr. KORBLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a moment.

Mr. KORBLY. The deposit with the Federal reserve banks would be used for the creation of an account against which the member bank could check.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but the Federal reserve banks could not issue currency on that sum unless it was there—could not issue currency against it if it was in the member bank instead——

Mr. KORBLY. It could not create a checking credit, either.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand they check against it, and to that extent it may not be left to the regional reserve banks for the purpose of currency; but one of the reasons for this bill is to give an enlarged basis for the issue of currency. Is not that true?

Mr. KORBLY. No.

Mr SHERLEY. I put it to the gentleman, is not the purpose of this bill to give to the Federal reserve banks a larger sum of lawful money or gold that may be made the basis for the issuing of additional currency?

Mr. KORBLY. No.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the purpose?

Mr. KORBLY. It is for the purpose of enabling them to further extend credits.

Mr. SHERLEY. How do they extend credits? They may extend them by issuing the currency.

Mr. KORBLY. They also may do it by establishing a credit or deposit account against which the member bank may check.

Mr. SHERLEY. But they can only give credit on the basis of this money which is placed there.

Mr. KORBLY. They can take the gold and use it as the 40 per cent of the reserve required against the outstanding demand obligations. This demand obligation is not a note—not a Federal reserve note. The member bank gets credit for 100 per cent of the value of commercial paper, provided the Federal reserve bank has 40 per cent gold in its vaults.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably; but when it comes to paying the credit that has been given to the banks they have to pay through the notes they issue or the actual money they have there. Now, the gentleman in charge of the bill has repeatedly stated that the purpose was to enable the increase of currency that might be issued, or I so understood him.

Mr. KORBLY. I want to say for my part, and I think I am saying it on behalf of the chairman of the committee, that he expressly denies having said that, and he does not want to be understood as saying this bill has expansion for its purpose. The bill purposes greater credit facilities and not necessarily current credit facilities, otherwise called Federal reserve notes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether that be the purpose, that is not the result. The result would be to increase the power of the Federal reserve banks to issue currency and place this reserve in their banks instead of the member banks. Now, what I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana is this: It is true that you may have a sound bank without the requirement of any reserve, but the reason we have reserve requirements is to compel, at least to the extent of the reserves sound banking——

Mr. GLASS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that there is no legal requirement of reserves in England or in Canada?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman frankly the need of a reserve depends a good deal upon the character of a people. Now, the character of the American people is and always has been such as to make their banking go to a point sometimes of extreme danger. I do not consider that it is desirable to give to the banks, without any check such as a reserve placed upon them, the power to go ahead in what they may conscientiously believe to be a proper and safe giving of credits. The danger in America right now, as a result of the war, is not so much dear money as it is that we will go into an era of loose credits, where money will be loaned on inadequate security and where your currency, based as it is in a measure upon credits, will be weakened by the very character of the credits that have been granted.

Mr. GLASS. For that very reason, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the English or Canadian system could be wisely applied to the United States, and for that very reason I believe in a fixed legal reserve requirement. I agree with the gentleman that it has a tendency to restrain, and because of that we included it in the Federal reserve act——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky have five minutes additional.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. In answer to the gentleman, I simply say this: The very reason that it is considered necessary to pass this law now, to do away with the reserve requirement, is because the authors of the recent banking laws believed that a reserve is a desirable thing.

And the very indication that it is still the opinion of the distinguished chairman is the fact that he has put a limitation upon the life of this very provision that he proposes to enact into law.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the committee, as a member of the conference committee, threw out the Senate proposal to make this a permanent provision of the reserve act, and the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee is now opposed to making it a permanent provision of the Federal reserve act. This is simply a temporary expedient, and it does not do away with reserves. It simply transfers reserves from one point to another.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but the gentleman's statement narrows the question right down, and there is where I wanted to bring it. Is there such a condition in America now as to warrant us in disregarding what we believe and what the gentleman states he believes as to the wisdom of the present law in keeping the reserve in the member banks? That is the concrete situation with which this House is confronted. Your danger is not that you will not be able to give enough credit, but your danger now in America is that under stress and pressure you will give unwise credit, and I am not willing to lend myself to a medium by which that can be done more easily.

Mr. GLASS. In my judgment there is now a condition in this country which calls for this remedy, and but for that I would not advocate it, even as a temporary expedient. It is the unanimous opinion of the Federal Reserve Board, after carefully considering this proposition, that conditions are such as make such legislation not only desirable but almost essential to enable the Federal reserve system to cope with the situation that now confronts the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that be true, how does it square with the statement of the gentleman that the banks have not now taken full advantage of their opportunities under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act?

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman simply confuses the measure designed to amplify credits with a proposition to increase the volume of currency.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; I do not.

Mr. GLASS. There is no more currency needed in the country, and there is a great deal of credit needed in parts of the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman wants to recognize that a bank having facilities to increase its currency under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act to that extent would have an opportunity to enlarge its credits.

Mr. GLASS. Even if that were so, which I question, I can readily see why a bank that would not take out the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency currency might want to take out the credits permitted to it under this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, of course; because in one case there is a liability on the bank in the way of interest and in the other there is not.

Mr. GLASS. Still, in the other case there is a gold reserve of 40 per cent required, and a secondary reserve of commercial paper of 100 per cent; not applicable to the emergency currency; and, besides, they pay interest on rediscounts.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand they pay interest on rediscounts——

Mr. GLASS. And it is within the power of the Federal Reserve Board to initiate such rediscount rates as will make it impossible to inflate the credits or the currency.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be; but it is possible that the Federal Reserve Board may be infected as the banks may be, as to the character of credit.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think that is likely.

Mr. SHERLEY. In times of stress there is a tendency, particularly among a people constituted as we are, believing in the future of our country, to overestimate the soundness of the collateral on which credit is given.

Mr. GLASS. Then, what does my friend think of the proposition made by the Monetary Commission, under the lead of Mr. Aldrich, when there was no emergency, to not only transfer all the reserves of the banks to a central reserve bank, but to permit the notes of that bank to be used as reserve in the individual banks?

Mr. SHERLEY. I thought it was so bad that I was not willing to support it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2: Strike out lines 6 and 7, on page 1, and substitute the following: "For a period of 36 months after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in any district as provided in section 19 of the Federal reserve act."

The SPEAKER The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear all of the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Of course, the purpose of this bill is to increase the amount of gold in the Federal reserve banks, to take it out of the member banks and put it into the Federal reserve banks. There is no controversy about that. The question arose as to whether the effect of it was largely to increase the power to issue Federal reserve notes. I understood the gentleman to say that was not the purpose of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but I did not say it might not be the effect of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KORBLY], with a great deal of éclat, said that the gentleman from Virginia denied that that was the purpose of the bill. Well, the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia might be one thing, but what the purpose of the bill is must appear on the bill. Here is the language of the law:

Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money, not less than 35 per cent against deposits, and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation—

And so forth.

So the purpose of the bill is the effect of the bill, and the effect of the bill is to increase the power to issue additional Federal reserve notes by hundreds of millions of dollars.

No more disastrous proposition could be offered to the country at this time.

Mr. KORBLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KORBLY. The gentleman knows very well that the Federal reserve banks will have credits issued by member banks of vast sums of money that may be converted into Federal reserve notes at the option of the member banks, so that there is no restriction in the law now that will prevent member banks from getting all the Federal reserve notes they may want or desire without this amendment being at all necessary to enable them to get it.

Mr. MANN. I do not agree with the gentleman at all as to how much money they may desire. Under the present law the banks can not obtain emergency currency without putting up good security. It is true you are trying to change that law so that you will not require very good security, but that change has not been made.

Mr. GLASS. Does the gentleman say that the obligations of the business men of the United States are not as good security as certain stocks and bonds?

Mr. MANN. I certainly say that commercial paper is not as good as municipal and State bonds, and certainly not as good as United States bonds.

Mr. GLASS. Why, it is infinitely better.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am willing to go to the country on that proposition at any time as to commercial paper. That is the whole basis of the gentleman's theory. That is the real defined issue and the line of cleavage here. The gentleman believes, and is trying to enact into law, that commercial paper is better security for currency issued than the solid stocks and bonds of the municipalities and States of this country.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman knows very well that the bankers of the United States and the business men of the United States take my side of that controversy.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have been engaged in this controversy on this side for many long years. The business men of the country are not on the side of the gentleman at all.

Mr. GLASS. The Monetary Commission was, and that was headed by Mr. Aldrich.

Mr. MANN. Well, let the gentleman go ahead. I will wait.

Mr. GLASS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. I am not criticizing him. I am willing that the gentleman shall finish his statement.

Mr. GLASS. I do not want to do it without the cheerful permission of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has my cheerful permission.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I was proceeding to say that so great a financier as Mr. Aldrich, as well as those associated with him on the Monetary Commission, certainly took that view of the matter, and their scheme was approved unanimously by the American Bankers' Association, there not being one dissenting vote.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Virginia may have been converted in favor of the Aldrich monetary scheme. There were some good things about it, but I never fully subscribed to it myself.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GLASS. I took the good in the Aldrich proposal and left out the bad.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I have five minutes more? I did not get a chance to state one sentence without interruption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Every time some matter comes up some gentleman says, "Why, that was in the Aldrich monetary scheme." [Laughter on the Republican side.] Nobody ever adopted that feature except the Monetary Commission, and while the Monetary Commission reported favorably upon it, not one of them, so far as I know, really wanted to have the Aldrich-Vreeland bill enacted into law.

Mr. GLASS. The American Bankers' Association unanimously indorsed it.

Mr. MANN. I understand; and yet nearly every bank that I know of protested against various provisions in it to me.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois understood correctly the statement of the gentleman from Virginia. I do not believe the gentleman from Virginia meant to convey the idea that he stands squarely with Senator Aldrich on this currency question.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will not say he did. But every time a question is raised by me, the gentleman from Virginia attempts to convince me by stating that he and Senator Aldrich were together on the proposition. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GLASS. "The gentleman from Virginia" was trying to indicate that he was not afraid to accept what was good in the bill of the Monetary Commission simply because Senator Aldrich's name was attached to it. He was willing to take the good and leave out the evil. That is precisely what happened.

Mr. MANN. Personally I would rather discuss the proposition itself than discuss the question of whether somebody was for or against it. I was discussing the section of this bill. In the first place it does give some added credit by enlarging the power of the Federal reserve bank to discount the paper of the member banks. That is true; and then, in addition to that, it gives the Federal reserve bank a large sum of pyramid reserves—gold, pyramided gold—upon which it can issue Federal reserve notes; a dangerous proposition.

Gentlemen may say, "Maybe they will not exercise it." I think that the strain is likely to come where everything that can issue currency will issue currency, and if we can not withstand the strain here in Congress it need not be expected that the banks will withstand the strain. They are not asking that they should have the right, but if they have the right, with customers coming to them and calling attention to their right, they are apt to issue this currency. If we could restrict the currency to-day and add to the credit, I believe we could add $10 in credit for every $2 of currency that we could restrict. Gentlemen who have other views believe that if we can add $10 in currency we may not restrict the credit. It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, in our day to add largely to the emergency currency or anything of that nature and keep credit good.

Some gentleman awhile ago stated that the Bank of England refused to pay gold. I saw that statement in a newspaper. Then I read the statement of Mr. Paish—if that is his name—the other day, quoted in the paper, that the Bank of England had not refused to pay gold on check at any time in this trouble. One trouble with our country is that we have been afraid to pay our debts to Europe. If we would send over and pay the gold we owe to Europe we might reestablish our credit. But what the financial interests are all afraid of is that because our credit is impaired, because we have not been willing to pay our debts in gold, the Europeans holding our stocks and bonds will be afraid to hold them and will dump them upon us.

Mr. GLASS. Does not the gentleman concede that this bill will make it easier for us to pay our debts in gold? In fact, my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] says that is the design of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think the bill would make it easier to pay the gold over in Europe, and if that were all it would do I would be perfectly willing to vote for it. But I am not willing to pay gold to Europe and at the same time destroy the credit of the local country banks to the American people at home. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, in line 3, by striking out the word "to" and inserting the word "may."

The amendment was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN PENSION BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The other day the House passed an omnibus House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) correcting mistakes in some pension bills. After that the House passed House joint resolution 375, which included one item that was in the omnibus resolution. Afterwards the House passed a request to the Senate to send back House joint resolution 375, but the Senate had already passed it. The Chair thinks the best way out of it is, by unanimous consent, to direct the enrolling clerk not to enroll House joint resolution 375.

Mr. MANN. It is over here now. Would it not be well to lay it on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so; and, if there be no objection, House joint resolution 375 will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whether it is in order or not, it is done.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

The SPEAKER. Has any gentleman any amendment he wants to offer to this bill which we have been debating, S. 6505?

Mr. PLATT. I have an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after the word "States," insert a new section, as follows: "Line 2 of paragraph 3 of section 16 of the Federal reserve act is hereby amended by striking out the word 'thirty-five' and inserting in lieu thereof 'fifty.'"

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULKLEY. How much time remains for debate?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving a point of order, to what part of the bill does the gentleman offer his amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Line 14, page 2.

Mr. PLATT. At the end of line 14, on page 2, to insert a new section.

Mr. WINGO. You add something to it, do you?

Mr. PLATT. I add something to it—a new section increasing the reserves against deposits in Federal reserve banks. Mr. Speaker, the only serious objection in my mind to this bill allowing national banks to keep all their reserves in the Federal reserve banks is that it does not at the same time increase the required reserves of the Federal reserve banks. According to the Federal reserve act, on page 17, the Federal reserve banks are required to keep only 35 per cent reserve against deposits. Here by this bill we permit the country banks, or member banks, to keep all their reserves in the Federal reserve banks, but we do not increase the required reserve of the Federal reserve banks themselves in proportion. If we increase it from 35 per cent to 50 per cent, I can see no objection to this bill. It is a radical departure from American banking ideas, but is in accordance with European practice. The individual banks there do not keep large reserves in their own vaults, and are not generally required by law to keep any. In fact, they keep no more than just what is necessary for till money. For instance, English banks know that they can go to the Bank of England at any time, if their credit is good, and get money. They keep their reserves on deposit in the Bank of England. As I understand it, it is the expectation of the Federal Reserve Board that if this act is passed it will apply largely to the big city banks.

For instance, a bank in New York City having a great big stock of gold in its vaults and finding it a nuisance will take out that gold and send it to the Federal reserve bank, which will then have to count it and care for it, and it will not be a care to the individual bank. Probably most of the country banks will not do it, but a good many of the city banks will, and it will give the Federal reserve system a chance to organize with a good-sized pool of gold, whereas, divided up as it is, it will have no such chance. I think that is the greatest blunder and the greatest mistake of the Federal reserve system, that it is divided up into 12 banks, for none of them can organize so as to look like more than 30 cents in such an emergency as the present. The New York City Reserve Bank will organize with only $3,300,000 capital in the face of the fact that the National City Bank has $25,000,000 capital and $25,000,000 surplus. The deposits in the Federal reserve banks will be only a little over $100,000,000, which is not enough to amount to anything in a big city, like New York. This bill is intended to permit the National City Bank, the Bank of Commerce, and other big banks to put all their gold in the Federal reserve banks, so as to make it look like a big bank, which it ought to be.

Mr. GLASS. Make it look like it would at the end of the three years provided by the Federal reserve law.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; make it look as it would at the end of three years, and make it look as it would if there were only 4 banks instead of 12.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman's amendment is designed to minimize the evils of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; to increase the reserve required to be kept by the Federal reserve banks. If this amendment is adopted, I shall have no objection to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment reported again?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read the amendment again.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "vaults," in line 5, page 2. That would strike out the shifting of reserves provisions of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, in the short time that I have, of course I can not discuss some things that I would like to. Before I forget it, I want to say——

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that this is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; I am advised that that same amendment is already pending.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the right to offer an amendment whenever he gets the floor, under the rule.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of this occasion to say this, and I have thought of doing it for several days: I think the man who undertakes now to question either the integrity of the credit of this country or of the United States Treasury is either unpatriotic or very ignorant of the true conditions that exist. The United States Treasury to-day is stronger than it has ever been in the history of this Government. It has more gold piled up in its vaults than it has ever had before. I deny that the people of this country or that the people of any nation have any doubt as to either the condition of the Treasury of the United States or the soundness of the credit of this country. I think that the United States will meet every obligation to the letter of that obligation. I think we will maintain our financial integrity at home and abroad; and I repeat that that man, however high his station in public life, who undertakes for political purposes, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, to raise any doubt as to the ability of the United States Treasury to meet every demand upon it is unpatriotic and should be driven from public life.

A word now as to the fixed reserves. If you are opposed to fixed reserves, then, of course, you can vote for this bill. If you believe in fixed reserves, you will not vote for it. It is said that an honest bank does not need any fixed-reserve law. That is true. An honest official does not need to give a bond, but bonds are required of certain officers, to which the honest official does not object. The safe, careful, and legitimate banker does not need any law to make him maintain a reserve. He will maintain that reserve which experience shows him is necessary; but a reserve clause in the law is necessary to protect the depositors and the public against unwise, extravagant, and reckless bankers, and that is the reason why you have a fixed reserve requirement in the law. In conclusion I desire to say that this is the most important bill that has been considered here since we passed the currency act. The bold purpose of it is to rob the country banks of their lawful money and let them use the "chips and whetstones," so to speak, of currency to meet the demands of their depositors. If you want to have them do that, then vote for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PLATT) there were—ayes 21, noes 58.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have that amendment again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULKLEY) there were—ayes 31, noes 51.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may have tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for tellers. Is there objection?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will let us get through with these bills.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there are not enough Members here to get tellers under the rule in all probability. I do not desire to make the point of no quorum, and I do not expect to make it myself at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that tellers be appointed.

Mr. MANN. I shall not make the point of no quorum anyway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 27, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of Senate bill 6398.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. This is not the proper time to do that. The question is on the third reading.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BULKLEY) there were—ayes 63, noes 23.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. MANN. No. I can not withhold it without losing my right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; the gentleman can.

Mr. MANN. No; I can not. The gentleman knows that as well as I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, pending the announcement of the vote——

Mr. MANN. But the vote has been announced, and I have made the point of no quorum. There is no way that I can withdraw that without having the vote stand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may withhold it.

Mr. MANN. I warned the gentleman a while ago.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will give me a moment, the Chair will preserve his rights to make the point of no quorum if he will withdraw the point until the resolution which the gentleman from New York desires to have passed, which ought to be passed, is acted upon.

Mr. MANN. Then I withdraw the point of no quorum.

OCTOBER SALARIES OF HOUSE AND SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House Senate joint resolution 200, and that we may consider it at this time, together with the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, borne upon the annual and session rolls, their respective salaries for the month of October, 191', on the day of adjournment; and the Clerk of the House is authorized to pay on said day to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners their allowances for clerk hire for said month of October.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

"Provided, That the session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be paid hereunder for the entire month of October, and a sufficient sum is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for that purpose."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York will not insist upon that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the only purpose of the amendment is to permit the pages and certain session employees to obtain a full month's pay.

Mr. HAY. I understand that. In other words, the gentleman wants to pay them for what they have not done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say to the gentleman that perhaps he was not in the House earlier, when the resolution came up and the unanimous expression of opinion was that it was the desire to do this much, and for that reason the arrangement was made to offer this amendment at this time. The page boys' appropriation is an indefinite one and provides for their payment up to the day of adjournment. The feeling was that the session employees, as they go off the roll as soon as we adjourn——

Mr. HAY. I understand exactly. The gentleman is asking to pay these people for 10 days' work which they have not performed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a gratuity of seven days to the session employees.

Mr. HAY. All right; I will not make an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. It is an automatic call.

The SPEAKER. There is not a quorum present; the Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and——

Mr. BULKLEY. I understand the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 163, nays 49, answered "present" 3, not voting 214, as follows:

So the third reading was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will note the presence of Mr. PLATT, of New York. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted "aye." [Applause.]

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, has the bill been read a third time?

The SPEAKER. No. The Clerk will read the bill a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the bill in full.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill, S. 6398, was read in full.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO moves to recommit the bill S. 6398 to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to report the same back to the House with the following amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to dispense with the reading of it, so as to save time, if the House wishes. The bill covered by my motion is the bill that a conference of the Members of Congress from the South agreed on, with only four dissenting votes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I will state what it is.

Mr. MANN. I think it should be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] reserves the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO moves to recommit S. 6398 to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the same back to the House immediately with the following amendment:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and under the terms and conditions herein prescribed, to be loaned by said banks to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or owners of lands upon which the same was produced during the year 1914, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, upon notes having a maturity not exceeding 12 months, and legally and properly secured by such cotton or tobacco. The deposits herein authorized shall be advanced upon the terms prescribed in this act and under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in proportion to the value of cotton and tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make and enforce rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith for carrying out the purposes of this act. Said Secretary of the Treasury may fix the compensation for the banks for their services in lending said sums of money.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000 to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000: Provided, That such United States notes, should the Secretary of the Treasury conclude to issue them, deposited under this act and not used as prescribed herein, shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be destroyed.

"SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

"SEC. 7. That the provisions of sections 3, 4, and 5 of this act shall expire by limitation on the 31st day of December, 1915."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order. I observe it is the same amendment which the gentleman from Oklahoma offered and which was agreed upon by the southern Representatives.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not all of them.

Mr. HAY. Well, some of them. And the Speaker ruled it out of order. I now make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order. The gentleman can only make one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENRY moved to recommit the bill S. 6398 to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to report the same with the following amendments, to wit:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit in national banking associations and in State banks situated in States producing cotton or tobacco, or both, the sum of $250,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. The said Secretary shall make such deposits under the terms of this act and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him to carry out this act. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the number of bales of cotton or pounds of tobacco produced therein during the year 1913, as ascertained by the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of the securities he is now authorized or required by law to exact of the banks in which the funds of the United States are deposited, is authorized and hereby directed to accept as security for the deposits directed to be made in this act cotton warehouse and tobacco warehouse receipts, where the cotton or tobacco thereby represented has been fully insured, at a valuation that represents the fair market value of the cotton or tobacco covered by such receipts. The deposits herein directed to be made shall be made only on the condition that the banks accepting such deposits will loan the same, under reasonable terms and conditions, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent per annum, to the producers of cotton or tobacco, or the owners of lands upon which same was produced during the year 1914, and the said Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning the terms and conditions under which these deposits shall be loaned by the banks that accept the same.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his discretion, either immediately cause to be prepared United States notes to the extent of $250,000,000, to be used for the purpose of making the deposits in compliance with this act, which said notes shall have all the legal qualities of the United States notes now outstanding, and shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and said notes shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum from the date of their issuance and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States or its equivalent on January 1, 1916; or he may sell not exceeding $240,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, heretofore authorized by law, at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and the act or acts heretofore passed authorizing the disposition of said bonds are hereby amended so as fully to authorize the disposition and use of such bonds as herein prescribed; or, in his discretion, the Secretary of the Treasury may use both the proceeds of the bonds and the notes in order to carry out the purposes of this act, not to exceed in the aggregate $250,000,000.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not require the repayment of any deposit made under the provisions of this act prior to December 31, 1915.

"SEC. 6. That when the deposits herein authorized are called in by the Secretary of the Treasury the same shall be and become a part of a special fund, to be kept and held separate and apart from the general funds of the Government, for the redemption and retirement at maturity of the Panama Canal bonds in such cases and to such extent as the proceeds of such bonds have been used to make the deposits herein provided."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order.

Mr. BULKLEY. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that is not germane to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BULKLEY. When the Rules Committee reported the rule under which we have been operating they made this proposition in order to be considered, notwithstanding the fact that it would not be germane to the bill. Now, the rule provided it should be considered as an amendment to the bill. It has been considered as an amendment and has been rejected. Now, I submit the bill is made up and this is not germane to the bill as read on the third reading.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to say anything. The rule made the amendment germane, and it is still germane under the motion to recommit, according to the universal practice of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, representing, as I do at present, the minority, I wish to protect the rights of the minority. When I get on the other side I may not be so anxious.

Mr. HENRY. It will be a good while before you are on the other side, though.

Mr. MANN. This is an order which made an amendment germane to the bill. The House had the right to adopt the report of the Committee on Rules by making in order an amendment to the bill, although it would not have been otherwise in order as germane. Anything that is in order on the bill is in order on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. This amendment would have been out of order if it had not been for the special rule, but when the special rule made it in order, notwithstanding the rules of the House and practices, as an amendment it is in order as a motion to recommit. So the point of order is overruled, and the question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. The previous question was not made on that order to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the motion?

Mr. HENRY. I am still recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HENRY. I move the previous question.

Mr. BULKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Is the previous question ordered under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Not on the motion to recommit. That is a kind of separate performance. The question is on the previous question on this motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 24.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-one Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 45, answered "present" 2, not voting 221, as follows:

No quorum voting.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow me to make a brief statement without making the point that I am speaking when there is not a quorum present, I desire to say that the President has signed the revenue bill, but the hour of 6 o'clock has passed. The Senate has failed to pass the resolution for final adjournment. It is necessary to secure a quorum to pass a new final adjournment resolution. I have just come from the Senate, and from the situation there I do not think anything can be accomplished by remaining in session longer to-night, and it seems to me there is nothing for the House to do except to adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, October 23, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 23, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we look to Thee for Thy blessing upon our land and country. Thou hast given to us freedom from war; Thou hast blessed us with plenteous harvests; Thou hast led us into the pursuit of arts of peace; Thou hast enabled us to weld together as one great heart the citizens of this land, gathered from every nation, standing in this great brotherhood under our common flag. We bless Thee for all these tokens of Thy love and expressions of Thy leadership. We pray that we may be true to all the high ideals of our national life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the Journal will stand approved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before that announcement is made I desire to suggest that the Journal does not state correctly the proceedings of yesterday, especially with reference to the announcement of the signature of the tax bill by the President pro tempore. According to the Journal as read, after the bill was received it was presented to the President of the Senate and signed, and then it states that the point of no quorum was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The RECORD shows—and it is the actual fact—that immediately upon the announcement by the Clerk of the House of the bill signed by the Speaker the Senator from Georgia made the point of no quorum, and that the Chair made the statement which appears on page 16939 of the RECORD. After the message from the House, the RECORD reads:

> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be attended to when the Chair signs the enrolled bill from the House of Representatives.
> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think that the bill can be signed until the question of a quorum is settled.
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces his signature to an enrolled bill, the title of which the Secretary will state.

Then the Secretary stated it, and the President pro tempore announced that the Senator from Georgia suggested the absence of a quorum. That extract from the RECORD is an actual statement of what occurred. The Journal should show it, and I shall object to the approval of the Journal unless it is corrected in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is aware of something that has occurred and has simply overlooked certain other things that occurred. In the first place, the bill was in the possession of the presiding officer before the Senator from Georgia made any statement that was brought to the attention of the Chair.

It is text law in our proceedings that a Senator must be recognized before he can make a point of no quorum, and the Chair did not recognize the Senator from Georgia for that purpose pending the signing of the bill, and that was deliberately done. Merely upon an intention formed in a Senator's mind to make the point of no quorum does not depend the activity of every officer and every other Senator, particularly when it is made for filibustering purposes. The Chair takes notice of what is going on in the Senate, and administer in a spirit and with a sense of justice the rules of the Senate, so as to promote business and not retard it. The rights of a Senator are not to be ignored, regardless of what his purpose is, but it is a matter of discretion, and the Chair must take notice of what is going on and administer the rules accordingly. The present occupant of the chair did that yesterday.

The Senator from Washington is mistaken if he assumes that the bill was not in the possession of the Chair for the purpose of being signed before the Senator from Georgia made any statement.

The first statement the Senator from Georgia made which came to the ears of the presiding officer was in the nature of an inquiry as to whether or not a quorum of the Senate was required before the bill could be signed, and that is wholly immaterial. The precedents of the Senate establish the fact that it is not necessary that a quorum should be present when a bill is signed. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Washington to what took place in the Senate on the 3d of March, 1839, which has stood as a rule of the Senate ever since. It will be found on page 406 of Gilfry's Precedents, and is as follows:

> (Twenty-fifth Congress, third session.)
> MARCH 3, 1839.
> Joint resolution for distribution in part of the Madison papers being presented for signature of the President of the Senate (W. R. King, of Alabama), it being past midnight on 3d of March, 1839, and no quorum present, the President first ruled he could not sign the resolution when a quorum was not present, and so stated to the Senate. (See Congressional Globe, p. 232.)
> On further consideration and consulting the rules the President pro tempore said he was of opinion that it did not require a quorum to be present to authorize the signing of a bill or joint resolution. It was not properly an act of legislation, but merely a signing to be done by the Chair to authenticate the act. Holding this opinion, the Chair signed the resolution. (See Congressional Globe, p. 233.)

So it is not at all necessary that there should be a quorum present.

Mr. JONES. The only point I was making was that I wanted the Journal to show the actual occurrence. As to what the effect of it may be hereafter I have nothing to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be read in connection with what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and there will be no difficulty in understanding what was done, particularly when taken in connection with what took place between the Senator from Georgia and the presiding officer.

The Chair will submit to the Senate any modification of the rules or any change of the Journal the Senator from Washington may care to suggest.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to interpose my objection to the approval of the Journal as read.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is perfectly clear that when the presiding officer is in the act of performing such a duty as the signing of a bill he need not discontinue that act and stop to recognize a Senator who is about to make a motion or for any other purpose.

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact the Senator from Georgia, immediately upon the announcement by the Clerk of the House, addressed the Chair and suggested the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear that part of it.

Mr. JONES. Of course the Chair did not recognize him. I admit that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear that. The first remark made by the Senator from Georgia which came to the attention of the Chair was in the nature of an inquiry as to whether a quorum was required. The Chair made no reply to that.

Mr. JONES. The RECORD does not show that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is a proposition to amend the Journal, the question is, Shall the Journal be approved?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment. I have entered my objection to the approval of the Journal, and therefore the question of its approval, I take it, will have to be submitted to the Senate for a vote as to whether it shall be approved or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. The question I wished to ask was whether the signature is anything more than a mere ministerial act, and if it is necessary under any rule that the act be even done in open Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware that it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or that any number of the Senate shall be present. I understand it is simply something for the presiding officer to sign, and he can sign it in his own home or in his office, or anywhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has read the rule as it was declared in 1839, and it has been adhered to ever since.

Mr. JONES. The point I am making is that the Journal does not show the actual occurrence. The Journal shows that there was no suggestion of the absence of a quorum until after the President pro tempore had signed the bill and handed it down to the Senate. The RECORD shows that before that was done the point of no quorum was suggested, and the Chair himself said in answer to that suggestion, recognizing, as a matter of fact, that the Senator from Georgia had raised the question, "The matter will be attended to when the Chair signs the enrolled bill from the House of Representatives."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is substantially the occurrence. The Chair had possession of the bill and was in the act of signing it at the time.

Mr. JONES. The RECORD clearly shows it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Senator must concrete his objection in some formal motion, so that the Senate can take jurisdiction of it. What does the Senator suggest?

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the Journal be changed to show that immediately after the message was received from the House the Senator from Georgia raised the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That involves a question of fact about which there is no dispute.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, this seems to be a tempest in a teapot. I suggest that the Chair submit the question to the Senate and dispose of it.

Mr. JONES. I supposed it would be submitted to the Senate. I did not suppose the Journal could be approved if an objection was made except by a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must make some motion. He can not stand here and protest all day.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Page	Smith, Md.
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Perkins	Smith, Mich.
Clarke, Ark.	Lewis	Poindexter	Smith, S. C.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness. I think he was formally excused by the action of the Senate some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senators present direct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order.

After a little delay,

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on October 22, 1914, approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 188. Joint resolution ceding to the State of California temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Presidio of San Francisco and Fort Mason (Cal.) Military Reservations.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KERN (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition will the Senator make of the report of the Sergeant at Arms when it comes in?

Mr. KERN. Has any report been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms was directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. KERN. Let him report to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

LEGISLATION RELATIVE TO COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair). Mr. President, there are very few things that can be done in the absence of a quorum; but one of the things that can be done, I think, is to submit certain remarks on the state of the Union.

The whole proceeding with which we are confronted to-day assumes to me the proportions of a farce. It is nominally for the purpose of compelling some sort of legislation for the relief of the cotton growers of the South. That proposition, so far as this Congress is concerned, became ancient history several days ago. The present sham battle that is going on has in it all the elements of a deliberate deception. There is not any prospect of this Congress doing anything with that question. The matter has been tried out to the satisfaction of those of us who were willing to risk our political futures in an attempt to help those people. We felt that if the Democratic Party could not respond to the demands of that section and those people at this time, there never would be created a condition that could lay upon the conscience and honor of that great party an obligation to them.

As a matter of tactics, a number of us agreed that, so far as we were concerned, we would make manifest to the Senate in a way that was not to be misunderstood the fact that we put relief to those people above everything else and were willing to burn our bridges behind us in our efforts to be of service to them. To be more specific, we deliberately determined to ride down, if the necessity of the case went to that point, the war-tax bill and defeat it absolutely. We put it on the ground that if the calamitous condition in the South was not properly understood and could be brought to the attention of others only by paralleling their condition with ours, we were willing to be instrumental in making that fact known in a way that nobody would misunderstand.

The House of Representatives, I may say, to the extent that I am permitted to comment upon it, tried out to the finality of repeated roll calls an attempt to do something short of what should have been done, but in a way of substantial relief. That was denied. Now, why make a grand-stand play about trying to do something when you know you can not do it? As the Senator from Mississippi said on yesterday, those people know exactly what is going on here, and why it is going on, and they have the capacity to distinguish between the bogus and the genuine.

When we permitted the war-tax bill to pass and could not rally enough of the representatives from the cotton-growing States to defeat it, if necessary, so far as this question was concerned, we abandoned all hope of definite and adequate relief. Having done that, under our system of government we had to go back to the people, or we had to submit to what the majority saw fit to do.

Now, there is not any reason why we should attempt to put a different face on the situation. We have made every effort that we can make. Senators here know what they want to do. We have appealed to them. We presented our case as earnestly as we knew how. Their general intelligence would direct them to a correct understanding of what is going on in that section of the country, because we can not assume that a body so intelligent as this one can be ignorant of what is transpiring here. It was thought, however, that actual conditions were not such as would justify the radical and advanced steps that we invited at their hands.

Now, a word about the radical and advanced steps. In the business world the things we proposed were of every-day occurrence. We say that we have an equipment down there that produces a billion dollars a year of raw material, which is distributed throughout the channels of trade and commerce all over the face of the civilized world, which makes happy 50,000,000 of people, directly and indirectly, which furnishes remunerative, self-respecting employment for them. By reason of a great international condition, so large as to be beyond the control of anybody or any individual or collection of individuals, it became governmental in its character. We appeared here not to ask for charity, because it has not reached that point, and never will. If every bale of cotton in the South were destroyed to-day, no condition of absolute want would exist, except in isolated cases, and they would be so few as to constitute no rule.

We felt that we might come to this great Government in the days of its prosperity and say that the difficulty with us is one of overproduction, relatively, or underconsumption, as the result of conditions that we did not create and can not control. We asked that that surplus which was intended for foreign consumption, or at least part of it, should be taken care of, with credit based on assets that we ourselves furnished. The form of payment was the most specific and self-operating—the force of taxation. If the 5,000,000 bales of cotton that we proposed to pledge as security for that virtual loan should not be adequate security, we made ample provision for paying any deficiency that might result, and that, too, before the Government was called on to pay a single dollar of it. It did not involve the outlay of a single dollar of money, but simply permitted us to use the machinery of this great Government to conserve that great national asset, to the end that the commerce of the world might preserve its equilibrium and that our people might, by using their own assets and their own property, save to themselves some part of the value that they had created. It was not very difficult to understand. It was not a very radical departure from the common sense that is applied in the present day to problems of a similar character but of smaller magnitude.

But it was thought well to adhere to the old conception, and to permit those people to work out their own salvation in a way that, whilst it oppressed them seriously, would leave the precedents somewhat untouched. We thought we were making a precedent that would be useful to this great country when it came to the hour when it had to conserve other elements of its great resources. The chief value of the incident was its value as a precedent. It showed the way out. It eliminated this question of charity and donations and contributions, and put the matter upon the solid basis of self-respect and of complete and ample repayment. We did not ask anybody for anything but what we were entitled to.

The Constitution says this Government is created for the purpose of promoting the general welfare. That is not an idle statement. That is not an impalpable and fanciful sort of description that never comes about in the course of human affairs. It is met with whenever the public interests—"the public" in that respect meaning any large community of people—find themselves without the machinery by which they can conserve their own resources, and, incidentally, bring relief through the agencies of their own credit that this Government may lend to them; not its money, but its machinery, by which they can create a capital that will take care of present necessities.

We provided for a tax to be put upon cotton. We had not the remotest desire to put any tax upon the wheat grown by my good friend from North Dakota, upon the applejack made in the good State of New Jersey, or upon the lead dug in the great State of Missouri, and about which our friend here spoke so feelingly the other day. We sought to lay no tax on anybody for anything, but we had a product amounting to a billion dollars a year in its raw condition at normal prices as security for a liability that never could have amounted to $125,000,000. The property upon which the lien was sought to be fixed exceeded by ten to one any possible liability that could result. That proposition was turned down. An effort was made to go outside of regularity and to say to this administration, "If you seek to interpose the force of your influence against the passage of that measure, then we have a right to assume that you are not sufficiently advised as to the demoralization that obtains in the southern section of this country. If the only way we can bring that to your notice is to refuse to pass the war-tax bill, and permit you to become familiar with that condition through the demoralization in the Treasury Department, we are willing to go to that length." At least I was; at least two others were, and in a nominal way several more.

Now, Mr. President, I think we have gone as far as the people who are interested in this great question expect us to go. The display that is being made at present does not commend itself to me. The die has been cast. We are at our rope's end. The thing to do is to get away from here, and go back home, and let those who did not cooperate with us find out whether or not they correctly represent the sentiment there, and permit those who did show a willingness to take that advanced stand to come in contact with the real sentiment there, and see whether or not they have made a mistake. Nothing is to be gained by this sham battle.

Why not just pass a resolution here, with what Senators are present, to adjourn sine die, or to adjourn until the first Monday in December? The Constitution says that neither House shall adjourn for a greater length of time than three days without the consent of the other. The other House has given its consent for the Senate to adjourn sine die, manifested in the most formal way, and communicated to us in the official way. We no longer need be uncertain about the attitude of the House with reference to adjournment, or its willingness to give its consent. Then a simple motion, adopted by such Senators as are present, to adjourn until the first Monday in December, will satisfy the wants of this occasion, and there are enough Senators here now to do that.

Mr. JAMES. We have already rejected that proposal, though, and laid it on the table.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That only touches one feature of the matter, and not the one to which I address myself. It is the consent of the House that we are talking about. We have no control over that. The resolution says on its face that we can adjourn sine die. That only created another condition where another official might interpose to adjourn the Houses when they disagreed about a proper time to adjourn.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina desires to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very cheerfully.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator for his thought that the resolution which the House sent us was a resolution that the two Houses should adjourn at 6 o'clock yesterday—that they adjourn contemporaneously. Now, the proposition of the Senator is that the Senate shall adjourn while the House is not adjourned but remains in session.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is only seemingly so. The vital thing is that the House gave its consent to the Senate to adjourn sine die. There were other things mixed with it; but we do not need to have any trouble over that, for the reason that the Constitution provides for the adjournment of the two Houses. The vital thing is that the consent of the other House has been given that the Senate shall adjourn, no matter what other things were included in the resolution.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether the Senate can adjourn sine die with less than a majority. It seems that the matter was somewhat agitated in the early history of the country. One presiding officer took one view and another another. The Constitution of the United States says that less than a majority may adjourn from day to day, but it does not say how much space must intervene between the first day and the last. The constitutional limitation is that the adjournment shall not be longer than three days without the consent of the other House.

Besides, as I have said, the circumstances of every case determine what is exactly proper to be done. We are at the end of the session. We have been here nearly two years. All the important legislation is out of the way. All the so-called administration bills are out of the way. All the appropriation bills are passed. In the sense that Congress can ever be through with its business, we are through. There is never an adjournment here when the calendar is not loaded with bills and the committees have not their pigeonholes filled with them. If to get through with legislation we had to dispose of every bill pending, we would never adjourn. My own notion is that the common sense of every situation determines what is entirely proper to be done on that occasion. That is the way intelligent people build up that volume of information that finally constitutes the rules by which they are governed. Everything that is going to happen does not happen at once, and everything that did happen did not happen some time ago. A new situation is constantly bringing about conditions calling for enough intelligence to deal with them.

I do not intend to protract my attendance on this session very much longer. I have come to a point where, not advising others what to do, I am going to take care of myself. My train leaves this evening at 6.15, but I think this vaudeville ought to stop, and I think this Congress ought to get away from here.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana desires to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas. Does he yield?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. THORNTON. I should like, for information, to get the views of the Senator from Arkansas on this kind of a proposition: Assuming, as we have a right to assume, that the House is both willing and anxious to adjourn as quickly as possible, as evidenced by its action of yesterday, why may we not pass a resolution to adjourn at 6 o'clock this evening, say, and submit it to the House and let them adopt it if they are willing? Unless some one raises the question of no quorum, would not that be a practical method, and is there any legal obstacle in the way?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course there will be no trouble about that if both Houses were in session with a majority and ready to proceed secundum artem. I suppose the resolution could originate in the Senate and be sent there, and, being concurred in, that would bring about a final adjournment. But that is not the situation we are dealing with. There is no quorum of the Senate present. I do not know what has happened in the House, and I am not compelled to take notice of what is transpiring there. I deal with the situation from this standpoint, and I would adjourn now until the first Monday of next December.

The suggestion has been made that it might involve an additional loss of mileage, and that the Senate has lost enough mileage on these emergency sessions. That is hardly necessary, because we have an existing appropriation for mileage that accrues on the first Monday in December, and it will take an act of Congress to take it away from us. The reason why we did not get the mileage for the special session was that no appropriation was made for mileage. But that is a selfish feature of it, interjected more by way of humor than as a serious comment upon existing conditions.

Of course I would defer, so far as any practice that may be adopted, to those more directly in charge of affairs on this side of the Chamber in cooperation with those Senators on the other side of the Chamber. Whatever they may see fit to do that will bring about a dissolution of this dead Congress will meet with my cooperation, within lines justified by right and which does not do violence to established and recognized principles based upon what is just and proper.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is well known that I was in thorough sympathy with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] in the effort to attach an amendment to the war-revenue bill which we believed was sound and wise and which would have taken care of the cotton situation. I regret as deeply as he does that the Senate did not agree with us. I joined the Senator from Arkansas in support of the motion to indefinitely postpone the war tax, and I regret that we were not able in that way to hold up the war tax with a view of attaching to it legislation of some kind that would fully meet the situation brought about by the European war, which cut off one-third of the market for the greatest American export product.

But, Mr. President, I regret that he thought that our effort yesterday to defer adjournment until we could hear from action by the House on several measures there pending was a mere vaudeville. It was not so intended by me. Of course, it was perfectly apparent that from half past 5 until 6 I was engaged in a filibuster, but I was perfectly justified. When the Senator, then in the chair, allowed me to present my views objecting to the adoption of the concurrent resolution of adjournment, I believed that there had been almost passed in the House several measures that will be very helpful, not as helpful as they ought to be, not comparable to the measure the Senator and I supported as an amendment to the tax act, but still very helpful in the cotton-growing States.

Let me call attention to these three measures. One of them nobody objects to. One of them the Senate has passed. One of them the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House has unanimously recommended. One of them only awaits a vote to become a law. What is it? It is the provision which allows each of the member banks in a reserve district to deposit their entire reserves with the reserve banks. This will give the regional reserve banks a much larger amount of basis for paper currency. It permits each member bank in a region to put all of its reserves with the regional reserve banks. My estimate is that in my home district the regional bank in that district will have an increased currency-issuing power of more than $15,000,000 as a result of that act.

When I urged that we should not adopt the resolution which would bring about an immediate adjournment it was not intended as a vaudeville. If my style of action created that impression upon my friend from Arkansas, I was unfortunate. I want to see that measure to which I have just referred become a law. I believe it is of the utmost importance that it should become a law at once, and as long as there was a hope that it would become a law by the action of the House I wanted the Senate to stay here and wait. Nobody objects to it, so far as I understand, in the House. It almost passed this morning. A number of us interested ourselves in seeking to prevent the point of no quorum in the House of Representatives that this measure might come before the House and pass.

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia consent to be interrupted by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. The House is 75 short of a quorum, and the minority leader, I understand, has declared that he will require a quorum to pass either one of the bills to which the Senator refers.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Georgia pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Since the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, I feel that it may not be inappropriate and out of order to state that while they have not secured their quorum, a few moments ago they were discussing upon the floor the question of to-morrow seeing if they could not agree upon a plan with reference to pending legislation.

Mr. JAMES. I do not know about that. I am merely quoting what a Member of the House told me 10 minutes ago; but the statement, of course, does not contradict anything the Senator from Minnesota has said.

Mr. CLAPP. No; not at all. I did not mean to contradict the statement of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The hope for action this morning by the House was by unanimous consent, the point not being made of no quorum.

Now I come to the second measure. We passed a bill amending the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, so that banks, members of the national currency associations, might use their bills receivable up to 75 per cent of their capital and surplus instead of 30 per cent, as the original act provides, upon which to issue notes for circulation. This amendment was intended to broaden the opportunity of the banks in the smaller cities to obtain emergency currency. They had not the securities possessed by the banks in the great cities, like New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, upon which emergency currency was issued, but they had good commercial paper; and the bill was drawn with the approval of the Treasury Department and upon the recommendation, I understand, of the Reserve Board. We amended that bill here and sent it to the House with a second section that permitted the State banks also to have the privilege of joining the national currency associations and taking advantage of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. If we can not get anything out of that except the provision allowing the members of the national currency associations to use their bills receivable up to 75 per cent, I want it.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The existing law is that they can take out currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act on commercial paper for only 30 per cent. We amended it here so as to allow them to take it out to the extent of 75 per cent, and the House committee amended it and made it 100 per cent.

There was another amendment in the bill, which related to the deposit of reserves, leaving it optional with the member banks to deposit of their reserves in the regional banks. Then there was another amendment, that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] had tacked on the bill in the Senate, about allowing State banks to join the currency associations and take out currency. I understand, and I get my understanding from a printed copy of the bill, that the committee of the House have eliminated that provision. I think I am correct about that. They have amended the bill by striking out the section relating to State banks and they have amended it by increasing the 75 per cent limit to 100 per cent.

So if the bill comes over here from the House as the committee has reported it, it will simply amount to two things: First, giving them a right to issue currency to the extent of 100 per cent on commercial paper; second, allowing them to deposit in the regional banks all the reserves that they are now under the new currency law permitted to retain in their vaults. The bill we passed here provided that that could only be done with the consent of the Reserve Board. The House have amended it in that respect so that it is optional with the several member banks to deposit all their reserves in the regional bank. That is the condition. If the bill came over here now as the committee has reported it there, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia would be eliminated in reference to State banks, but the other changes that I have indicated would be in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan Does the Senator from Minnesota mean that this commercial paper must be taken at its face value?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; not at its face value.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. At par?

Mr. NELSON. No; not at par; but they can issue currency to the extent of 100 per cent, or 75 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But, of course, there is a limitation under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act that applies to all kinds of paper taken out, or bonds, for instance, 90 per cent, and on commercial paper, I think, 75 per cent or 80 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Thirty per cent was the limit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Thirty per cent was the limit under the Aldrich-Vreeland law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to say that I join with the Senator from Georgia in his statement that the two amendments which he has described are of very, very great importance not only to the South but to the country at large. My understanding is that possibly by unanimous consent those two little amendments could have been passed this morning except for a motion to recommit one of them with instructions to add an amendment providing for the issue of bonds to be loaned to the banks in the cotton States. My understanding is that that brought on a demand for a quorum, and that the House can not develop a quorum to-day. But I am also advised that there is a strong probability that on to-morrow an agreement may be reached there by which no amendment will be offered to the amendments the Senator has just mentioned.

I am also advised that on to-morrow it is highly probable that an arrangement may be made by which a vote may be taken, without the call of a quorum, upon these two amendments to accomplish simply the purpose the Senator from Georgia has stated. The House, I understand, will be forced to adjourn to-day because they can not get a quorum. On to-morrow it is possible they may get through these two little amendments, and it is of such importance we ought to cooperate with the House to that end.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] have each presented lines of thought exactly in accord with what I was presenting.

Referring, first, to the statement by the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to say that I had undertaken to call attention to the fact that one of these bills passed by the Senate amended our banking and currency law so that the member banks might deposit all of their reserves in the Federal reserve banks of their respective districts, and that would be a most valuable addition to the power of the regional reserve banks of the districts to handle the responsibilities falling upon each.

The other measure, to which I called attention and to which the Senator from Minnesota again called attention, was the bill providing that each bank, a member of a national currency association, might use its bills receivable for the purpose of security for emergency currency beyond 30 per cent, which is now the limitation in the existing law. I believe both Houses are ready to pass those measures.

When on yesterday morning I expressed my opposition to adjournment at 6 o'clock, or expressed my opposition to the Senate at that time agreeing to adjournment at 6 o'clock, I hoped that these bills might come over to us from the other House in time, perhaps, even for an amendment to one of those bills that would suspend the tax on notes by State banks for eight months. At any rate, so long as there is a chance to bring to us from the other House the substantial parts on which we agreed as to those two measures, I think we should stay here and obtain that much legislation, if we can not obtain more.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to state to the Senator that the time when the Federal reserve act is to take effect, or the banks are to be opened, I think, has been agreed upon as being the 20th day of November. I will state that at a conference of the directors of the Federal Reserve Board some of them expressed the opinion that they could not open the Federal reserve banks until the 1st day of January, particularly the bank in New York. This tentative fixing of the date of opening as the 20th day of November is supposed to hurry matters, but in the event they can not open by that time they probably will be given more time.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that these bills, although they are important, are not so urgent in view of the fact that the banks are not to open, to be ready for business, until the 20th day of November. Consequently, as to whether a bank has a right to deposit all of its reserves in the Federal reserve bank will be of no importance until that time, which is very nearly the time when Congress will reconvene.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator's view is correct that these banks are not to open until January, if that is the suggestion, then I think still more is Congress to blame for not having done something more while it was here. We had been first led to believe that this system would open on the 1st of November and subsequently on the 16th of November. Now, if there is another substantial postponement, the matter is more serious than I imagined it was. At the last conference we had with the members of the Federal Reserve Board we had a promise that on the 16th of November the banks would open.

I understand that if this bill, which allows all of the member banks to place their entire reserves in the Federal reserve bank in their district, is passed, it will substantially assist in opening the reserve banks at once.

Mr. President, I only wanted to say that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is mistaken when he supposes we are not really seeking the passage of these measures. I hope that to-morrow, when the point of no quorum may not be made, that the other House may pass them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia consent to be interrupted by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I did not mean to intimate that the Senator from Georgia would not be very glad to pass these measures. I know he would be, as I know I would be. They are in a way helpful to the general situation, but not specifically so to the cotton situation. I would not have the impression go out from anything that I have stated that I did not think those bills would be of some help if they were passed. Compared, however, with the nature of the calamity, and compared with the wider and more helpful character of relief extended by the other bills, I do not think they are to be considered at all in themselves; but as a part of the general system, I think they are an important addition to the existing law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that the amendment to the war-tax bill, which we supported, would have been far more useful than these bills, but as they are measures which will be helpful in a degree and do some good, I felt that we ought not to adjourn on yesterday until we tried to put them through.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia consent to being interrupted by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am informed that the situation in the other House is substantially this: The majority leader has just stated that he will make no attempt to require the attendance of absent Members of the House to-morrow, that one of the proponents of these measures, the Representative from Texas [Mr. HENRY], has announced that they shall not pass without a quorum. Putting these two statements together, it is, to my mind, very evident that nothing will be done to-morrow, either as to securing a quorum or as to any action, affirmative or otherwise, upon these bills.

To my mind, the situation is simply this: The House sent over here a concurrent resolution yesterday fixing the hour of adjournment at 6 o'clock for that day, which the Senate laid upon the table. As a consequence, the Houses can not agree, and as it is improbable that either House will secure a quorum I do not see how it is possible for them to agree. They can not act. They have no power. Without a quorum, they do not exist as a body.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I was simply going to suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado consent to being interrupted by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. I was going to suggest that the President under these circumstances has the power to adjourn Congress to such time as he may see fit, and I hope he will do so. He has never yet hesitated to do his duty, and I think that is his duty at present. Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Could we not do this: The Senate, as I understand, is in such a situation now that nothing is in order except a motion to adjourn——

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose that is true.

Mr. JAMES. If we adjourn until to-morrow, then the point of no quorum might not be raised, and we could take the House resolution from the table by unanimous consent and adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senate has been submitting to a policy of manana so long that I see no reason why we could not continue it for a short time longer.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator withhold that motion for just a moment?

Mr. KERN. I withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. JONES. I simply desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, I shall not make any point of no quorum on to-morrow, even though the Journal may be approved in the shape in which it now is. I do not like the shape in which the Journal is; I think it ought to recite the actual facts as they occurred, but I myself shall not make the point to-morrow.

I was very much in hope that some relief might be furnished to the people of the South. I was very much in hope that, if the matter should go over until to-morrow, some agreement could be reached. I simply wish to add that this situation demonstrates absolutely the incapacity of our Democratic friends to run the Government. They do not seem to be able even to adjourn when they all want to adjourn.

Mr. KERN. I renew my motion.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana consent to be interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KERN. I yield for a moment, but all debate is out of order.

Mr. NELSON. I presume it is, Mr. President, but, with the leave of the Senate, I simply desire to make a brief statement.

I do not claim to be a spokesman for the cotton people of the South, but there was one measure passed by the Senate which we loaded down, in my opinion, with improper and uncalled-for amendments. I refer to the warehouse bill. I think the South is entitled to that legislation to provide for the establishment of Government bonded and insured warehouses for the storing of cotton. In the wheat country of the Northwest we are supplied with such bonded and insured warehouses, and the warehouse receipts are considered the very best kind of paper on which to borrow money. My own opinion is that it would afford great relief to the people of the South in the present emergency to have such a warehouse law passed, so as to give stability and security to their warehouse receipts and render it less difficult to borrow money on them. I should be very glad to see such a measure pass at this session of Congress; but I was sorry to see the Senate load that bill down with a lot of extraneous matters which I do not think were necessary.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KERN. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Texas, but I can not yield to anybody else. Debate is out of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I was one of the Senators who voted against adjournment yesterday afternoon and one of those who was in entire sympathy with the Senator from Georgia. I merely want to say that the lecture which has been delivered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] will have no effect on me and will not alter my course in the slightest. It makes no difference to me that my course of action does not commend itself to him. He made the statement that the policy being pursued by a few of us here did not meet with his approval.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Texas has done many things that did not meet with the approval of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that, and it will not deter me from doing them, either now or in the future.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure the Senator's conduct would be vastly improved if it did.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I doubt that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not yield; I submit, Mr. President.

I want to denounce the insinuation by him or by anybody else that we are engaged in any grand-stand play or sham battle or in any insincere movement, as unjust and as unworthy of a Senator of the United States, a colleague of other Senators here.

I want to say further that, so far as I am concerned, I will never vote to adjourn this session of Congress as long as any hope of relief for the cotton growers of the South remains. That is all I have to say.

Mr. KERN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves—the debate hitherto has been going on by unanimous consent——

Mr. JAMES. And has been clearly out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 23, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and everliving God, source of our fondest hopes, inspire us by Thy holy presence to be patient in the perplexities of life, pure in the midst of temptations, that our "virtue may be the courage of faith, our cheerfulness the patience of hope, and our life the example of charity," that we may be worthy of Thy love and confidence. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to withhold it for a moment.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is Senate bill 6398, to amend section 1 of an act approved May 30, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the national banking laws," which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. That motion is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt about that. It does not do any harm to put the motion again. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen desire to be recognized for some matters before taking the vote on the motion to recommit, and I will yield at this time, but before doing so I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY. Will that interfere with the present status of the special order if we agree to these things by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

LABOR FOR FOLDING SPEECHES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LLOYD. Very well. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 651 (H. Rept. 1201).

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper is authorized to employ additional labor for folding speeches, at the rate of not exceeding $1 per thousand, and the sum of $600 is authorized to be expended from the contingent fund for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INDIA M. RICH.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 653 (H. Rept. 1202).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to India M. Rich, widow of William H. Rich, late a messenger on the soldiers' roll of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' salary of said William H. Rich, and funeral expenses not exceeding $250, the same to be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE MESSENGERS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 640 (H. Rept. 1203).

Resolved, That nine messengers in the post office of the House now authorized to be employed during the session may continue to be employed during the period between the adjournment of the present session and the 1st of December, 1914, and be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

With the following amendment:

In line 3, after the word "session," add the following: "And the three session telephone operators authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1914, and continued during the present session by House joint resolution 286, approved July 1, 1914."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for a moment, as I caught the reading of the resolution it provided that they should be continued until the 1st of December. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that Congress meets on the 7th of December.

Mr. LLOYD. That is true. That should be the first Monday in December, and I ask unanimous consent that that change be made.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will change that to read the first Monday in December.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

COTTON AND TOBACCO.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold that for just a moment?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take up for present consideration the bill——

Mr. GLASS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the regular order. The regular order is the vote on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 66, nays 90, answered "present" 3, not voting 269, as follows:

No quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. This roll call shows 159 Members present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is evident we can not get a quorum to-day, and because of the number of Members who are absent I rose for the purpose of moving an adjournment.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman wish to ask me something?

Mr. HENSLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether or not he hopes to be able to secure a quorum here between now and the general election?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think it is apparent that we can not get a quorum here before the general election.

Mr. HENSLEY. I would further ask the gentleman whether or not he is going to send out and insist upon Members who are back in their districts coming here, so as to constitute a quorum between now and the election?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course that is a proposition for the House to determine for itself. So far as I am personally concerned, or so far as I can speak as floor leader of the House, I would not send to bring gentlemen from their districts within these few days of the election. [Applause.] After the election that matter can be disposed of.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama why the resolution compelling attendance upon the sessions of the House under penalty of $20.54 per day fine was rescinded after some of us had been fined under that resolution for going to our homes, as the President of the United States did, to vote at the general election? Why should it have been rescinded and Members of the House now be permitted to go back to their homes while we have vital legislation pending here?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion there?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I have been here for 22 months consecutively, with the exception of two weeks granted me on account of sickness, and was fined for going home to vote at the general election. It seems to me somebody else ought to be fined and made to come back here. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that they were mostly men from the South who were fined under those circumstances.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; I do not think so.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit this proposition to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and to the House: I believe that there are three bills pending here—two from the Committee on Banking and Currency and one from the Committee on Agriculture. One of the bills from the Currency Committee deals with the reserve act; the other, as I understand it, deals with the Vreeland-Aldrich Act. The bill from the Agricultural Committee is well known. I believe it is possible, if an agreement could be entered into here this morning that the House should pass the bill which deals with the Vreeland-Aldrich Act and substitute the warehouse bill in the position occupied in the rule by the bill dealing with the reserve act, and then make that bill the unfinished business when we come back here in December, an adjournment might be effected thereby.

Mr. HENRY. Let me understand the gentleman, now. Your proposition is to substitute the warehouse bill for the Senate bill 6505?

Mr. LEVER. No; the other one.

Mr. HENRY. Of course I could not agree to the other proposition, because that is the one this rider is proposed as an amendment to—Senate bill 6392. I have no objection in the world to your substituting your warehouse bill for Senate bill 6505, for I am very much opposed to that bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, that is an astonishing statement to me, because the gentleman from Texas assured me that if I would give him a vote on his propositions he would help me pass both of these bills.

Mr. HENRY. If they are amended.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to say further to my colleague from South Carolina that the usefulness of his warehouse bill would be very much impaired by the failure to pass Senate bill 6505. There is no use for warehouse certificates if there is no credit at the banks under which they can be utilized.

Mr. LEVER. I appreciate the bill would be affected by the failure of this bill to pass.

Mr. HENRY. Just a moment there. I want to reply to the gentleman from Virginia. I want to see his bills pass if they are properly amended, but, of course, in their present crude form I could not agree to them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman made no such qualification as that. He said explicitly to me, time and time again, if we would give him a vote on his propositions he would help me to pass the bills.

Mr. HENRY. I did not say that; that is all there is to it.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure the gentleman did say it.

Mr. HENRY. You misunderstood me; that is all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent we can not make an agreement to-day, because there is not a quorum here. I hope the gentlemen will be able to come to an agreement by to-morrow, and I would cheerfully cooperate with all of them in doing so.

Mr. HENRY. I am ready for cooperation in order to get these bills through.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we can not take a recess, and I am satisfied we can not get a quorum right now, but at the suggestion of the gentlemen who desire to get together we might have an understanding between each other that the Speaker can leave some one in the chair for an hour, if it is agreeable to the Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think to-day is the day to do that.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will stay in the chair himself. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas insists on a quorum to-day?

Mr. HENRY. Yes; I think so.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 43.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-two gentlemen have risen.

Mr. CRISP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. How many gentlemen rose?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two. Those opposed will rise. [After counting.] Sixty-six have risen in the negative. Thirty-two is a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. The Clerk will call the roll, and those in favor of adjourning will answer "aye" and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 91, answered "present" 1, not voting 278, as follows:

Mr. ANSBERRY with Mr. FESS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska with Mr. SLOAN.

For the session:

Mr. SCULLY with Mr. BROWNING.
Mr. HAMMOND with Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.
Mr. BARTLETT with Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. TREADWAY.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House declines to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, have any gentlemen come in who are not yet recorded on the roll call that was in progress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. Is there any gentleman who has not been recorded? If so, let him come forward and be recorded.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] moves that the House adjourn. Those in favor of the motion and desire to second it will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighteen gentlemen have risen to second the motion to adjourn, and the Chair will count how many more there are here.

Mr. GLASS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. GLASS. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to inquire, Mr. Speaker, what will be the status of the pending legislation when Congress shall reconvene in December in the event that we should reach a unanimous conclusion to adjourn this session?

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. A motion to adjourn is before the House, and the Chair started to count.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair will answer it. The legislative status would be this: After the Chaplain prays and the roll is called and a quorum is ascertained and the usual little motions are made about informing the President, and so forth and so on, the Chair thinks that this bill that we are operating on now would be the regular order.

Mr. MANN. A demand for the regular order would put us under the operation of the rule that we are operating under now.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the previous question having been already ordered, it would then be considered as having been ordered?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The first thing that would be done would be to vote on the motion to recommit, and then on the bill itself, and then immediately we would vote on that other bill, whatever the number of it is.

Mr. MANN. We would be operating under the rule, as we are now.

The SPEAKER. We would be operating under this rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has stated privately that the Senate has adjourned.

Mr. MANN. Yes. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has just returned from the Senate, and he makes that statement.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair put the motion to adjourn after it has been seconded.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a good many Members have come in since the Chair made the first request. I suggest that he count those.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair was counting those who seconded the motion.

The SPEAKER. Yes. It is a very peculiar rule. The Chair forgets it sometimes. The Chair forgot it twice this week, and everybody else seems to forget it. The rule provides under circumstances like this that whenever a gentleman moves to adjourn, the Chair shall count the House and then count those who second the motion to adjourn, and if the majority votes to second the motion to adjourn, then the Chair puts the motion to adjourn. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-eight gentlemen are present. Those in favor of seconding the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] to adjourn will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-two gentlemen second the motion. Fifty-eight are present, and 52 rise to second the motion. The motion is seconded, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to adjourn. Those in favor of the motion will vote "aye," those opposed will vote "no."

The question was taken, and the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, October 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, October 24, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our lives are in Thy hands. We pray that we may be given that grace which will seek to know and to do Thy will, knowing that all the welfare of life is contained within the scope of Thy purpose. Conformity to Thy will insures the beauty and strength and glory of life. Save us from that pride of spirit which would subvert God's holy will in us; save us from the surrender of the higher to the lower nature that would turn aside the great purpose of God; save us from that prodigality in the use of the blessings which Thou hast brought to us that would enervate and degrade the life of the people, but in conformity to God's will may we do our work as a nation and receive God's continual blessing. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., October 24, 1914.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SWANSON thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with, and the Journal will stand approved. The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Does that carry with it the approval of Thursday's Journal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. It is the Journal of the preceding day—Friday's Journal.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of Thursday be approved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to present a report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. There is one question now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has been recognized. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I merely want to submit a report.

Mr. BRYAN. No, Mr. President; I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida refuses to yield, and he has asked unanimous consent that the Journal of Thursday's proceedings be approved.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from Florida permit me to present a petition?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I do not yield at all. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Journal of Thursday's proceedings be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on October 23, 1914, approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 200. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of October salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session.

REPORT OF PNEUMATIC-TUBE POSTAL COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 615).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to present a report from the Joint Commission on Pneumatic Tubes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the report will be received.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call attention to the fact that while it is a joint commission it is understood that the report shall be printed as a Senate document. Therefore I ask that as many copies as can be furnished within the $500 limitation be printed for the use of the commission, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the report will be received, referred as requested, and printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

INTERSTATE IRRIGATION COMMISSION.

Mr. MYERS. The Interstate Irrigation Commission is a permanent commission, the members of which were appointed by the governors of the Western States which are interested in irrigation. Its object is to consider problems of irrigation and methods of legislation in aid of reclamation projects.

The commission recently held a meeting at Helena, Mont., and adopted resolutions which are in the nature of a petition to Congress, in which they suggest certain methods of reform in legislation for reclamation projects. I present the resolutions adopted at the last meeting of the Interstate Irrigation Commission held at Helena, Mont., and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Interstate Irrigation Commission at its recent meeting in Helena, Mont.

Be it resolved, That we indorse the broad and comprehensive policies of Secretary Lane in his effort to develop the national resources of the West, and also the prompt and efficient manner in which the business of the Interior Department is being dispatched.

Be it further resolved, That we commend the Reclamation Service for its excellent and efficient work in the construction of the reclamation projects; and recognizing in it the possibility of further reclamation, we recommend that it be made the agency through which future irrigation works be constructed.

Be it further resolved, That we indorse the creation of a revolving fund of $100,000,000 in order that the Reclamation Service may complete the projects now unfinished and other meritorious ones, and that said funds draw interest at the rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum.

Be it further resolved, That the Federal Government and the arid-land States of the West cooperate in the reclamation, and with that end in view we recommend:

1. A uniform district irrigation law in the various States to facilitate Federal loans, and to this end that this matter be referred to the committee on legislation and report at the next meeting of this commission, to be held at Washington, D. C., about December 1 next. That this special committee confer with the proper Federal officers in the preparation of a law to be submitted to the various State legislatures.

2. That all State and Government lands included within the boundaries of districts organized under such uniform law shall be subject to the same rules, regulations, and charges as lands in private ownership.

Be it resolved, That storage reservoirs should be constructed and perpetually owned by the Government, which shall make such charges against the stored water as are equitable, but the construction cost of such works shall be classed and considered as a national work.

Be it resolved, That we believe the speedy improvement of lands under all irrigation projects to be a matter of vital importance, and that under present conditions a rigid improvement and continuous cultivation condition should be substituted for the residence requirement in the United States reclamation law.

Be it resolved, That we urge the enactment of uniform and suitable laws in each State by which the proper State officials shall receive annual detailed statements, comparable to those prepared by the Reclamation Service, showing the investment, annual cost, duty of water, crop production, and related details for each irrigation district, Carey Act project, and other public-service corporations supplying water for irrigation.

Be it resolved, That Federal legislation be provided enabling cooperation between the Government and districts organized under State law for the distribution of water for irrigation on the public lands (including lands segregated under the Carey Act) in the investigation, construction, and financial promotion of reclamation projects, pursuant to which the Government, through its proper agencies, shall investigate and construct with moneys from the "reclamation fund" such feasible projects as shall be initiated by the various districts, pursuant to which, also, such districts will bond the completed projects in order to release the investment of the Government, the Government to advance patent to all lands held in good faith under the public-land laws whenever such bonds shall be disposed of in order that the title to such lands may be subjected to the lien of the bonds.

That in order to provide a "revolving fund" for use by the Government in promoting such cooperation the reclamation projects now in operation may be bonded by districts organized to purchase them and the Government reimbursed for its present investment with the proceeds from the sale of the same; and in that connection it is recommended that such projects be sold at a discount in order that the reduced price at which they may be purchased by the landowners will offset the interest which the bonds will call for and from which the contracts for the purchase of water under the existing law are exempt, or as an alternative plan for providing a revolving fund that provision be made by which the completed or nearly finished successful projects, built under the terms of the reclamation act, may be turned in at the earliest practicable date to irrigation district organizations, receiving in exchange 20-year bonds of the district, which shall be interest exempt, principal to be paid in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation extension act, these bonds to be disposed of or used as the basis of securing additional funds to build other meritorious projects.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pike County, Ill., and Malden, Mass., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Palacios, Tex., remonstrating against an increase of the tax on intoxicating liquors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

JAMES ANDERSON.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5053) to correct the military record of James Anderson, reported it with amendment and submitted a report (No. 830) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 6679) for the erection of a Federal building at Aurora, Mo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 6680) to fix the compensation of assistant appraisers of merchandise, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 6681) granting an increase of pension to Frank F. Judson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 6682) granting an increase of pension to Susie E. Harris (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6683) granting a pension to Edwin Ash; to the Committee on Pensions.

FLOOD WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In connection with the question of the control and disposition of the flood waters of the Rio Grande I have here a copy of a joint resolution that I introduced on August 19 on the subject and also a letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Mission, Tex., which I wish to have inserted in the RECORD.

I intend to bring this subject before Congress at the next session. Conditions are such that the Government should give it special attention. The people of the Rio Grande Valley are interested and aroused. The maintenance of a fixed boundary line between the United States and Mexico and the conservation and distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande, whose channel composes that boundary line for so many hundreds of miles, are questions fundamentally interrelated.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 183) for control and distribution of the flood waters of the Rio Grande.

Whereas the annual floods on the Rio Grande, a large section of which constitutes the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, have been and are such as to change the channel thereof, producing serious avulsions and oftentimes and in many places leaving large tracts of land belonging to people of the United States on the Mexican side of the river and Mexican lands on the American side, thus producing a confusion of boundary, disturbance of public and private titles to lands, as well as provoking conflict of jurisdiction between the two Governments, affording facilities for smuggling, promoting evasion and preventing the collection of revenues by the respective countries; and

Whereas these conditions are a standing menace to the harmony and prosperity of the citizens of the said countries and the amicable and orderly administration of their respective Governments: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the commission for the study of the questions connected with the equitable distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande between the citizens of the United States and Mexico is hereby directed to make an investigation, under the supervision of the Secretary of State, as to the best and most feasible method of preserving the boundary line between the United States and Mexico by preventing the flood waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries where the said Rio Grande constitutes said boundary line from disturbing and changing the channel, and also the best and most feasible mode of impounding, regulating, and utilizing said waters in such manner as to secure to each country and its inhabitants their legal and equitable rights and interests in said waters.

The investigation herein authorized is to include the section of the Rio Grande between the mouth of said river and Fort Quitman, a point about 80 miles from the upper end of the United States-Mexico boundary line, the flood waters above Fort Quitman being subject to control by the Engle Dam.

The said commission is also directed, under the supervision of the Secretary of State, to enter into such negotiations with a similar commission representing the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, or with the Mexican Government itself, as may be necessary to enable it to make a satisfactory report.

In order to carry out the purpose of this resolution, and for the employment of such engineers and other assistants as the Secretary of State and said commission may deem advisable, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The commission herein mentioned shall make report to Congress of its findings in the matters herein specified, with an estimate of cost.

MISSION CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Mission, Tex., September 13, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On September 9 we perfected in this city a valley organization to promote Federal gravity irrigation of the valley through a treaty with Mexico, providing dams and reservoirs for the storing of flood and storm waters for such a purpose and to foster your resolution carrying an appropriation of $50,000 for a survey of the Rio Grande from its mouth to Fort Quitman to ascertain the best means of utilizing the storm and flood waters so as to conserve the boundary line.

The organization embraces the entire valley from Roma to Brownsville, including the Lyford and Raymondville sections, there being a member on the board of directors from each of the towns of such territory, which means that we will have a strong organization.

We want you to realize that we not only appreciate your efforts in our behalf but that we are going to give you the entire support of the valley.

Having been elected secretary of the Gravity Irrigation Association of the Lower Rio Grande Valley, the new organization, I fully realize that the great bulk of the work falls on me, and I expect to do justice to the cause in every particular, hence I am making my arrangements to get out and thoroughly organize the valley at once. In my work of organization I have in mind the circulation of a petition addressed to you, setting forth the necessity of Federal aid in the irrigation of the valley, the total acreage irrigated and the status of such irrigation, the acreage that could be irrigated by gravity, the value of the production of such acreage, the value of such lands to-day as against its value under irrigation, the utter impossibility of reclaiming such lands by irrigation by private ownership or corporations, the necessity of impounding the flood and storm waters of the Rio Grande so as to prevent the everchanging course of the Rio Grande, the boundary line of the two Republics, which has caused considerable strife and dissension at various times through such changes, together with many other facts that should aid you in the passage of your resolution; and, further, if you think advisable, send a strong delegation to Washington to render you any further assistance possible.

Realizing the importance of the cause to the valley and the big work that I have undertaken, I would feel very grateful for any suggestions that you have to offer along the line I should follow.

With my very best wishes, I have the honor to remain,

Yours, very truly,

S. A. PIPES.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD—ROBERT CRAIN.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of correcting a statement in the RECORD. In the discussion on the tax bill last Thursday I made the statement that Robert Crain, of Baltimore, I had been informed, was employed by the Whisky Trust and drew a large salary from it. I understand Mr. Crain has taken some offense at that statement, and from information which I have received indirectly from him I understand it is not true; that he was not connected with the Whisky Trust in any way; that he was not an attorney for the Whisky Trust, but that he is an attorney for the United States Brewers' Association.

I cheerfully make this correction, so that the facts may be stated in the RECORD.

THE JUDICIAL RECALL.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a copy of an address by Rome G. Brown, of Minneapolis, Minn., chairman of the American Bar Association committee opposed to judicial recall, delivered before the State Bar Association of Missouri at St. Louis, Mo., September 23, 1914. I ask that the address may be printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A few days ago I presented to the Senate a copy of speeches of former United States Senator Henry W. Blair on nation-wide prohibition and Federal aid for education, with a copy of an appeal of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson to the American people; also an explanatory letter from ex-Senator Blair on circumstances giving birth to the documents; and they were referred to the Committee on Printing for action. As it has been impossible in the closing days of the session to secure a meeting of the Committee on Printing I ask that the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the matter referred to, and that it be ordered printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

Mr. KERN. I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 24th day of October at 4 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the concurrent resolution at all, but there have been circulated throughout the Southern States, where the great distress in this country prevails, statements made on the floor here by certain Senators interested to the effect that Congress ought not to adjourn until some relief has been given.

I was heartily in accord with that view. Now, on the eve of what seems to be a recess or adjournment, I want to know if it is still the intention of those who made the statement to hold up and resist any attempt to adjourn or whether it is the opinion of those Senators that we should take a recess. It would largely contribute to clarify the atmosphere. I do not like to be put in the position of being criticized by my people for not supporting so worthy a sentiment. I did heartily indorse it by word and deed. Now I want to know from those who uttered these sentiments on this floor if they are still standing by their expressed determination.

I am perfectly willing, if there is any opportunity or any chance for any relief to come, immediately or mediately, to continue in session. I do not know what would be the effect of holding the two Houses of Congress in session from day to day, but I want to state here and now that I am perfectly willing to continue if there is any opportunity at all or any chance to bring relief to the South.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am one of those who stated on the floor of the Senate that I did not think Congress should adjourn until some relief could be granted to the cotton growers and that I would not vote for adjournment as long as there was any possible hope of relief.

I am clearly of the opinion that the events of yesterday demonstrated that there is no hope for any kind of relief from Congress at the present session. I want to say here that I can not agree with certain Senators who have claimed that the defeat of the war-revenue bill would have put us in better position in regard to cotton legislation. On the contrary, I think the defeat of that bill by the votes of those of us who were interested in cotton legislation would have been a tactical error, a violation of party faith, and would have fatally impaired our influence for all the future, both as to cotton and all other matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not know that the resolution had been introduced. I would be glad to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary again read the concurrent resolution.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before that motion is put——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has been recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. If it is desired to take a recess, I will withdraw the concurrent resolution temporarily.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think a motion to take a recess pending the resolution would be in order, but that question it is not necessary to have decided, as I understand the Senator from Indiana is willing to withdraw his resolution and allow the motion to take a recess until 2 o'clock to be presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana withdraw the concurrent resolution?

Mr. KERN. I temporarily withdraw the concurrent resolution in order that there may be a vote on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he would not make it 3 o'clock instead of 2?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; 2 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. I will say frankly to the Senator that the reason I ask that the recess be taken until 3 o'clock is because the flag exercises will take place at the Union Station at 2 o'clock, and I should like to attend them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would 2.30 o'clock give the Senator time enough?

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to change my motion to 2.30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate take a recess until 2.30 p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled.

RELIEF OF COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask permission to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Georgia will be granted that privilege. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will not ask that the Senate be detained to hear the bill read, but I do desire that it shall go into the RECORD. It varies but little from the amendment that was offered to the war-tax bill. The important change is that, instead of simply specifying 10 cents a pound as the price at which the Government was to exchange the bonds for 5,000,000 bales of cotton, it provides that the exchange is to be made at the market price, not to exceed 10 cents a pound. In presenting it, I wish to say that, in my opinion, the withdrawal of 5,000,000 bales from the market would put the price on all the balance of the cotton at above 10 cents a pound.

The bill (S. 6684) to provide for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 6684) to provide for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That during the year 1915 a special excise tax is hereby levied, and shall be paid and collected not later than December of said year, upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound upon all lint cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1914: Provided, That where any such person, firm, or corporation was not engage din the business of planting, growing, or producing cotton in the year 1914, such person, firm, or corporation shall pay a tax of 2 cents a pound on all lint cotton produced by such person, firm, or corporation in excess of 50 per cent of the total amount of lint cotton produced in the year 1914 on the farm or plantation operated by such person, firm, or corporation in the year 1915.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for the collection of the tax herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have immediately prepared bonds of the United States to the amount in face value of $250,000,000. The said bonds shall be in denominations ranging from $10 to $500, and shall be made due on or before three years from date, and bear interest at 4 per cent per annum, and shall be payable in gold.

SEC. 3. That the said bonds shall be used at their face value for the purchase of 5,000,000 bales of lint cotton, payments to be made in said bonds to the sellers of such cotton, and the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Agriculture are hereby constituted a board with authority to conduct such purchases and to carry out the provisions of this act in connection with the purchase, handling, and sale of said cotton.

The said purchases shall be made exclusively from the producers of such cotton at the price not to exceed 10 cents per pound for middling lint cotton and shall be made as rapidly as possible. Other grades of cotton may be bought at prices higher or lower than 10 cents, based on the difference of their values, as the same are more or less valuable than middling cotton. The purchases shall be made in the States where the cotton is grown, and shall be prorated between the States, as far as practicable, according to the quantity of cotton grown in each State. The cotton so purchased shall be handled under the direction of the board hereinbefore provided for, and none of the same shall be disposed of earlier than January 1, 1916. During the year beginning January 1, 1916, said cotton may be sold in blocks of 100 bales or more at the market price. On and after January 1, 1917, so much of said cotton as has not already been disposed of shall, within six months thereafter, be sold by said board. The money received from the sale of said cotton shall be kept separately in the Treasury and shall be used to pay off the bonds provided for in section 2 of this act, and whenever $5,000,000 has been accumulated from the sale of said cotton, blocks of said issue of bonds shall be called in and redeemed, and said board is given full power and authority to make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the purpose of executing the provisions of this and the preceding sections.

SEC. 4. That after the cotton the purchase and sale of which is provided for in sections 2 and 3 of this act has been disposed of it shall be the duty of the said board to prepare a statement covering the entire expenditure by the Government in connection with said transactions, including the redemption of said bonds, and if any part of said expenses has not been met it shall be the duty of said board to officially report the amount remaining unpaid, and said report shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. For the year 1917, and annually thereafter, a special tax is hereby levied and shall be paid and collected during the months of August, September, October, November, and December upon every person, firm, or corporation engaging in the business of planting, growin, or producing cotton, said tax to be measured as follows:

Every such person, firm, or corporation shall pay on all cotton produced or grown by such person, firm, or corporation during each of said years an amount equal to 1 cent per pound on such cotton, and the same shall be payable before said cotton leaves the ginhouse: Provided, however, That if the report of said board filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that no amount remains unpaid, the excise tax provided for in this section shall not be collected: And provided further, That no tax shall be collected under this section except for the balance of the amount remaining unpaid as provided for in this section.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available, under the direction of the said board, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this act.

THE PEOPLE'S CONGRESS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York World of this morning reviewing the work of this Congress. I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE PEOPLE'S CONGRESS.

The best that can be said of any Congress during its life is that it has been true to its trust. Time alone will determine the wisdom of its deeds. The Sixty-third Congress, in session longer than any other in our history, is noteworthy for its industry. It should always be even more memorable for its faithfulness to the pledges upon which it was chosen. For those pledges the people no less than their Congress must bear the responsibility.

When this Congress began its labors, April 7, 1913, certain great measures of reform had been promised by both parties for years. Except for two years in the House of Representatives, the Republicans had been in complete control of the Government since 1897. They had been bound by their platforms to reduce and equalize tariff and other taxation, to extend and strengthen the antitrust law, to reform our finances, to stop the exploitation of Alaska, and to promote justly the principles of self-government in the Philippines.

To every one of these obligations they had proved false. In most cases they had done nothing. Revising the tariff twice, they increased its burdens upon consumers. Enacting some useful and progressive legislation in other directions, they studiously ignored or rejected popular demands for relief from privilege, extortion, and monopoly. Such was the situation a year ago last spring, when for the first time in more than 50 years a Democratic President, with a Congress having a dependable Democratic majority in both branches, took office.

For good or for ill, this Congress, cooperating with this President, has met the issues of the last 20 years in accordance with its covenants. It has dealt with several new problems besides. No other Congress has enacted so many laws reaching to the very foundations of finance, commerce, industry, and social order. In no other Congress has there been more freedom from lobbyists and promoters. At the hands of no other Congress have the people suffered less from demagogy and violence.

The Sixty-third Congress has revised downward, in the interest of consumers, a tariff whose schedules not many years ago were sold to the contributors of campaign funds.

It has reformed our banking and currency systems, putting an end to a financial tyranny centralized in a private coterie.

It has supplemented and clarified the antitrust laws, establishing personal guilt, preventing monopoly and interlocking directorates, and emancipating labor from unwarranted prosecutions and summary punishments without trial by jury.

It has levied an income tax, by means of which wealth must bear a share of public burdens heretofore heaped solely upon consumption.

It has created a Trade Commission empowered to investigate and report upon commercial oppressions that tend toward criminality.

It has amended the employees' arbitration law, by which means it recently, in the case of the railroads, averted what threatened to be the greatest strike ever known.

It has provided for the construction of a Government railroad in Alaska and for the leasing of public coal lands in that Territory, thereby forever protecting national rights in a dependency long menaced by the avarice of a moneyed sovereignty.

It has passed in one branch an act extending the liberties of the Filipinos and preparing the way for their self-government, a fulfillment not only of our most solemn pledges, but a reaffirmation of the principles underlying our own freedom as expressed in the Declaration of Independence. These are the mighty promise-keeping performances of the Sixty-third Congress. Of its many achievements relating to issues unforeseen, we shall cite only the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls act, in which a former Congress had violated a treaty to serve the coastwise shipping monopoly; the act authorizing the President to use force at Vera Cruz, but not declaring war upon the people of Mexico; the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry; the extension of the emergency currency act, anticipating the activities of the Federal reserve banks, not yet in operation, and the establishment of a Bureau of Maritime Insurance to continue during the European war.

In proof of the rectitude of purpose displayed in this remarkable record and of the fact that both parties have long been pledged to root privilege and plutocracy out of our laws, reference may be made to the attitude of the minority on some of these questions. Republican leadership, of course, was antagonistic, but it could not prevent men who respected their word from standing true. In the Senate, on the first passage of the Clayton antitrust bill, 7 Republicans voted with the Democrats; in the House, 56 Republicans. In the House no Republican voted against the Trade Commission bill; in the Senate, 12 Republicans favored it. In the Senate the banking and currency bill received the votes of 4 Republicans; in the House, 49 Republicans. Practically all of the important measures above referred to had Republican support in considerable numbers. The most notable exception is that of the tariff act, and even as to that 6 Republicans in the House and 2 in the Senate aligned themselves with the Democrats in perfect accord.

When partisans usually hostile unite in this way it is clear that honor and principle and reason abide on both sides. The time was ripe, indeed, for these movements forward, but progress such as this would not have been made except under highly favorable conditions when the temper of the people was known. In both Houses the majority was ably and sincerely led. There was an unalterable purpose to respect public opinion. There was the most laborious industry. There was unlimited patience. Above all else, there was the lofty inspiration of the White House, which, to the condemnation of a great party, had not been there before.

Nothing in a Republic is more inspiring than obedience to the popular will. The Sixty-third Congress has been more than obedient. It has been highly efficient. It has been a people's Congress, in which the best traditions of representative government have been courageously maintained. It must look to the people for its rewards. To the people belongs the triumph, all of which they saw, a large part of which they were.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (No. 52) authorizing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 24th day of October, 1914, at 4 o'clock p. m., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution (No. 52) from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
October 24, 1914.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 24th day of October, 1914, at 4 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the resolution just received from the House of Representatives be concurred in by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to concur in the resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the question which presents itself to me on the motion just made is, should I vote upon the resolution or should I make the point of no quorum, and call for a quorum.

Mr. President, we have brought to the attention of the Senate certain facts which involve especially the welfare of twenty millions of people, citizens of our country, and the welfare of the entire country. We have shown to the Senate that the loss of our European market for cotton has left this country with a crop of 15,000,000 bales, and with a market for 5,000,000 bales destroyed by the European war. We have shown that our own citizens have in no way been responsible for this condition; that it is not a normal case of overproduction and underdemand, but is a normal production with the demand destroyed by a foreign war.

We brought this question to the attention of Congress, not occupying an attitude similar to that which has ever been occupied by producers in the United States, who, finding that they had upon hand more to sell than the purchasers needed, asked for help. We distinguished the case from any case that has ever happened in the history of our country, and pointed out that it was one without antecedents, which could not become a precedent in the future, because in the future similar conditions could scarcely possibly happen.

We brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that a week before war was declared in Europe middling lint cotton was selling for 13¼ cents a pound; that for the past five years it sold for an average of 12¾ cents a pound, and for the past 10 years for over 12 cents a pound average; that our exportation of this great commodity brought back to our country last year through sales abroad $610,000,000; that this crop sold abroad has brought to our country since 1800 nearly $20,000,000,000; that it has no rival as an American product in its value in our international trade or in its contribution to the commerce of our country; that to-day we are almost groveling before the English people, consulting with the representatives of the Treasury Department, begging for extension of time on our liabilities to that country, and largely because this product is not now being bought by Great Britain as it would be bought, because of this 5,000,000 bales of excess for which there is no market.

We have pointed out the fact that if our Government would either buy or take over these 5,000,000 bales, Great Britain to-day would be buying cotton liberally at above 10 cents a pound, that then two hundred and odd million dollars that we owe abroad would be wiped out, and we would not have the humiliating spectacle of begging for indulgence upon our gold obligations.

We have sought to present this question as a national question. I think perhaps we made a mistake in referring to it in any other way; I think perhaps we made a mistake in suggesting that the people of nine States would be especially benefited by the proposed legislation.

Ah, Mr. President, I wish to say that the nine States that grow this commodity will live, their people will live, and they will continue to contribute to the power of this country. Rich and fertile is their soil, abundant are their minerals, and almost limitless are their water powers. A hardship will fall upon those who are in debt and the poorer classes. This great product will be absorbed by those of more means, and when it is known next spring that the crop has been cut one-half, cotton will sell for 10 cents a pound and upward. The world must have it. Ours is a country that alone furnishes the staple cotton that clothes the world; it has no rival. There is the short staple of India. Ours must be spun with it to make it useful. There is the very long staple of Egypt. It is valuable only for limited purposes. Ours is the great raw material from which the world must be clothed, and as a citizen of this Union I congratulate our entire country upon this great product of our country. Those of us who live in the nine cotton States will stand the next 12 months, and our section will continue to grow in wealth and power with its capacity to produce foodstuffs equal to that of any other part of the Union, and with its exclusive capacity to produce the raw material which must clothe the world.

We presented to the Senate a measure by which the Government could take over 5,000,000 bales of cotton and hold the same until 1916, without the possibility of loss to the National Government.

The bill was drawn in such a way that if a loss occurred the cotton producers would bear it. If a profit was made the Government would receive it.

Mr. President, we obtained a vote upon this measure; we were beaten. Some of us sought to hold up the war-tax bill to try to get another chance, but again we were beaten. We had our day in court for this session, so far as that plan is concerned, and I would have no excuse for filibustering or for making a point of no quorum in behalf of the bill to require the Government to purchase 5,000,000 bales of cotton.

Then, in the House the Congressmen from cotton-producing States presented a measure upon which they agreed, a measure by which currency was to be furnished in the nine Southern States. Let me stop a moment to speak of their condition with reference to currency.

This crop by September 1 each year almost exhausts the resources of the banks and the merchants and the farmers and the producers. By the 1st day of September cotton comes upon the market. By that day there is little or no money in the cotton counties of the South. They are expecting to get it by the speedy sale of cotton, and cotton after this time pours into the market, buyers vie with each other to obtain it, and it brings cash as perhaps no other commodity. The 1st of September came this year, and there was no market. The 1st of October came, and there was no market. The debt-paying time had come, and there was not anything to pay with, unless you swapped a bale of cotton for your debt; but each one of your creditors was not well provided with a way of taking care of that cotton, and it was a pretty big thing to use for exchange purposes. Mr. President, the rural sections were absolutely without a medium of exchange, and largely are in that condition to-day.

There was a fair vote upon the House measure, and it was defeated. I come to three other measures pending in the House upon which the Senate has passed. One is the bill providing that the member banks of any reserve district may deposit all of their surplus in the reserve bank of the district. This measure would have given to each one of these reserve banks currency-issuing power that it would not otherwise have. It would have afforded, in my judgment, to the district in which I live and to the adjoining district, two great cotton districts, probably $40,000,000 in increased currency. I think that bill ought to have been passed. I think any kind of reasonable delay was justifiable to stop adjournment so that a vote might be had upon that bill. Nobody objected to it; a large majority, at least, of the House were known to be for it. I think a little more force ought to have been given from somewhere to the passage of the measure and to a vote on it.

Another bill pending in the House was the bill providing that banks, members of the national currency association, might use their bills receivable up to the amount of 75 per cent of their capital and surplus, instead of 30 per cent, on which to issue their notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland law. We passed that measure through the Senate. The House amended it and increased the amount to 100 per cent. That measure would have been of great value to the section in which I live; it would have helped at least to meet the currency deficiency due to the utter failure of a market at this time for the commodity which usually furnishes currency at this season of the year for that section.

We amended that bill in the Senate, wisely I think, to permit State banks the benefits of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. Over in the House before the committee there appeared the Secretary of the Treasury, backed up by the Federal Reserve Board, which he took with him to oppose the Senate amendment allowing State banks the privileges of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, and, with their combined influence, they defeated the measure before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

Mr. President, even if the House rejected that part of the bill which we put on it, we ought to have had the balance; it would have been worth $50,000,000 of currency to the nine cotton-growing States. They could have obtained that much, in my judgment, or certainly $40,000,000 out of the enlarged facilities afforded them by the use of their bills receivable as a basis for the Aldrich-Vreeland Act currency.

I think myself that as little as might have been done would have been to free until July 1 next the notes of State banks secured by cotton-warehouse receipts from the 10 per cent tax. I do not suppose there is a lawyer who doubts that 10 per cent tax on State banks stretched the Constitution as much as any legislation that we have presented would have stretched the Constitution.

Mr. President, there [exhibiting] is a note that is used as currency in a Georgia county. I call it a "note"; it is called a consolidated warehouse company receipt. It is signed by every bank in that section—four banks, I believe, in the county—agreeing to accept it on deposit, but reserving the right to pay these deposits in the same currency. It bears the signatures of all the business houses in the section agreeing to take it in settlement of debts and to sell goods and receive payment in it. The oil company, the telephone company, and the railroads—two of them—running through the county take it for transportation and in payment for bills.

The farmer takes his cotton to the warehouse, and he is paid 7 cents a pound in this currency for his cotton. He is loaned 7 cents a pound on his cotton, at 6 per cent, for six months. That carries him over until next spring, when we will know whether the cotton farmer will show sense or folly. If he cuts his crop he will show sense; if the report comes that he has not cut his crop he will show folly. If he has cut his crop that cotton will be worth 10 cents a pound. So that by a currency created locally the farmer gets his 7 cents a pound on his cotton and pays his debts, and the community is moving along smoothly with no failures, for currency has been furnished them to do business.

I have been appealed to to know if such a note would be subject to the 10 per cent tax. I have declined to give a specific opinion, but I have given the opinion that they will never have to pay any 10 per cent tax. I call your attention to these facts to show how justifiable is the action of a representative of this section who comes to the Congress and says: "We are entitled to something; we are entitled at least to a chance to issue our own notes as a circulating medium for a few months, without taxation, so as to handle local business; and when that is denied us I think we have the right to say, 'Our Government is harsh, and we lack friends at court.'"

I ask that the certificate of the Consolidated Warehouse Co., of Sylvania, to which I have referred, may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The certificate referred to is as follows:

payment of any obligations due them, and may be freely used by any other merchant or individual in the same manner: All merchants in Sylvania, Ga., all merchants in Newington, Ga., Sylvania & Girard R. R. Co., Farmers Oil & Fertilizer Co., Screven Telephone Co., Telephone Publishing Co., W. A. Mallory & Bro., J. T. Averitt, L. P. Pearson & Son, A. R. Roberts, J. L. Limerick, C. C. Limerick Co., M. L. Parker, J. C. Dixon, U. A. Zeigler, A. B. Lewis, H. B. Walker & Co., H. & J. C. Reddick.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if they had just given us relief by suspending the 10 per cent tax on the notes issued by State banks, limiting them, if you please, to banks that have secured notes by warehouse certificates on cotton, it would have been valuable. I was willing to see the warehouse bill pass and limit the notes to be freed from the 10 per cent tax to notes secured by Government licensed and bonded warehouses.

What have we had? Was that an unreasonable request? Mr. President, last Thursday, when the House was still considering these questions, when it was considering the warehouse bill, when it was considering the bill to allow the member banks to put their entire reserves in the reserve bank of their district, when it was considering the bill to permit banks, members of national currency associations, to use their bills receivable up to 75 or 100 per cent of their capital and surplus as a basis for emergency notes, when it also had connected with that measure a provision to give some chance to State banks to issue currency—when these questions were pending under a rule before the House that required action on them, men in charge put through a resolution of final adjournment, without waiting to see what the House would do. They fixed it at 6 o'clock Thursday afternoon, and the Members took their valises, went home, and left the House without a quorum.

So far as I am concerned, when the rules of this body permit it, I will use any power they give me to help obtain a chance for legislation so important and so necessary to the people whom I peculiarly represent—the people of my own State.

I have no apology and no regret for the action which I have taken. My regret is that I did not know of this proposed adjournment earlier, when I might possibly in time have suggested a later hour, so that action might have been had in the House before its Members were practically invited to leave the Capital and leave the House without a quorum. I never heard of the resolution until it was read here; I think I was not consulted perhaps in part because it was known I might object; still I had the opportunity to object, and not in any spirit of vindictiveness, not in any spirit of temper, but in the earnest hope that by objecting we might hold a quorum, or through unanimous consent obtain the passage not of the measures I so much wanted, not of the best of all measures, the almost perfect measure from a business standpoint, which was presented by a majority of the Democrats from the cotton-growing States as an amendment to the war-tax bill—not that; not the House bill that had been voted down, but at least the three measures to which I have referred with some provision attached to let us use our State banks for eight months to take care of our local conditions.

I do not believe that in the history of this country there has ever been presented so strong a case with so little performance.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the question before the Senate: Shall I stop this adjournment by calling for a quorum, or will I have done my duty by simply voting against the adjournment? That is the question I must decide. If I thought that by raising the point of no quorum I could bring a quorum here within the next two weeks and pass some of this legislation, I would not hesitate a moment about it. I would regret to offend my friends, but I would rather serve my constituents; I would regret to jeopardize perhaps the candidacy of some Democrat for some place, but I would jeopardize their candidacy to serve my constituents.

The difficulty is that I am assured, if we force the presence of a quorum, an adjournment would at once follow and that nothing would be accomplished; that if we undertook to drag along until after the election and then force a quorum, such a feeling of dissatisfaction would exist among Members that at least the subject would be opened up for consideration with a little touch of human nature in it which might be called prejudice.

Mr. President, I desire to be governed exclusively by the hope of doing some good for my constituents. I have no wish to punish anybody. I have no desire to make it unpleasant for anybody. My own personal judgment would be to stay here, but I am almost alone in that opinion. The Democrats in the House interested in this subject have concluded that it is best to adjourn. However much confidence I may have in my own opinion I hesitate to set it up against that of so many who wish to accomplish exactly the same thing that I do, and who tell me that if I resort to the point of no quorum and press a vote upon this question they never will be able to get anything through the House, or that they are afraid they will not. Reluctant as I am to take that course, I feel that I would be doing wrong now to raise the question of no quorum, and that it is my duty simply to vote "no" on the proposition for adjournment.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, nothing that I can say will add to what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I want to say, however, that I am opposed to an adjournment, though I do not expect to carry my opposition to the point of forcing a continuous session or a prolonged session by suggesting the absence of a quorum. If I thought that insisting upon a quorum would secure for my people some legislation upon the momentous subject of relieving the people of the South, I would insist upon the point.

The situation in the South, sir, is appalling, and I fear the effect that an adjournment of Congress will have upon it. As long as Congress is in session the people of that section have some hope—hope that might induce them to withhold their cotton from the market. If they would do that, relief would come, because, sir, it is at last a contest between the spinners of the world and the cotton growers of the South. It is a contest between the producers and the consumers, and we know that with every passing day the amount of cotton being held is being reduced, the spinners are getting nearer the end of their supplies, and if we could withhold the cotton of the South from the market, relief would eventually come. But I fear that when we adjourn the planter will lose hope; and, furthermore, I fear that the consumers of cotton will understand when we adjourn that there is no relief from Congress for the growers and they must accept whatever price the buyers propose to offer. I fear that cotton will go even to a lower level than it is now, and I fear our adjournment may tend to produce that effect.

I do not feel, however, that it would be proper for me to stand out alone, to stand out when practically all of my associates have decided to the contrary, to hold out when the House has already passed this resolution fixing the hour of adjournment at 4 o'clock. I do feel, however, that it is my duty on this occasion to express my opposition to it, and I feel that it is my duty to say here and now that the responsibility for this situation, disastrous as it is not only to the South but to the Nation, will rest upon shoulders other than mine.

The course I have pursued was not dictated by captious opposition. It is not my desire to inconvenience any Member of the Senate or any Member of Congress. On the contrary, I am disposed to accede to almost anything that would add to their convenience. My opposition to adjournment and my opposition to the war-tax measure was based upon the hope that it might bring some relief to the people of the South.

Having made these remarks, I shall vote against the resolution for adjournment and leave the responsibility upon those who have failed to hear the plea of the South and of the Nation as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I believe there are some matters on the Executive Calendar that ought to be considered, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 53 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That Mr. LEE of Maryland be appointed a member of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment; that Mr. WEST be appointed a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce; that Mr. LANE be appointed a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department; that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN be appointed a member of the Committee on Revision of the Laws; and that Mr. SHIELDS be appointed a member of the Committee on the University of the United States.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 4 o'clock p. m.). The hour fixed in the concurrent resolution of the two Houses for adjournment having arrived, I now declare the second session of the Sixty-third Congress adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, October 24, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, through whose eternal energy and boundless love we have our being, open Thou our eyes to the eternal verities which lift a man out of himself, make him an immortal soul, and fill him with longings, hopes, and aspirations which lead on to victory in the things which make for righteousness. Grant, O Father, that we may become what we all long to be, and go on our way rejoicing in the hope of perfection under the leadership of Thy son Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROPOSED COTTON LEGISLATION.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I am going to leave town to-night, and I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that does not interfere with the special order?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I see absolutely no sense nor point in the performance that is being carried on now, nor any reason why any Member of Congress should stay here to witness its futile absurdity. I will not characterize it further. It seems to me simply without point or intelligence. I make these remarks because I am going home to-night, after two years of almost unbroken attendance. [Applause.]

POST-OFFICE MESSENGERS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 640, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it does not interfere with the special order?

The SPEAKER. Nothing interferes until the Chair says so. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. HENRY. That is just what I wanted the Chair to say.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair said.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 640.

Resolved, That nine messengers in the post office of the House now authorized to be employed during the session may continue to be employed during the period between the adjournment of the present session and the 1st of December, 1914, and be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

With the following amendment:

In line 3, after the word "session," add the following: "And the three session telephone operators authorized by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1914, and continued during the present session by House joint resolution 286, approved July 1, 1914."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether that resolution embraces session employees?

Mr. PARK. This is for the session employees, as I understand it.

Mr. BORLAND. I refer to what we generally know as session employees.

Mr. PARK. These are session employees—nine of them.

Mr. BORLAND. Is that all of them?

Mr. PARK. I do not know.

Mr. BORLAND. We passed a resolution here the other day taking care of the regular employees, and we ought to take care of the session employees. I think they are entitled to the same treatment. I do not object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

COTTON.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short resolution of citizens of my district touching pending legislation on the cotton situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a resolution of citizens of his district on the cotton situation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PEACE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of peace by inserting an article written by Mr. M. M. Wyvell.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that refer to the proceedings here on the floor of the House?

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not.

Mr. MANN. What is the article?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is an article on peace—the peace policy of the present administration.

Mr. MANN. By whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. By Mr. Wyvell. He is secretary to Mr. W. J. Bryan.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think there is any occasion for that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is a fine article on peace.

Mr. MANN. That is running pretty low.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

BUTTER.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of the exportation and importation and the wholesale and retail price of butter in California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of butter in California. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman trying to grease the ways?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if that will affect the price of butter?

Mr. RAKER. No; it is going up every day.

Mr. MANN. Yes; since we have had the Democratic tariff.

Mr. RAKER. No; not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I received unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of the Panama Canal. Those remarks are already in print. I ask unanimous consent that it may bear the date of to-day rather than of the time when I received permission to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his remarks on the Panama Canal shall be printed as of this date instead of the other one. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEXICO.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 191) to convey appreciation of Congress to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suárez for their generous and distinguished services as mediators in the controversy between the Government of the United States and the leaders of the warring parties in Mexico. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of this resolution, and that it may be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it possible that we may make an arrangement between the two Houses by 2 o'clock, and I intend to ask unanimous consent that we may take a recess until that time, but my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] desires five minutes.

Mr. HENRY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask if we can not make some arrangement about taking a recess for three days at a time until November 10?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that we have no quorum, and I do not see any possibility of getting a quorum before the elections are over. I would very much prefer myself to meet once every three days rather than once every day, but I hope that the gentleman will not make that request at this time but let us take a recess until 2 o'clock.

Mr. HENRY. I shall comply with the gentleman's request about that. But I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that it seems evident we can not get a quorum here until after the election. Of course, I have no desire to undertake to do the impossible, but I think that by November 10 it would be possible to secure a quorum to act on some of the important matters now pending in the House, and if it is possible to have an agreement to take a recess for three days at a time I am perfectly willing to do that. However, I shall not make that request at this time. I will make it at 2 o'clock. I have no objection to taking a recess now until 2 o'clock, as the gentleman from Alabama asks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. BLACKMON] may address the House for five minutes, at the end of which time the House shall take a recess until 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. BLACK-

MON] have leave to address the House for five minutes, and that at the end of that time the House take a recess until 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what becomes of the special order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not disturb the pending order, of course.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; of course not. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, during the short time that I have been a Member of this body it has been my purpose not to take up the time of this House unnecessarily. I have tried in my feeble way to vote my convictions on all questions, and have done so. I am convinced, however, that at this time the country is weary of the performance that is going on here now. I deny to any man the right to question my sincerity with reference to securing aid for the producers of this country. I have stood ready at all times to aid the producers in every way that I could; but it became apparent to me, and it has now become apparent to the country, that we are not going to receive any additional Federal aid for the cotton-producing States of this Nation. The people realize that we are not going to be able to pass through the National Congress a bill appropriating $500,000,000, or $250,000,000, to go exclusively to cotton-producing States, because the strictly cotton-growing States have only about 98 Members in the House of Representatives out of a total of 435 Members. I realized that some time ago. The farmers of the South know to-day that Congress is not going to pass any additional legislation for their special benefit at this time, and we are keeping the Congress of the United States in session at a tremendous expense that could be saved by adjourning. We are spending money here each day, and the farmers will be forced to pay a part of this additional expense.

I am going home at 4.35 this afternoon on train No. 29, the Birmingham Special [applause]; and I want to say to you that the people of the fourth congressional district of Alabama know that I am their true friend. They know, too, from my 10 years' service in the Alabama State Senate before I came here, that I never at any time failed to do for them what I could consistently do. [Applause.] If all the Members of this body should go into my district and undertake to make the farmers believe that I am not their friend, they could not do it.

Another thing, they know that I am not a four flusher. [Applause and laughter.] They know I tell them and that I have told them the absolute truth as I saw it. I want to tell you boys there is no doubt about it, that the most of the farmers in the South are really giving us the laugh. They realize that the southern Members have done all they could do, and that the 98 Members from the strictly speaking cotton-growing States could not pass a bill over the remaining 337 Members that embraced cotton alone. Now, that is the truth. [Applause.] I want to say to you that we ought to understand it. I hope I will meet you back here some time soon. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I believe the fourth district of Alabama adjoins the fourth district of Georgia?

Mr. BLACKMON. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. You remember the old song—

If you get there before I do,
Just tell them I am coming, too.

[Laughter.]

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the House stands in recess until 2 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the approval of the Journal on December 9 I may address the House for one hour on the subject of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] asks unanimous consent that on December 9, immediately after the reading and approval of the Journal and the disposition of such matters on the Speaker's table which have to be attended to, he may be permitted to address the House for one hour on the subject of rural credits. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he expects to have a rural-credits bill reported to the House of Representatives at that time?

Mr. BULKLEY. I hardly think it possible to have the bill reported out of the committee by that time.

Mr. HENRY. Could the gentleman give some indication about the time he expects it will come before the House?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not believe I could make a prediction at this time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman permit me to ask him if he could not make his request Tuesday the 8th, instead of the 9th, which is Calendar Wednesday? There are some very important bills pending from the Committee on the Judiciary upon the calendar which I very much desire to take up on Wednesday if possible, as seven weeks have already been consumed by the printing bill, and I am very anxious to get those bills passed before Christmas.

Mr. BULKLEY. The reason I did not make it December 8 is that I presume the President would have a message to deliver on that day. However, if it is more agreeable, I will ask that I be permitted to address the House on Thursday, December 10.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman changes his request to Thursday, December 10. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman ought not to make a request of this kind at this time.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to a resolution which I recently introduced in the House.

The SPEAKER. What is the resolution about?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The resolution is on the subject of universal peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on a resolution which he introduced on the subject of peace. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman desire to insert some remarks of his own——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Or something that is copied?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is some remarks of my own.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT OF SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 52.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session of Congress by adjourning their respective Houses on the 24th day of October, 1914, at 4 o'clock p. m.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—or is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a privileged resolution; but what time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HENRY. I ask for only two minutes now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I think if we can make some arrangement to have a recess of three days at a time, it would be better. I think if we could meet on the 10th of November and then take up pending important matters, we would be in a more advantageous position in regard to certain conditions in the Southern States, and therefore I wish to ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for three days at a time, and that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say that I sympathize very much with the fight which the Representatives from the cotton States are making here for some sort of relief for those States. The cotton situation is an agricultural tragedy the like of which has never visited this country before, and we will be realizing soon in the North that it is a calamity there also——

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman pardon a question or a statement or an interruption there? I would like to state to the gentleman that all the Representatives from the Southern States are not participating in this movement on hand now to prolong the session of the House——

Mr. HENRY. Only those who really want relief are.

Mr. HARDY. I object to that.

Mr. SMALL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas that I am just as earnest for relief as the gentleman from Texas, and more so, I think.

Mr. HENRY. I did not make any reflection whatever.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is this a good time to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No!

The SPEAKER. The Chair might express an opinion to the gentleman privately.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I have a short statement I desire to read to the House, so that it may appear in the RECORD, or ask that I may have permission to insert the statement, if proceedings have not concluded before it arrives. I am having it prepared. Permission to insert it in the RECORD will be satisfactory to me. I just ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HENRY. I say that I wish to read a short statement to the House, probably half a page of typewritten matter, giving my reasons for the position I am taking and shall take; and, therefore, if I do not get it from my secretary in time to read it to the House, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks, although I hope he will get them in time to read them. I would like to hear them.

Mr. HENRY. I hope so. I am trying to get them here now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. HENRY. I ask the Speaker to put the request I made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman in the mêlée to withdraw his request. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the situation in the South is, of course, an agricultural tragedy. We have never had anything like it, and it may be a tragedy not only in the South but also in the North, because cotton is our great exchange crop; it is the crop with which we pay our foreign-trade balances. There are some of us in the North who are ready to unite with these Representatives from the cotton States upon some measure of relief within the boundaries of sound national finance. [Applause.]

We do not feel that the proposition made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and for which he contends so strenuously and so ably in this House, is a proposition within the realm of sound finance, but we hope some method, some proposition, can be reported out from the proper committee which will afford relief to the Southern States. I do not know what it will be. I am compelled, however, to object to the request of the gentleman from Texas for three-day recesses. Nothing can be accomplished.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] withdrew that request.

Mr. HENRY. I did not withdraw the request. These other requests were pending that one.

Mr. RAINEY. I am compelled to object to the request for three-day recesses by unanimous consent. Nothing can be accomplished by that. Those Members of the House on both sides who would go home under those circumstances are already at home and campaigning in their districts. Those who are here are here because they feel that there is a demand in their districts that they remain at their post of duty when Congress is in session and be here in the Chamber when it is in session. It is impossible for them to go back and accomplish anything in the two days that will intervene between the sessions. If Congress meets once in three days, we might as well meet every day. And for that reason I am compelled to object to the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the adjournment resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 27.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I now be allowed to read the statement to which I referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to read the statement referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, my cotton-relief bill goes over to the next session of Congress with the most admirable parliamentary status. It is now attached as a rider to the Senate banking and currency bill, which is pending before the House under a special and absolute continuing order, with the previous question already ordered by formal vote of the House. The very first vote that is taken after the Chaplain offers prayer when the next session convenes is upon my motion to recommit the Senate bill with instructions to the Banking and Currency Committee to report the same back amended by adding, as an amendment, my cotton-relief bill providing for the depositing in the National and State banks of the cotton and tobacco growing States of $250,000,000 for the relief of the producers of those products.

The fight has just begun. We will go home to our people and renew our efforts to inspire them to greater endeavor to pass the measure when we reconvene. The very moment our southern Representatives return to Washington at the opening of Congress we will gird up our loins and open up the most vigorous fight for the relief to which our people are entitled under this bill.

It is absolutely certain that a quorum of the House and Senate can not be brought back to Washington until after the November elections. Hence it is futile to undertake legislation when there is positively no chance for us to secure a quorum of both Houses. The President, so far, has failed to agree to the bills that have been proposed. Yet we feel sure that he is ready to do his full duty as he sees it in regard to the situation.

My information is that Congress will be reconvened in extraordinary session about the middle of November. That being the case, it will be a little over three weeks until we can again begin our contest in the House of Representatives. The highly important thing to impress upon the country now is that the people should express to their Representatives their wishes in regard to this far-reaching and beneficial legislation.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Senate will not meet until half past 2 o'clock. It will probably be 3 o'clock before we can receive any message from that body. If it is agreeable, and unless some gentleman desires to occupy the time, I ask unanimous consent to take a recess until 3 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MANN. It would be better to make it a little later.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Probably; though something might happen there that might amend the resolution.

Mr. MANN. It is doubtful whether they will get it back at 3 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What suggestion does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] make?

Mr. MANN. I would say half past 3.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think that 3 o'clock and 15 minutes will be late enough.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, make it 3.15 p. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 52.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session of Congress by adjourning their respective Houses on the 24th day of October, 1914, at 4 o'clock p. m.

The announcement was greeted with applause.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE COTTON SITUATION.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I present may be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] offers a resolution and asks unanimous consent for its consideration. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 660.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a special committee, composed of 7 Members of the House, 4 of whom shall be of the majority and 3 of the minority, to investigate the cotton condition of the South, with a view to recommending to Congress legislation to require the United States Government to extend financial relief to the cotton growers of the South. Said committee is directed to make its report to the House on December 15, 1914.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee: Mr. MANN, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. HENRY, Mr. LEVER, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. BELL of Georgia, and Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that it will be possible for me to serve on this committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker shall have the right after the adjournment to name anybody in my place if I go off, or any of the others in the same way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced as the members of the cotton investigating committee Mr. LEVER of South Carolina, Mr. AUSTIN of Tennessee, Mr. HENRY of Texas, Mr. HEFLIN of Alabama, Mr. BELL of Georgia, Mr. LANGLEY of Kentucky, and Mr. FALCONER of Washington.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I shall detain you but a minute. This is the longest and most laborious session that the Congress of the United States has ever known. I congratulate you most heartily on being able to adjourn at last. [Applause.]

I desire to thank every Member of the House—Democrat, Republican, Progressive, or Independent—for the uniform kindness with which they have treated the Chair. And now, in the language of Tiny Tim, "God bless us, every one." [Applause.]

The time having arrived under the concurrent resolution to adjourn, I declare this session of Congress adjourned sine die. [Prolonged applause.]
